Mr. HUNGERFORD (interrupting). We have in the summer time in New York a great many extra lines that call for the temporary employment of men. We have got quite a number of men from these southern schools, who are very glad to get something to do during the summer months, and they have proved very efficient.

Chairman WALSH. I understand you, then, that you do not get any porters from the South except some, you say, on eastern lines during the summer months?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, you asked me about these schools.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I say I do not know that we get any from the schools except in the summer months, because they go back to school in the fall. But we do employ colored men in the South for regular service; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And send them to the North?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, we transfer them around as may be necessary to meet the service requirements; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what organization have you in the South, or how do you get porters in the South?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Why, our representatives there keep in touch with them—get hold of them, and the service inspectors look them up, and get men of a desirable class.

Chairman WALSH. You have them report where?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, they report to the superintendent at the point where they are hired usually.

Chairman WALSH. Well, you say the supply is quite as large of porters as it is of conductors?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Does that exist throughout the United States?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't think there is any point where we can not get porters except on the Pacific coast.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you say you have men looking out for them in the South?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any shortage of supply, say, in the vicinity of Chicago and St. Louis and these other places?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Is there any shortage?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; such as—

Mr. HUNGERFORD (interrupting). No; there is no shortage in supply. There are plenty of men but they are not always altogether of the right caliber.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, the reason, then, that you get colored men from the South is because you get better men, you think, from that place?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is it exactly.

Chairman WALSH. From that part of the country?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is it exactly.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the idea, that you get men that will serve better; that is, that makes better servants than the colored men in the North?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, we find that their training there better fits them for service on the car.

Chairman WALSH. To put it plainly, is the negro in the South as independent an individual as the one in the North? Do you find it so?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think he is.

Chairman WALSH. And in what way, then, so far as car service is concerned, does the northern negro compare with the southern negro to his disadvantage, so far as your employment is concerned?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. You must consider one thing, and that is that the South is the source of the negro. You have a bigger field to make selections from than you have here. I think that the old—what you might call the old southern negro is much more acceptable a man on the cars than the younger colored man that is found around in the slums of Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. Well, is there any place that you find negroes that will do for your service other than the slums?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. There are large numbers of them that are not—

Mr. HUNGERFORD (interrupting). There are.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). That are not found in the slums?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. There are.

Chairman WALSH. How do they compare—those colored men that are not found in the slums—how do they compare with the negro you get in the South?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think the old southern colored man makes the best porter on the car.

Chairman WALSH. Well, in what way?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, because he is more adapted to waiting on the passengers and gives them better attention and has a better manner, that is more acceptable to them and more pleasant.

Chairman WALSH. Now, are there any other points that you find him desirable in?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is about all.

Chairman WALSH. The reason, then, that you make a special effort to get porters in the South is that they are more polite to the passengers and so on?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; more pleasing to them.

Chairman WALSH. And there is no other reason

Mr. HUNGERFORD. None that I know of.

Chairman WALSH. Do you find those men that come from the South come from the farms and the like of that, do they?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They do not.

Chairman WALSH. Where do they come from? What have they been doing?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We get mostly house servants.

Chairman WALSH. House servants—those that have been employed in families?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What training do you give the porters before you give them runs?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are trained and taken down and put on the cars and given instructions in preparing berths and the minor duties, and then they are put on the road.

Chairman WALSH. Well, who gives them their instructions in the beginning?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Representatives in the district offices have to do that.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have someone whose particular duty it is to train porters, or do you just send them on a car where other porters are?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We have, of course, the representatives at these various points, and they instruct the porters as well as the conductors. They are sent down into the yard and instructed and given an opportunity to go through with what you might call the mechanical work of preparing berths, and so on. Here in Chicago we do have an instruction department because of the larger field, and we have so many extra cars that are sent out of here, this being our supply station.

Chairman WALSH. And how long does it take to train the porter to do his work so that if he is ever going to be able to do it he can do it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, it don't take more than two or three days for any intelligent fellow to learn to do it.

Chairman WALSH. Two or three days for an intelligent porter?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And during the period during which he is being broken in is he paid?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are not.

Chairman WALSH. And does it ever extend over a longer period than two or three days?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, I can not say as to that. I could not say as to that, how long it takes some. Of course, you know there is a difference in men. Some pick up more quickly—adapt themselves.

Chairman WALSH. As soon as they get through this two or three days' instruction, what do you say is done with them?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are assigned to service when service opens up. We have a great many extra men who are just waiting to get some runs.

Chairman WALSH. In ordinary times how many extra porters would you have, would you say were waiting to get runs?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I can best answer that by saying that during the last inauguration at Washington they had a large troop of them. We were called on, I think, for some 300 or 400 extra cars to go to Washington, and they took every extra available car we had in storage, down there—some 500 or 600 extra cars went in the course of one week; and we manned each car from the extra men waiting here, and they were very glad to get the employment.

Chairman WALSH. How long after a man is broken in, on an average in ordinary times, would he have to wait to get on the pay roll?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, I could not answer that.

Chairman WALSH. Do I gather from your answer in regard to that inauguration matter that that is the ordinary status of your company that you have a waiting list of some 500 or 600 men waiting to be porters?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Easily?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Easily.

Chairman WALSH. And that occurs—that is the case during all ordinary times?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes. We could send out 300 cars to-morrow.

Chairman WALSH. Now, is this work still going on of undertaking to get men in the South—colored men?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Not undertaking it now, because we have got all that we would want and more too.

Chairman WALSH. Is it the policy of your company to keep a great number of men available for this purpose?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It is not. It is our policy to get the best men we can to make the service the highest possible standard. We are seeking them all the time.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have in mind that by having 500 or 600 men, of what you might call a small economic power, do you consider that that has an effect on wages; that a man would be more likely to work for $27.50 a month if he knew there were 600 men ready to take his place than if you did not have such a number?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Not at all.

Chairman WALSH. You did not have that in mind? Are porters first assigned to tourist cars in many instances?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; in many instances, they are.

Chairman WALSH. Is the policy of the company to first assign them to tourist cars?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, not altogether. We do where we are operating regular tourist-car lines, yes; because the tourist-car service is not supposed to be the same high standard as the first class or so-called standard cars.

Chairman WALSH. What is the pay of a tourist-car porter compared with a standard-car porter?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Thirty-five dollars a month, it was; now, $36.75.

Chairman WALSH. The car, as I understand it, has no conductor—the tourist car?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, yes; the tourist cars are generally run on the same train and the conductor has jurisdiction over all the cars on the train.

Chairman WALSH. How does it happen that the porter will get $35 a month on the tourist cars and then—

Mr. HUNGERFORD (interrupting). They started in on that rate in the beginning some years ago and it has been carried on ever since.

Chairman WALSH. Why does the porter get more on the tourist car than he does on the standard?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, the service is not—I imagine the service is not as attractive to the porter as the standard car. When they established the service I imagine that is the reason. I had nothing to do with fixing the rates, so I am not altogether clear on it, but I would venture the opinion that that is the reason.

Chairman WALSH. What is the reason?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That the service is not as attractive.

Chairman WALSH. Well, why not?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, it is not the same class of travel.

Chairman WALSH. Well, is it because the people that ride on tourist cars will probably not be so likely to pay them enough to subsist on a round trip that way? Do you have that in mind?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Why, I imagine the tips—I imagine they are not tipped as liberally on the tourist cars as on the standard cars; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is that considered by the company in giving a man $35 if he is going on a tourist car and an inexperienced porter at that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, as I say, I don't know what they had in mind when they established that rate. It has been in effect so long, and I had nothing to do with it, that I can not say what they had in mind.

Chairman WALSH. You do not know, then, as general manager, why they pay an inexperienced porter $35 for running on a tourist car and an experienced man $27.50, is it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents.

Chairman WALSH. For running on a standard car?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Nothing more than I have stated; no.

Chairman WALSH. Nothing more than you have stated?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. What increase of salary is given to porters who have been with the company, say, for 5 or 10 years? Are there increases given to the porters who have run 5 or 10 years.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; there is not. They were given an increase in 1913 if they had been with the company for 15 years, in service.

Chairman WALSH. Fifteen years in the company's service?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And there is no rule with respect to that then?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No. You mean no graduated scale?

Chairman WALSH. No graduated scale.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. How are old and faithful porters rewarded for their services?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Rewarded by their—they receive the benefit of these—we carry the time of these old men that are sick, and then we have the pension when they reach the period when they become incapacitated.

Chairman WALSH. How many porters would you say you hire in a year to keep the equipment up to 6,500?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't think at the present time we are hiring. We haven't got 6,500, so far as that goes, just now.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I have that number in mind—

Mr. HUNGERFORD (interrupting). Yes; that is generally when things are normal.

Chairman WALSH. When things are normal?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, when things are normal and you have 6,500 porters—when 6,500 porters are necessary for your service, how many would you say you hire?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, that varies. It varies with the conditions. Some years we have extraordinary—what we call convention years, when there is an unusual number of extra cars outside of the regular business. That necessitates taking up a large number of men. And seasons of business depression come on, and as matters have been running, pretty regularly, we don't have to take on so many. Of course, we take the men up, and if we are unable to give them regular employment they will drop out, and generally are ready to come back, though, whenever the business is such that we can provide work for them.

Chairman WALSH. I would like for you, please, Mr. Hungerford, to take a normal year—select what you think yourself is a normal year—when you need 6,500, and give us, if possible, an estimate of how many porters are hired per year to keep your equipment up to the 6,500.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I said I could not give you that.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it? "

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I could not.

Chairman WALSH. How many porters in a normal year would you discharge?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, that I could not tell you.

Chairman WALSH. Do you hire in a normal year as many as 13,000 men to keep up the equipment to 6,500?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Thirteen thousand?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; in the United States?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I would say that I never heard of that. I would say that we did not.

Chairman WALSH. Then please make your own estimate. Do you have as many as 10,000 to keep up your equipment of 6,500?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I can tell you what we did in 1913 and 1914. They were abnormal years—but not in normal years.

Chairman WALSH. Give us 1913, what you call a normal year.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. You said normal year, and I explained to you that some years business fluctuates so heavily that it is abnormal and calls for the taking up of a large number of additional men; 1913 and 1914 were those years.

Chairman WALSH. 1913—was 1912 a normal year?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. More so than 1913 and 1914.

Chairman WALSH. And 1911?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; more so; 1913 and 1914—the latter part of 1913 and the fore part of 1914 were the largest in the history of the company, due largely to this extraordinary movement that we had. I will say that your commission has asked for the number of people employed and discharged in 1913 and in 1914, and I have those figures here.

Chairman WALSH. Please give us those figures.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. But I say, when you asked me, you asked me as to the normal condition; and I could not say that.

Chairman WALSH. Well, we will leave that for the moment and just take 1913 and 1914.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes. In 1913 there were 735 conductors employed, and in 1913 we employed 2,335 porters.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what was your equipment—was that the average number that you ran that year, 6,500?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; I think that is where we got up to, about—yes; I think that is the period it was about 6,500. Yes; I think we went over 6,500; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, give me the other year, please.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. In 1914 there were 485 conductors employed and 1,130 porters employed.

Chairman WALSH. That figure again, please—that last one.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The porters?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; just the porters.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; in 1914 there were 1,130 porters employed. You have 1913, I think?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. I wish you would state the duties of a Pullman porter. First, how long before the train leaves does the porter report for duty?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, that varies at different points; depends on the conditions. He has to report down in the yards and get his car in condition and shape; count his linen. We aim to have them report as late as possible and get his car in shape. On cars departing late at night they have to report earlier than when they leave in the afternoon, because it is necessary to have the berths made down before the train is backed to the station.

Chairman WALSH. So in some instances they are required to be there at 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening, although the train does not leave until 11 or 12 o'clock?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, that is—no; I don't think to that extent; no.

Chairman WALSH. Well, what do you mean?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Probably have to come down there about 11 o'clock; and I will say there have been some instances brought to my notice where they were required to report earlier than seemed to be necessary. I think it has been corrected. I hope so.

Chairman WALSH. Was that some rather widespread usage? You said you hoped so. Who knows whether it has been corrected or not?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I know it was taken up, and it should be corrected. There was no widespread grievance; it simply came to my attention that it was being done.

Chairman WALSH. You would say accidentally?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes—incidentally. I should call it.

Chairman WALSH. Incidentally?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did some one report it to you?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; it came to my attention, I think, about—I think a porter reported it to me.

Chairman WALSH. Came to your office?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; he dropped me a communication.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall any others of like nature that you received, or only recall that one?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I recall that one, and I inquired into the general proposition.

Chairman WALSH. What are the duties of the porters as to receiving passengers and taking up Pullman tickets for their cars before the trains start out?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is a duty which is generally attended to by the conductor. There are some cases where the porters are in charge, and of course then they perform the conductor's duties.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would state, please, as concisely as you can, the duties of Pullman porters.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The duties generally are to wait on the passengers, make down the beds, put them up, and keep the car in condition.

Chairman WALSH. What time does the conductor retire at night?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That varies on different lines. As a general proposition he retires at 3 o'clock in the morning.

Chairman WALSH. And what time does the porter retire?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. He retires before.

Chairman WALSH. Any fixed time?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; that depends on the service conditions. It is generally arranged by the district superintendent to meet the local conditions as they present themselves.

Chairman WALSH. Take, for instance, this district here we are in now. What time does the porter—what time is he supposed to retire?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. You are talking about—as I say, as a general proposition on all lines they retire along 11.30 to 12 o'clock.

Chairman WALSH. Eleven thirty?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And required to get up at 3 o'clock?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And are they permitted to retire after 3 o'clock?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. Or sleep during the day?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; the porters are not to sleep during the daytime—not supposed to.

Chairman WALSH. Is it considered an offense if he does sleep in the daytime?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, no—we know they sleep in the daytime.

Chairman WALSH. How many of them sleep in the daytime?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; it is an offense if they deliberately go off watch at night when they are supposed to be guarding the car and take a blanket and a pillow and go to sleep; but ordinary napping isn't considered an offense.

Chairman WALSH. What are their instructions? Are their instructions to remain awake or are they told they can go to sleep in the daytime?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It is arranged in some runs where they can go to sleep, but I don't know of any instructions that say they can sit down in the car and go to sleep when they feel like it. There are no instructions that they can go to sleep, but we do know they go to sleep.

Chairman WALSH. Well, take a long run, first, Mr. Hungerford, a run leaving here on the Santa Fe—

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Going to Los Angeles, or San Francisco is it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, they go through.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what time does the porter retire, going out of here?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I would have to have our district superintendent tell you that. As I say, the runs vary—the hours of relief vary according to the runs and conditions presented; and they are arranged by the district superintendents. I could not pretend to keep in my mind the details of the runs of each line of this company. We can have our superintendents—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Have you ever ridden—I should just like to get for our information—have you ever ridden on that road?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. On the Santa Fe?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what time did the porter go to bed and what time did he get up, if you know, going between here—say, between here and Los Angeles?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I should judge he went on about that schedule retired about 11 o'clock, and arose about 4 o'clock—that is, on the standard cars.

Chairman WALSH. That is at 4 instead of 3?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I will correct that and call it 3.

Chairman WALSH. Call it 3?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Three o'clock is what I should have said.

Chairman WALSH. Now, during the night I believe you said he is required to guard the car?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That is, to protect the lives and property of the passengers?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, to guard the car; yes.

Chairman WALSH. And is he required to polish the shoes of the passengers while they are sleeping?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Permitted to do so.

Chairman WALSH. Isn't he required to do so?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, he is not required to do it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; that is not an obligation, but he is permitted to do that.

Chairman WALSH. Well, suppose a passenger's shoes were not polished, and he complained to the conductor about it, what action would be taken?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. He would probably ask the porter why he didn't do it or why he discriminated against that passenger.

Chairman WALSH. And suppose the porter just took the notion it was beneath his dignity to polish shoes, and he did not polish them at all; what would you do?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, we have not had that case. They are generally very careful about that.

Chairman WALSH. They are careful about that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. But, as a matter of fact, they are supposed to polish the shoes of the passengers while they are asleep?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. And if he did not do it he would be discharged?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, I can not say as to that, because it has not been up. I don't know that I ever heard of that proposition.

Chairman WALSH. The idea is that if they polish them they expect to get something for it, and you know they will be polished?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; exactly.

Chairman WALSH. And the passengers know they will be polished?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Who furnishes the polish to the porters?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They do.

Chairman WALSH. They furnish their own polish?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what is their duty with respect to awakening passengers who are required to leave the car during the night?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't get the purport of that.

Chairman WALSH. Is it part of their duty to awaken passengers during the time the conductor is asleep?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. If he wants to leave the train during the time the conductor is asleep?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Surely.

Chairman WALSH. That is his sole duty, and it is his duty, also imposed upon the porter of calling the passengers in the morning in time for breakfast, and so on?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; he is provided with a small card for that purpose.

Chairman WALSH. He has a call card and keeps that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Does he have any instructions to keep the car sanitary and to disinfect any articles used by persons presumed to be suffering with contagious diseases?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes. There is a rule governing that, and regulations issued by our doctor of sanitation for the purpose of protecting the public in every way.

Chairman WALSH. And the porter is supposed to familiarize himself with that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And to carry out the instructions with reference to keeping the car sanitary and disinfecting articles belonging to the passengers who are affected—

Mr. HUNGERFORD (interrupting). Well, I don't know about disinfecting articles belonging to the passengers. He is supposed to keep the car sanitary, but I don't know about disinfecting articles belonging to the passengers.

Chairman WALSH. Well, the articles belonging to the company that are used by the passengers who are ill?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. He is supposed to keep any linen separate and away from any soiled linen.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have any disinfecting methods?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Each car is provided with a disinfectant, formaldehyde or some disinfectant that is approved by the Government sanitary officials; as much is on the car as may be necessary to keep the car in sanitary condition, and it is his duty to see that it is done. The conductor has charge to see that the porter does that.

Chairman WALSH. Is he required to report damage to the car or equipment?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is turned in by the conductor, usually, if he is running in charge he would do that. If anything is wrong on a car he is supposed to report it to the conductor, and it is noted on what we call inspection report.

Chairman WALSH. Is he required to report to the conductor anything he notices in regard to damage to the car or equipment in the first instance?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. He is expected to do so; he is required to do so by the regulations.

Chairman WALSH. What reports are required to be made by the porters, if any, to the company? What regular reports are required to be made by the porters to the company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, they do not make any regular report that I recall, unless they are operating in charge.

Chairman WALSH. What are the requirements of the porters with reference to their personal apparel, as to having their uniform brushed and in good condition, and as to wearing clean linen?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are required to present a cleanly and neat appearance.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider $27.50 a month sufficient for a man who is required to discharge all of the duties you have detailed here and to follow the rules referred to?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. All I can say is that you can get all the men you require to do that work for that pay.

Chairman WALSH. Does your company consider the general effect on the country—the social effect—of employing men for $27.50 a month; do they consider the entire basis for employing them at that sum, the fact that they can be gotten for that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That would be a matter that I would not be called upon to give advice upon. I probably would not be consulted about it, so I do not think that I am qualified to answer it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think these men can live on $27.50 a month?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I don't know about the $27.50 by itself. Of course I presume you are leading up to the point that they must live partly on the perquisites that go with the position.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you first whether or not—do you investigate for the company, in any way, the living conditions and the surroundings of your men?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Not to any great extent.

Chairman WALSH. Sir?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Not to any great extent; no.

Chairman WALSH. And what was your answer to my question; do you consider that a man can live on $27.50 a month. Was it "no"?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I did not say that; I do not know what they can live on.

Chairman WALSH. You do not know but what a man, at the present cost of living, could live on $27.50 a month, and perform the duties your porters are required to perform?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. He may do that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; he might do that.

Chairman WALSH. What is the history of the tipping system that is practiced on the cars of the Pullman Co.? Give it in your own way; how did it grow up?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know how it did grow up. I do not think it can be claimed that the company instigated tipping; it is not local to the Pullman Co. It is general; it prevails everywhere. I do think, if there is anybody that is entitled to a tip for expert service rendered, the porter is entitled to it as much as anybody. I think some of them are artists.

Chairman WALSH. Does that form the standard, the artistic development of the men, for the wages paid?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Because he takes advantage of the opportunity and does a great deal more than some white people to advance himself.

Chairman WALSH. State whether or not it is a fact that the tipping of Pullman porters became general before the practice of tipping other persons engaged in personal service became widespread.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Do you mean to ask, did it originate with the Pullman Co.?

Chairman WALSH. I did not say that; but was it not general among the Pullman porters before the practice of tipping other persons engaged in personal service became widespread?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Tipping was going on long before I entered the service of the company, and I can not answer that.

Chairman WALSH. Does the Pullman Co. expect the public to pay the difference between the salaries of porters and the amount required by the porters to enable them and their families to live decently and in comfort?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; it does not; it simply accepts the conditions as it finds them. If the conditions change, I suppose they would have to change conditions to meet them.

Chairman WALSH. You have 6,000 porters at work, and you stated in one year you hired 2,300 and in another year you hired 1,100?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And there men are all colored, I believe, all the porters?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What do you think of the social aspect of taking 6,500 men that are obviously a practically new race, struggling up from slavery, and putting them in a position, from practice or otherwise, where they are compelled not to stand independently as men, but to depend on receiving gratuities from another race for their livelihood; what do you think of that is a social matter in a country such as we have here?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, as I say, I don't believe—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). A little louder, please.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not feel that I am competent to answer that question.

Chairman WALSH. Is it good for the men; that is, for them becoming independent citizens and a unit in the Republic?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think they are advancing very rapidly, and I think the Pullman Co. offers the colored man as good an opportunity for advancement as any other concern to-day.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think that the present wage system of the Pullman Co. places that company directly in the position of receiving gratuities itself from the public, Mr. Hungerford?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. You say you do not?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not; no.

Chairman WALSH. What is the average mileage covered by the Pullman conductors during a month?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I can not give you that, because we do not handle our men by mileage; they are operated by days.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; I could not. Your commission asked for those figures and I asked our auditor to prepare them, and he said it would take him some time to do so; when he will have them I do not know. We do not handle our men on the mileage basis.

Chairman WALSH. Would that answer also apply to the Pullman porters?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir; it would.

Chairman WALSH. In what instances does the Pullman Co. deduct amounts from the salaries of the conductors, if any?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not know of any deductions in the conductors' salaries; the payments are all by the month.

Chairman WALSH. Of both porters and conductors?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Not altogether; they are paid according to the regulation. As a general proposition we pay by the month. Some States require payment semimonthly, and one requires weekly payments.

Chairman WALSH. Take the cases where they are paid by the month, are sums deducted during periods of illness? Are they paid when they are ill? Is there any rule about that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are paid for the period they work.

Chairman WALSH. During the month?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. If they are sick, are deductions made for the time they are sick?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are paid for the time they work; yes.

Chairman WALSH. And the porters, also?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Are they paid for the time they lose on account of accidents or changes in the schedule?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; they are paid in case of accident; and about illness, as I said before, we have a relief system under which men are paid for the time they are absent on account of illness.

Chairman WALSH. Please briefly state what that relief system is; do the conductors or porters pay anything into that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They do not.

Chairman WALSH. What are they allowed during the time they are ill; what are the conductors allowed during periods that they are ill, and what are the porters allowed during similar periods?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Take a man 5 years in the service, he is allowed half rate for the first 14 days; if he is gone for more than that time up to a month, he is paid for a month full rate, and for another month at half rate. If he has been 10 years in the service, that is doubled, and it is 2 months on full rate, and 2 months on half rate; a 20-year man he gets 3, and then it would be time to consider if he is not permanently incapacitated, and ought not to be put on the pension list.

Chairman WALSH. How about the porters?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It is the same way with the porters.

Chairman WALSH. Let me get at that again; if a porter is sick for one-half a month, he gets what?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. For the first 14 days he would get half pay.

Chairman WALSH. That is half pay for the 14 days, you mean?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. If he was getting $27.50 a month, he would get one-fourth of that for the 14 days? Let's see if I understand. Suppose he was getting $30 a month, if he was sick 14 days he would get $7.50?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And when he passed the 14 days?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. If he went on to a month, then he is paid for the month. The first 14 days we pay one-half rate, and if he goes on longer than that we pay the full month. If we paid full rate for a shorter time, we would find a considerable amount of sickness.

Chairman WALSH. That is, they would falsify?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is, they would lay off when they otherwise might not.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the reason that method was adopted?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How long would he be carried on the sick list?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I said, if he was a five-year man he would be carried one month at full pay and one month at half pay.

Chairman WALSH. If he was a five-year man, what then?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It would be a matter of special consideration. We do not generally undertake to insure against sickness. The men as they enter the service of the company; they have to be there a while to be entitled to that.

Chairman WALSH. During the five years, he would not have the benefit of it at all, as I understand?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. When he gets up to four years, it is taken up and he would probably be considered a five-year man. Those matters are presented to the pension board, and it becomes a matter of special consideration under five years.

Chairman WALSH. After two months, what provision is made, if any?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. None.

Chairman WALSH. So it just applies to temporary illnesses?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir; illnesses that long.

Chairman WALSH. And during the first five years, if a porter or conductor is sick, a deduction is made for the time he is ill and they do not draw any pension?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. What is the average length of time that porters remain in your service; that is, if you know?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I think we have those figures somewhere; I have not them with me, but, as I said before, over half of them have been over five years in the service. We have a great many that are over 15 years, and some 25, but the number I have not here; I do not seem to have that here.

Chairman WALSH. What, if any, compensation system does the company have for compensating conductors and porters injured in the discharge of their duties?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We carry their time. The compensation and relief is about the same. We carry the time of the men injured in the service.

Chairman WALSH. I did not catch that.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We carry the time of the men injured in the service. The compensation and relief are about the same; they are synonymous terms. But the compensation of men injured in the service applies to any, whether one or two years, while the relief applies to men who have been five years in the service—have performed some service for the company for that length of time. It is the policy of the company to carry the time of the men if they are injured, and, if away from home, to pay their hospital expenses, and in the case of death to bring them back and pay whatever expenses are necessary. We have very little of that, fortunately.

Chairman WALSH. If I understand you, then, if a man is injured in your service you carry him on the pay roll without any deductions?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. For how long?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That would depend; I could not say how long that would be done. I know we have carried a man injured on the Pennsylvania Limited—I think we carried him some six months and paid his expenses.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any rule about it? I do not care for any specific instances.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Our regulation is to carry their time. If it came to a matter outside of the usual custom or regulations, it would be taken up with the pension board and handled on its merits.

Chairman WALSH. And if a man is killed in the service what is done?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We have his body prepared and brought back home, or whatever disposition is made with his relatives or kin, whatever they may suggest.

Chairman WALSH. Does the company pay anything to employees as compensation for injuries in States where no compensation laws are in force other than what you have mentioned?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; we carry the time of our men injured on duty.

Chairman WALSH. Does the company pay compensation under the workmen's compensation act of New York, Illinois, or say other States that have them?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I believe we do in New York.

Chairman WALSH. Do you in Illinois?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't recall what was done about that.

Chairman WALSH. Do you in California?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I can not say about those States.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know about any of the other States?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; we handle our men independently of compensation laws. I know our men injured in New York State are better taken care of than under the compensation law, because that does not carry any time for the first two weeks, as I recall it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you pay compensation under the workmen's compensation law in New York?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I believe we do.

Chairman WALSH. Why do you not, if you do not, pay it in other States?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I can not answer that question. Those matters are handled in our legal department, with our assistant general superintendent, when I was away last summer, and I can not tell.

Chairman WALSH. Who is assistant general superintendent?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Mr. Bostwick.

Chairman WALSH. What system of pensions have you in your company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We all retire at 70 years of age—all employees. Any employee that is 20 years in the service, who becomes incapacitated, regardless of his age, is eligible for retirement with pension.

Chairman WALSH. So that he must have been in the service of the company 20 years, and have reached the age of 70?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, no; I say, any man in the service who becomes incapacitated, they are retired. There is a fixed retirement when they become 70 years of age, excepting when a special relief or change is made by the president.

Chairman WALSH. Does the 20-year term of service have to intervene in the case of incapacity?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir. Anybody who has been 20 years in the service of the company, who may become incapacitated, is eligible for retirement.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe as briefly as you can the machinery for granting these pensions; have you a pension board?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir; we have a regular pension board, appointed by the president, to whom these cases are presented.

Chairman WALSH. Just describe how that works.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Any employee who is eligible for the pension who, I say, has been 20 years in the service of the company, fills out a regular blank; a regular blank is filled out and submitted to the board for it to act upon.

Chairman WALSH. Describe the formation of the board.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The board consists of Mr. Kramer—

Chairman WALSH. First, is it appointed by the president?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many members has it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think five.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a requirement that the members of that board shall be connected with the company, or have any particular connection with the company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. You mean requirement of the board?

Chairman WALSH. No; rules of your company; what limitation is placed upon the appointment of the members of this board, if any?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. None whatever.

Chairman WALSH. What is that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know of any; the president makes the appointments.

Chairman WALSH. And so far as the rules of the company are concerned, he could appoint an outsider on the pension board?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know whether he could or not, but I don't imagine he would consider doing that.

Chairman WALSH. He has full authority to appoint the men?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Who compose the present board? Give the personnel of the present members of the board.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Mr. Richmond Dean, vice president; Le Roy Kramer, vice president; Mr. L. S. Taylor, treasurer; William Hough, auditor; and myself. We have a regular pamphlet in regard to that which I would be glad to submit to you.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would please do so.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I have not it with me, but will submit it to the commission.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would, please.

(The witness subsequently submitted, in printed form, a pamphlet entitled "The Pullman Company Pension Plan," adopted by the board of directors Nov. 13, 1913. Effective Jan. 1, 1914.)

Chairman WALSH. In the rules governing the payment of pensions the company provides that the board of pensions may withhold or entirely discontinue pensions in cases of misconduct or acts contrary to the interests of the company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think there is some such provision, but this record will show that.

Chairman WALSH. Have the car-service employees any voice in the management of the pension fund—the porters and conductors?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They have not; they do not contribute to it in any way; it is all voluntary.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you if it is a fact—do you consider that conductors and porters running from Chicago to the Pacific coast points get enough rest en route to enable them to remain in good physical condition and be alert and be efficient?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not. The company is not a believer in these long runs and would like to break them, and have broken some of them; but there is a strong opposition on the part of the roads and the men themselves to our action in that respect. I think in the interests of the service. The shorter runs are advisable. We have broken a great many and are continuing to do so as we can work the matter around with the roads; it is my idea that they should all be broken.

Chairman WALSH. You do not think that they get sufficient rest?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not think, in the interest of the service, those long runs are desirable from any standpoint.

Chairman WALSH. You say the men want them. Have they petitioned the company for them?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Whenever the long runs have been broken they have taken it up. Take the Santa Fe runs. The Los Angeles Limited was broken five or six years ago to Albuquerque, and they said they did not like it and would prefer to run through, and the railroad companies were insistent that they should run through. I should imagine if we attempt to break the run of the Overland Limited and the Los Angeles Limited we would be met with vigorous opposition on the part of the roads; but my feeling is, and also that of the company, that it would be advisable in the interests of the service to break them up.

Chairman WALSH. What is the policy of the company as to employing married men in its car-service department? Do you prefer single or married men?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We have no specific regulation in that respect. The men that are in charge of that part of the work—that is, getting new men—are supposed to get men qualified for the service, but there is no requirement as to a man being married or single.

Chairman WALSH. Are your car-service employees trainmen in the meaning of the Federal statute limiting hours of work to 16?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Do I consider them as trainmen?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. Is it true that the company discontinued the practice of equipping its car-service men with lanterns in order to evade this law, or made any other change in the rules and regulations for this purpose?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; that is not so. We have discontinued the use of lanterns very largely, because they are not necessary; their use is not necessary, because the cars are now generally electric lighted, the steps and all. There seems to be no need for lanterns.

Chairman WALSH. Your company took no steps or made no change in its equipment or rules so as not to come within the provisions of that statute?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; I never heard of that before.

Chairman WALSH. Are porters during the hours of duty responsible for thefts committed in the cars?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not know that they are responsible; they are supposed to guard the cars sufficiently. It is understood that they can not always prevent sneak thieves in the guise of passengers from working.

Chairman WALSH. What action is taken as to disciplining them, or anything else, in the case of loss?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It is all settled on its merits entirely, whether the employees on the car were alert and attentive and performing their duty, the duties incumbent on them.

Chairman WALSH. What is the rule of the company as to the duty of conductors in regard to calling at the office of the district superintendent for mail? You might describe the system by which the company's mail is transported, if you will.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, the mail is carried in bags between the various centers. As a general proposition that mail is delivered to the cars and to the conductors, and we have men to receive it. There may be instances where the conductor takes the mail bag to the superintendent's office or may call for it. That may be so; I think likely it is.

Chairman WALSH. You have no personal information about that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We have no fixed rules about it. Our receiving cashier's office and the district superintendent's office are generally all one, and if the man has to go to the receiving cashier's office to report he usually carries the mail.

Chairman WALSH. How does the average mileage for Pullman conductors and porters compare with the average mileage for passenger railroad conductors, brakemen, and flagmen? Have you ever compared that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Is it not a fact that passenger trainmen average not more than 5,000 or 5,500 miles as against 10,000 to 20,000 miles a month for Pullman conductors and porters?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I should say that those latter figures were rather excessive, but, as I said to you, we have not made calculations of the number of miles made by the car-service employees, so I would not assume to say about that.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it, or give the commission an idea as to that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; I could not.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any connection between the Continental Casualty Co. or the Fidelity Casualty Co. and the Pullman Co.?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; I can safely say there is not.

Chairman WALSH. Does the Pullman Co. have any arrangement with either of these casualty companies by which car-service employees are urged to take out insurance in them?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not know that they are urged to take out insurance. There are three companies, the Travelers' Insurance Co. and two casualty companies who have submitted a form of insurance that we think should be acceptable to the men, and the Pullman Co. makes the collections, at the request of the men, for them. We had previously considerable trouble with insurance companies taking advantage of technicalities in case of injury, and the matter was gone into, and these companies who submitted the best form were urged to take out insurance with the men, where the company makes the collections. The men can insure in any company they like, but the Pullman Co. will only make collections at the request of the men and attend to the detail work on the part of such insurance companies that submit a form that the Pullman Co. thinks fully protects its men.

Chairman WALSH. And those three companies for which these deductions are made are the Travelers' Insurance Co., the Continental Casualty Co., and the Fidelity Casualty Co.?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And these deductions are made on orders from the individual men?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; on orders from the men themselves.

Chairman WALSH. By what means do the porters, what means are provided for the porters getting their meals while on the road?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We have no special provisions for that. Of course, they have to get their meals the same way the passengers do. The passengers are always afforded an opportunity to get their meals, and the porters have the same opportunity.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any special arrangement made by the company, or endeavored to be made by the company, to have their meals provided at reduced rates?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Please state what that is.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. There are a good many roads maintaining a rate of 25 cents to our employees, and there are others that charge a higher percentage. We have taken it up with a number of the roads and suggested to them that in view of the fact they are so insistent on the men running through with their cars that they ought to be liberal with the men in regard to furnishing them meals in the dining car. A number of them have taken the position that they could not afford our men any better arrangement than they do their own, but it has been pointed out to them that their own men usually run between division points only and get their meals at home. We do not feel that the railroad companies ought to go to any expense to feed our men, yet they should give them as low a rate as they can, and come out whole on the dining cars on the through trains, since they are so insistent on the men running through, and a number of them have done so in the last year.

Chairman WALSH. Have you a copy of your book of rules here, Mr. Hungerford?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly submit it to us?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; here it is. [Witness hands book to Chairman Walsh.]

Chairman WALSH. I notice on page 8 of this book of rules, under the heading "General instructions," "Employees are subordinate to all officers of the company and to railroad companies as train employees." To what extent are conductors and porters under the orders of the railway company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is covered generally in our agreement with the roads, that our men are subordinate to their employees and governed by their train regulations. The train conductor is in charge of the train; he is the only man who has any police jurisdiction.

Chairman WALSH. How far may railroad officers or employees go in reprimanding, reporting, suspending, or discharging Pullman employees?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They have nothing whatever to do with that. Some of the agreements with the roads provide that if the men do not perform their duties in a manner satisfactory to the railroads the roads can request their withdrawal from their service; that is about as far as it goes.

Chairman WALSH. That would include—that would be the entire interpretation of that rule, so far as the railroad companies are concerned? As a matter of fact, no employee of a railroad company in charge of a train otherwise has any disciplinary control over your employees?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Nothing more than would affect the operation of the train during that time; they can not discipline them.

Chairman WALSH. Take page 8 of the book of rules, and I find this [reads]:

"The company requires of employees the very best service possible under all conditions. A system of discipline by record has been adopted, whereby suspension from duty with loss of pay is avoided. Employees guilty of any dereliction of duty or breach of rules will be disciplined by reprimand or book suspension. An individual record is kept of each employee, and every case of carelessness, negligence, or improper conduct will be noted on this record and the usual penalty assessed and entered on the books, the employee continuing at work without loss of pay. A perfect record is one against which no unfavorable entry has been made. A clear record is one where the unfavorable entries have been extinguished by subsequent good service. In each case where reprimand or suspension is noted against an employee he will be notified. No suspension will be made for less than 5 days or more than 15 days.

"1. A reprimand will be extinguished by three months' clear record.

"2. Five days' suspension will be extinguished by six months' clear record.

"3. Ten days' suspension will be extinguished by nine months' clear record.

"4. Fifteen days' suspension will be extinguished by one year's clear record.

"When an employee's record shows frequent delinquencies and a number of penalties assessed against him, his case will be given special consideration, and dismissal may follow on account of unsatisfactory service in general, although no single offense might warrant such extreme action.

"Disloyalty, dishonesty, intemperance, immorality, insubordination, incompetency, discourtesy to passengers, gross carelessness, false reports, or concealing facts concerning investigations, etc., will subject the offender to dismissal."

I wish you would please describe what is meant by "disloyalty."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I should say a man that was working against the company's interests was disloyal.

Chairman WALSH. In what way? •

Mr. HUNGERFORD. In any way.

Chairman WALSH. Would the joining of a labor union constitute disloyalty?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It would not in my opinion.

Chairman WALSH. On page 10 of the book of rules we find this [reading]:

"Conductors have jurisdiction over all employees and cars; and unless they require those under them to properly perform their duty they will be subject to the same entry as the offenders, except where they are unable to exact obedience, and report to that effect is promptly made to the district superintendent."

State how frequently that is enforced by your company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The conductor is the captain of the ship and in charge of the porter. If the porter is grossly negligent and the conductor allows it to go on and makes no attempt to correct it, he is equally responsible with the porter.

Chairman WALSH. You have another rule on page 10 as follows [reading]:

"Employees must be neat and cleanly in personal appearance; wear clean linen and have clothing brushed and shoes polished. The uniforms designated by the company must be worn on duty, but not when off duty. The uniforms must be made by tailors selected by the company, and no deviation in style or specifications will be permitted. White collars must always be worn."

What inspection of uniforms is made?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Uniforms are inspected, I think, monthly; it may be quarterly; at the time they are paid. • •

Chairman WALSH. By whom?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. By the district superintendent.

Chairman WALSH. Who pays for the uniforms worn by conductors and porters?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The company furnishes free uniforms when they are 10 years in the service; before that time they pay for them themselves.

Chairman WALSH. Who pays for the white jackets worn by the porters?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The company.

Chairman WALSH. Who are the tailors selected by the company to make these uniforms?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are made now by Marshall Field & Co., in Chicago.
Chairman WALSH. How long have the employees of the Pullman Co. been required to purchase uniforms of that firm?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not know just how long that has been; I could not tell you; it is 8 or 10 years.

Chairman WALSH. Who makes the contract for the price?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Our director of purchases.

Chairman WALSH. What is the price of a porter's uniform?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think about $24; $22, I think, for the porter's uniform and the conductor's uniform about $24, I should judge.

Chairman WALSH. How much for the conductor's uniform?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. About $24; I won't give you that as an exact figure; but that is my recollection; $24.50, I think.

Chairman WALSH. Of the conductor's?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please submit that to us definitely?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

(Immediately after recess of this day's hearings, Mr. Hungerford read into his testimony the information requested.)

Chairman WALSH. Has the firm of Marshall Field & Co. any connection directly or indirectly with the Pullman Co.?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Not that I know of.

Chairman WALSH. The employees of the Pullman Co. get these direct from Marshall Field & Co., do they?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They have tailors all over the country—that is, they appoint men to take the measurements and then they put in application at the district office for the uniforms and they come to them direct in that way.

Chairman WALSH. Has there been any change made in the price of the uniforms in the last few years?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir; they are getting cheaper; they are cheaper this year than last year to a considerable extent.

Chairman WALSH. How much cheaper?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I can't tell that.

Chairman WALSH. Who makes the arrangements?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The director of purchases.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know how much profit Marshall Field & Co. make out of the uniforms?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Do the men have anything to say about the price of them whatever?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They do not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are they furnished to the men at cost price?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are furnished at a low price considering the quality of the goods; I think they are very reasonable.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are they furnished to the men at the same price that they are furnished to the Pullman Co.?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We do not have anything to do with that at all; the agreement is made with Marshall Field & Co. as to the price they will make the uniforms for, but the Pullman Co. does not have anything to do with receiving any of the revenue.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. All of the profit that is made goes to Marshall Field & Co.?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. None goes to your company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. On page 16, of the book of rules, the company says [reading]:

"Employees must not in any manner endeavor to influence passengers in favor of any hotel or route of travel, and must not under any circumstances criticize the railway service."

Is that rule enforced?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It is, or we have our attention called to it strongly by the roads; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is it not—is it or is it not a fact that Pullman conductors are expected by the company officials to receive favors from hotels, such as reduced rates or free lodging?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; it used to be pretty general that railroad and Pullman conductors were sought after by hotels, but those conditions are changed.

Chairman WALSH. Are Pullman-car porters exposed to the danger of infection or contagion through waiting on and making up the berths of travelers suffering from tuberculosis and other contagious and infectious diseases?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The fact that we do not have any trouble of that kind shows they are not. Our director of sanitation has gone into that, and the record shows they are not. Our cars are kept in a strictly sanitary condition; and, the fact is, that the conditions to the traveler on our cars are better usually than in his own home. Some people who ride in our cars are sick, but if the regulations are observed there is no danger of contamination.

Chairman WALSH. You have made an investigation of that through your sanitary department and that is what you have found?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, on page 20 of the book of rules is this [reads]:

"Conductors when off duty should occupy an upper berth whenever available."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What is the purpose of that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The purpose of that is that we had a great many complaints on the part of passengers of their inability to secure lower berths, claiming that the conductors withheld them for their own personal benefit. It came up in the railroad commission and an open statement was made that our conductors were holding back lower berths for their own use. There are also many cases where space is reserved by passengers to be taken up en route. Other passengers would get on the cars and make application for a berth and would be told that none were available; some berths were reserved to be taken up down the line, and in some of those cases the passengers who reserved the berths en route would not get on. This happened often after the passengers had retired, and in the morning they would see our conductor coming out of the berth, and, of course, under those circumstances no argument would satisfy the passenger that that berth was not held out by the conductor for his own special benefit. And the complaints were numerous—many through commissions—and finally this plan was devised of requiring the conductors to occupy upper berths. An upper berth is just as comfortable as a lower berth; in fact, more so; it is farther away from the trucks and the air is purer. It may be a little less convenient to retire into and out of, but in that respect we felt that the traveling public should be given the advantage of the lower berths in order that no complaints of the kind mentioned might be made.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., a recess was taken by the commission until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. Is Mr. Hungerford present? Please take the chair, Mr. Hungerford.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I wish to submit to the commission the pension plan.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. And in regard to the conductors' uniforms.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I was to give you correct data on that. I find that the conductors' winter uniform is $19.75, porters' $18.75; summers $18.25 for conductors and $17.75 for porters. I would add in that connection that the company pays the same price for the uniforms that it furnishes those over 10 years in the service as is paid by the men in service a shorter period. That, I think, answers your question.

Chairman WALSH. Yes. I think you are mistaken about the porters' winter rate. I was going to call your attention to the error, because the prices submitted to us by Marshall Field shows that to have been $18.50 instead of $18.75. Might you not also be mistaken about that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No—which—$18.50 was the conductors' for the last summer—1914—but not for the coming summer; $18.25 for the coming summer.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, I see; it has been changed.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Since last summer.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

9570 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Chairman WALSH. Has the winter uniform of the porters been changed from $18.50 to $18.75? Marshall Field gave us $18.50 for porters' winter uniforms, and you give $18.75.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I give that as the purchasing agent has furnished it at the present time, for the winter of 1914 and 1915—conductors' uniform $19.75 and porters' $18.75.

Chairman WALSH. Now, we have had submitted to us the general instructions given by you. It is short, and I will read it to you—under date of September 1, 1914. [Reads:]

"For employees on cars of the Pullman Co.: The instructions contained herein are for the general guidance of car employees, but should not be enforced in such manner as to defeat the object intended, namely, to popularize the service. The most important feature to be observed at all times is to satisfy and please passengers. In case they request privileges that can not be legally or properly granted they should be politely informed that the request falls outside of your jurisdiction. Never say that the rules of the company prevent compliance. L. S. Hungerford, general superintendent."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; now, you gave that general order?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, one offense for which I notice you suspend for 15 days is "discourtesy, indifference, or inattention to passengers." Is that correct?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think so. Our chief service inspector will bring over a list of suspensions himself. I think that is correct.

Chairman WALSH. Now, your men are not allowed to explain to the passenger that a request is in violation of the company's rules?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I wish to explain that. New men entering the service, and others who lack—who show a lack of disposition to comply with the requests of passengers frequently cloak themselves under the statement that it is against the rules. I saw a case here the other day; a passenger came down from St. Paul and wanted an extra blanket, and the porter told him he couldn't furnish it, because it was against the rules. Well, of course, that irritated the passenger very much. There was nothing against any rules about it to prohibit him from furnishing a blanket, if he did so; but you will find that, especially in the case of new conductors and new porters, they will use that expression that it is against the rules; and the expression "against the rules" is very offensive to passengers. That is the whole situation in regard to that.

Chairman WALSH. Well, as between the man and the company, does not that shift the responsibility to a certain extent upon the man, if he is not allowed to say that it is in violation of the rules of the company—

Mr. HUNGERFORD (interrupting). Well, he can say he is not permitted to do so.

Chairman WALSH. Well, the request you give him is to tell them that it falls entirely outside of his jurisdiction?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; that ought to cover it.

Chairman WALSH. And he must never say that it is in violation of a rule of the company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, he is to avoid that expression, which is offensive to passengers.

Chairman WALSH. Well, but you give this specifically, do you not; or you did when you began September 1: "Never say that the rules of the company prevent compliance."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you suspend a man 15 days for discourtesy, indifference, or inattention to passengers.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, when a difficulty arises, or a contention arises, and the passenger claims that a porter, for instance, is discourteous, how do you arrive at it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We arrive at it by hearing what the employee has to say.

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Do you take the passenger's word or the porter's word?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Every case is determined on its merits, just as far as we are able to do so. It is the district superintendent who investigates these matters directly with the employee—and the inspector, too—and he reports to the chief service inspector. We do know that some passengers are irritable and exaggerate, and an employee is given every possible opportunity—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD (continuing). That, of course, inattention or discourtesy to passengers is where they are striking cases. Just a mere form of reply off-hand is not considered as treatment with discourtesy.

Chairman WALSH. Well, how was it determined? Suppose the porter, now, says he was not discourteous and the passenger says he was, and that his manner was offensive, and so forth. How do you determine that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It is determined very largely, of course, by what the porter has to say, and the passenger. Then, if they do not agree—the statements, as far as possible—in a great many or a majority of the cases, where the complaints are made of inattention or discourtesy to the passenger, we have somebody to call on the passenger and explain to the passenger what the employee has to say and to endeavor to reconcile the statements. The passenger is generally pretty fair and not inclined to exaggerate, I think. We give the man every opportunity. We call on the passenger for reasons to straighten out these things and satisfy both sides.

Chairman WALSH. You send an inspector to the passenger?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, we send an inspector or a representative. If it happens to be a representative who is more convenient we have him go out.

Chairman WALSH. Now, is this book suspension carried by the calendar year?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. A man does not have his credits or demerits go over into the following year?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; it is the calendar year.

Chairman WALSH. The calendar year. So, if a 15 days' suspension is inflicted, now, any time after July it is impossible—

Mr. HUNGERFORD (interrupting). It debars him.

Chairman WALSH. It debars him?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well—

Chairman WALSH. And, likewise, 5 days' suspension inflicted upon him after the 1st of September.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; yes—well, that would be after six months; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, the five days' suspensions are inflicted for the following reasons, are they not [reading]:

“Failure to promptly answer bells. Failure to turn lights after passengers have retired, and at proper time in the morning. Failure to wipe handrailings and sweep platforms”——

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't think that is the list; I can get that list, if you will excuse me.

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir; I wish you would check it off, if you please, because we don't want to take time of the other witnesses on it.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, that is right.

Chairman WALSH. And we want to have as many matters undisputed as possible. That is issued, I believe by Mr. J. A. Davis, chief service inspector.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Take No. 3 [reading]:

“Failure to wipe handrailings and sweep platforms.

“Failure to solicit buffet orders.

“Failure to properly ventilate and keep”——

Right there; are they supposed to solicit orders from the buffet from all passengers?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are where we have buffets; but they are so few now that is hardly of much moment. Our buffet service is getting less and less all the time, but where we have it they are supposed to go around and pass the menu card to the passengers.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the solicitation that is meant, to pass menu cards?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Does that include buffets in which alcoholic drinks are served?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; it does not. It means the buffet cars where the passengers get light lunch.

Chairman WALSH. Don't solicit or serve alcoholic liquors?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; not at all on our sleepers or parlor cars.

Chairman WALSH [reading]:

“Failure to properly ventilate and keep cars in cleanly and tidy condition.

“Failure to properly answer name when posted.

“Failure to wire or incorrectly wire vacant space messages.

"Failure to supervise porter's work and correct same where necessary.
 "Failure to supervise buffet service.
 "Failure to comply with rules relative to method of awakening passengers.
 "Failure to comply with rules relative to reporting accidents, losses, or unusual incidents.
 "Failure to fasten safety cords."
 "Failure to report duplicate sales whether passenger is taken care of or not.
 "Failure to search cars at destination.
 "Failure to check and sign for linen in accordance with regulations.
 "Failure to be out for reception of passengers and assisting passengers with baggage.
 "Failure to issue call cards or slips and call passengers as directed.
 "Failure to request passengers to step to end of aisle to be brushed.
 "Failure to maintain quiet at night or allowing passengers to be disturbed by loud talking, slamming doors, making unnecessary noises in handling berths at night, or putting them away at too early an hour in the morning.
 "Failure in using accommodations and equipment other than those designated.
 "Visiting between employees while en route."

Now, are there any others not mentioned there, and for which five days' suspension is inflicted?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is all I know of; but of course there may be some others come up. Discipline would be governed on a line with this; but that is supposed to cover it.

Chairman WALSH. Are the district superintendents supposed or authorized to issue rules from time to time—specific rules?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are not supposed to; no.

Chairman WALSH. Well, are they permitted to?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; they are not permitted.

Chairman WALSH. When they do issue them, are reports required to be made to the general manager?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are not supposed to issue them—not expected to issue them—not permitted to issue them.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention been called to the publications of the district superintendent at Omaha, entitled "Things to Do" and "Things Not to Do."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; it was not.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. R. C. Johnson is your district superintendent there at Omaha?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. District superintendent; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Under date of August 17, 1914, have you noticed two publications of Mr. Johnson to conductors and porters entitled "Things to Do" and "Things Not to Do"?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; I have not.

Chairman WALSH. And whose attention—what individual's attention should such a matter as that be called to?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I don't know what the contents of this so-called document are, but I assume it is a résumé of the features that are covered by the general regulations.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I will call your attention to them a little later. I wondered if you knew.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you inflict 10 days' suspension for failure to turn in lost property. [Reads:]

"Smoking on duty.

"Sleeping on duty.

"Leaving cars unguarded."

That is correct, is it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is according to this—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Well, now, that third paragraph says, "Sleeping on duty."

Would that apply to a porter sleeping through the night or day?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, that would apply to his sleeping on duty; when he is supposed to be on duty; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, is it a fact that you find it frequently an impossibility with these men to keep them awake on these long runs where they have only three or four hours per night sleep?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I would not say—on these long runs it is difficult for them. I do know that they sleep, and we do know that it is countenanced.

Chairman WALSH. Now, when it comes to discretion under that rule 3 as to whether or not they shall inflict that 10 days' book suspension on them, who exercises that discretion?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Those cases are all passed on by the chief service inspector, who does, I think, give full consideration to all the conditions of the service.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that that rule is waived in connection with a long trip like to Los Angeles and to San Francisco?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, it is where the circumstances seem to make it clear that the man is doing his best—to the best of his ability.

Chairman WALSH. Would it be waived in any case where a man has three or four hours per night of sleep; would it be inflicted in such cases?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I say it would be passed upon in accordance with the circumstances in each case.

Chairman WALSH. Well, suppose the circumstance was that the second day out the man had retired at 11.30 and resumed duty at 3 o'clock that night, and the next night he retired at 12 o'clock and resumed duty at 3 o'clock, that second night, and was then found asleep in the body of the car, or in the smoking room or some place the next day, would it be inflicted?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It would not be inflicted unless it was a willful violation of the instructions. If he had just fallen asleep—now, if he was supposed to be on duty at that time and went to a drawing room and went to sleep he would probably be suspended; if he took his pillow and a blanket and left the car unguarded and went off duty when he was supposed to be on duty willfully, he should probably and would probably have the penalty inflicted.

Chairman WALSH. Then it is not inflicted when the porter is found asleep in the car, but not with a blanket or pillow?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, it is not inflicted if he drops off to sleep at all; if he just drops off asleep, no.

Chairman WALSH. Now, the 15 days' book suspension is inflicted for the following derelictions [reading]:

"Discourtesy, indifference, or inattention to passengers.

"Soliciting fees from passengers.

"Drinking on duty.

"Carrying passengers beyond destination or getting short of destination."

That is correct, is it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is correct.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I will call your attention in this circular from Mr. Johnson of "Things to Do." [Reading:]

"Always wear clean linen.

"Have your uniform cleaned and pressed up.

"Keep your shoes polished.

"Black passengers' shoes."

Have you seen that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't remember that.

Chairman WALSH. The last is "black passengers' shoes."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, this is to the porters, I assume?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; this is to the porters.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH (reading):

"Dust passengers' clothing, asking them to step aside.

"Call out stations when trains enter terminal stations or enroute.

"Tender pillows to passengers.

"Tender hat bags to lady passengers.

"Keep washstands cleaned up.

"Keep cuspidors cleaned up.

"Keep your lockers cleaned up, clean papers on the shelves.

"Keep clean jackets with full set of buttons.

"Have lanterns lighted at night and in position for immediate use.

"Keep soiled linen picked up.

"Keep plenty of clean towels in the racks.

"Keep whisk brooms in the toilet room.

"Fasten all berth safety cords.

"Light your night lamps when other lights are lighted.

"Answer bells promptly.

"Answer questions of all passengers courteously and intelligently.

9574 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

"Courtesy is the best thing you can give passengers and have in stock. It costs you the least and gives best results.

"Wipe window sills often.

"Guard cars closely.

"Assist passengers with ladder when getting in and out of upper berths.

"Make up berths promptly at night.

"Be out at all stations where trains stop to receive passengers and assist with the baggage.

"Properly regulate ventilation.

"Look closely after the regulation of the Garland ventilators, those marked 'V' to be opened, or part of them closed, as the weather will indicate.

"Temperature of your cars should be regulated by steam in the winter months, to be introduced through the inlet valve in the heater room.

"Keep combs and brushes clean.

"Turn out lights promptly after passengers have retired.

"Have equipment box supplied at all times at home station.

"Keep uniform coats buttoned while on duty.

"Read station order books, sign them, and be sure you understand the orders and comply with them. If not understood, call at the office for an explanation.

"Render all assistance possible to lady passengers and children, especially old ladies and men and sick passengers.

"Wire vacancies according to local instructions.

"Use camp stool at the end of aisle at night to guard cars.

"Pull down all window shades at night when starting to make down berths.

"Wipe deflectors and screens before placing them in windows and lockers.

"Conductors to sleep in upper berths; porters in smoking room or upper No. 1."

Do you recognize all those as being taken from—

Mr. HUNGERFORD (interrupting). Those are our general practice; I don't know as to whether they are all rules, but they are in general practice.

Chairman WALSH. Now, are district superintendents authorized to issue such matters as that Omaha general circular?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think he would be as long as they did not conflict with any existing instruction.

Chairman WALSH (reading):

"Read rules and instructions contained in front pages of rate book.

"Comply with instructions relative to signing back of linen cards when placed in charge of car after counting linen.

"Always carry screw driver in equipment box.

"Comply with the instructions relative to turning over cash with reports when en route, deposit en route slip form.

"Comply with the instructions relative to checking equipment on car to know, if asked, whether car has full stock or not.

"Place all portiere curtains in upper berth No. 2; not in lockers.

"When on cars having electric lights, see that the connector up at front end of car is taken down and put in locker.

"Comply with instructions as to handling breakfast call cards.

"Keep working office diagrams worked up at all times to indicate just what space is occupied; see order posted June 2, 1914."

Now, there are a number of others. Has your attention ever been called to such publication by district superintendents other than the Omaha man?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, I don't know; but, as I say, there is nothing there that differs from our general instructions. He had that printed out instead of giving it to the employees verbally. That is about the only difference.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That saves him, I suppose, some labor.

Chairman WALSH. That is within the general scope of his authority?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; within the general scope.

Chairman WALSH. And of your instructions to him?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, would a failure to do any of the things mentioned in there call for discipline on the suspension book?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, they would come in—many of those—some of them, I should think—I can not carry them all in my mind—would come in under reprimand. I don't see any there that would come in under suspension.

Chairman WALSH. To whom do the charges of dereliction go directly? Suppose a man was accused, now, of having committed any of those things, who would get the information?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Come to the chief service inspector.
Chairman WALSH. The district superintendent would not have anything to do with it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It would be taken up with him then to take up with the employee. Or it might come to the district superintendent first and then to the chief service inspector. But perhaps it would come to the chief service inspector himself—that is, if it was on a complaint made by some outside person.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I will read the "Things Not to Do," and I would like you to follow them closely, because I am going to follow that with the same question, as to whether or not the doing of any of these things would subject a man to discipline or not. [Reading:]

- "To conductors and porters:
- "Don't chew tobacco.
- "Don't chew gum on duty.
- "Don't carry a toothpick in your mouth on duty.
- "Don't smoke or drink on duty.
- "Don't wear soiled linen.
- "Don't sleep on duty.
- "Don't wear jackets with one button.
- "Don't visit with porters in other cars.
- "Don't leave cars unguarded at any time day or night.
- "Don't handle woodwork with bare hands, always use a cloth.
- "Don't wear a towel or handkerchief around your neck instead of a collar.
- "Don't lean against car when receiving passengers or standing at a terminal station; stand up straight—look pleasant.
- "Don't make unnecessary noise in moving about the cars at night.
- "Don't step on seats or arm rests when making up or putting away berths.
- "Don't wear a frown on your face.
- "Don't use low and vulgar language.
- "Don't enter drawingroom, stateroom, or ladies' toilet room before knocking.
- "Don't put away berths at an early hour in the morning, awakening other passengers.
- "Don't put away berths in the morning before asking passengers to do so.
- "Don't accept effects from passengers and put them in lockers for safe-keeping.
- "Don't leave stepladder in passageway or aisle of car at night after it has been used. Place it in the locker.
- "Don't leave grips and suit cases in the aisles or passageway if they can possibly be located under the berths.
- "Don't ask to be relieved at foreign stations, unless in case of sickness.
- "Don't go to sleep after conductors have called you, and it is the end of your time for sleeping. Be wide-awake and on watch.
- "Don't leave porter's drinking glass in the public washrooms.
- "Don't loop smoking car portiere curtains up over the hat hooks.
- "Don't carry yourselves in such a manner as to impress the passengers that you own the cars, and that it is a privilege to allow them to ride. Remember we are all servants of the public and as such must comply with the public's wishes at all times; that is, be courteous and gentlemanly, answering questions intelligently and promptly, doing everything in your power to please the public.
- "Don't use towels for display purposes in wash rooms, pillow slips for hat bags, or sheets to cover passengers' clothing or sofas in rooms.
- "Don't slam vestibule or trap doors.
- "Don't wear uniform coat or overcoat over white jackets.
- "Don't put ice in coolers with bare hands.
- "Don't use any but the company's buckets inside of cars.
- "Don't put scrib buckets inside of ice buckets in lockers.
- "Don't use the linen as dust cloths.
- "Don't fail to frequently wipe woodwork on passageway partitions and white toilets.
- "Don't call to each other when passing on trains.
- "If it is necessary to blacken shoes in the smoking room, on account of objections of passengers to the noise, never take more than one pair at a time.
- "Don't tell passengers we will stay here any certain length of time, but when asked how long train stops, say train is due to leave at a certain time, whatever the schedule calls for."

Now, is the failure or is the doing of any of those things I have read—does the doing of any of those things call for reprimand or book suspension?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The majority of them would be just simply ordinary cautions and asking them to correct them and not make mistakes. There are a few in there that would come under the head of penalties. I notice you had one, drinking while on duty.

Chairman WALSH. So that is quite a great deal different from the first one? The "Don'ts" are quite a great deal different from the "Do's"?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. From the "Do's"; yes, sir. Those mentioned there, visiting in the cars and drinking on duty, they would come in under the list of penalties; but the great majority of them are just simply for the information of the porters, as I said before, instead of telling them verbally what to do, which is better; he has got a labor-saving device and got it printed out.

Chairman WALSH. Has there been much complaint to your office as to the handling of your men both as to compensation and as to the rules as to whether or not that is the general situation?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; there is not.

Chairman WALSH. Would you be the person generally in charge to observe those things and look into them if they were wrong?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I would; I would know about them.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the record of the Public Utility Commission of California in which the chairman of that commission notified Mr. Dean that they had failed to find one person in the State or one employee in the State of California that did not have objection to their treatment or their wages in some manner?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I read that statement; yes.

Chairman WALSH. You read that statement? That was Mr. Eshleman, the present lieutenant governor of California.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, Mr. Eshleman.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I want to call your attention to certain letters that we have received. This inquiry was placed upon our list of inquiries in response to a very wide-spread demand from the employees. We have taken a number of letters which seems to epitomize what might be grievances and an ascertainment was made first of that person as to whether he was a bona fide employee of the Pullman Co., and it was afterwards checked by our investigators with other conductors to see whether the complaints extended generally throughout the service, or depended upon one person who might have some particular grievance. So I am going to read you a few of those letters that were picked out for your comment, so you may have a fair opportunity to comment upon them.

I will say this, that the fact—I believe I have stated—was established that these were bona fide employees, and in all instances they have asked to have their names withheld, which we have uniformly granted in all industries that we have investigated. [Reading:]

"October 15, 1914. I understand the railroads in the State of Illinois pay their employees in full, and I can see no reason why the Pullman Co. could not do the same, as it means a great deal to the employees. On a recent pay day in Los Angeles a bulletin was posted over the cashier's window, stating the company had failed to mail the pay checks in Chicago and they would arrive a day late. Therefore, pay day would be on the 16th instead of the 15th of the month. A great many who were on long runs were inconvenienced by such an error, as they were obliged to make an extra trip before receiving their check. If each district in the different States made out their own pay checks, as they did in Colorado before they ceased to comply with the law, there would be no errors of this kind to discommode employees."

The thing I principally desire to ask you is, is it a fact that your company at first complied with the semimonthly pay law of Colorado and afterwards ceased to do so?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It is my understanding and recollection that the law included and had reference to shop employees. We paid our shopmen, I think, semimonthly. I don't know whether we ever paid the car employees semimonthly or not. I don't know of any change being made, because, as I stated this morning, we are governed in that matter by the regulations of the State. I don't know of any change having been made in the date of pay of the car employees.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, this same man says [reading]:

"I will give you a brief outline of some of the sleeping quarters furnished by the company in different districts."

Now, do I understand that these sleeping quarters are furnished to employees who have worked a certain length of time for your company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; they are furnished free to all men who run into those places.

Chairman WALSH. Irrespective of length of service?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH (reading): "Omaha. Three double-deck beds in the basement of the Pullman office. Very damp during the rainy period. No bath."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I take exceptions to that. It is a building that is on the side of a hill, so that is the ground floor on that side of the building. It is not a basement. The doors open right outside and the windows open right outside. I don't know whether they have any bath, but there is running water in the rooms.

Chairman WALSH (reading): "Denver. A small room in the depot with six single beds. Impossible to sleep on account of noise. No bath."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know the date of that. Of course, at the time the building was being remodeled—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). This is October 15, 1914.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I think probably that is so. They remodeled the station in Denver. We have office quarters in the building at Denver as well as sleeping quarters for the men, and they remodeled the building and forced us out of the second floor and down onto the first floor at the time. They are back there now, I think.

Chairman WALSH. What are the sleeping arrangements?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They have a room there on the second floor that is reported to me as being ample.

Chairman WALSH. How many beds?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I could not say.

Chairman WALSH. How large is it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I could not say.

Chairman WALSH (reading): "Salt Lake City. Two small rooms in the Wellington Hotel. Four single beds in one room. Chairs in the other. Employees have access to public bath. This building was condemned several years ago. Employees are assigned to a certain bed, and their hours of rest are limited so as to accommodate the overflow which comes in at different hours during the day and night."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I know nothing about that. We have our inspectors going around to these various places, and they are supposed to inspect on these different things in addition to service inspection. We have no reports come from there that their quarters are not satisfactory.

Chairman WALSH (reading): "Ogden. An old dismantled Pullman car which occupies a very prominent place in the midst of the coach and freight yard and where the switch engines are very busy day and night, rendering it almost impossible to sleep. For several years this car was without a toilet. No bath."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, it has a toilet and bath now. It is a car that is out of date, to be sure; but the same beds we furnish our passengers with. It has electric light, toilet, and bath now. It is off to one side and away from the station, but it is very convenient; more so than it would be in town.

Chairman WALSH (reading): "Portland. Two rooms in the Hoyt Hotel, which are very comfortable. Employees have access to public bath.

"San Francisco. A room is furnished across the bay at Oakland Mole near the depot. It has three double-deck beds. No bath."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; they have had that car there. It has been fixed up and remodeled especially for them, I understand, and makes very satisfactory arrangements. It is on the pier. It is cool in the summer time, and it has steam heat, hot and cold water all the time, and is equipped with bath and is partitioned off for a reception room and for a place for their baggage, and I believe it has proven pretty satisfactory. They did have a room at one time in the building, but we have taken that for the receiving cashier's office since.

Chairman WALSH (reading): "There are no sleeping quarters furnished in San Francisco proper, as the company knows a great many of the hotels furnish the employees with sleeping quarters without charge."

Are you aware that is the practice in San Francisco?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I am aware of the fact that our lines do not terminate in San Francisco, but at Oakland, and there is where our sleeping quarters are provided. That is where they take their trains and where they leave them.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that many of the hotels of San Francisco do furnish your employees with sleeping quarters without charge?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know whether they do or not. We have provided them with quarters at Oakland Mole, where the line terminates.

Chairman WALSH (reading): "Los Angeles. No sleeping quarters are furnished. The company depends upon the different hotels to take care of employees."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We have no sleeping room there, for that matter was taken up some years ago, and we found that the hotels there were taking care of the men, and they would not accept the quarters we provided for them, and so we have not provided for them. We have been extending the use of these rooms as the circumstances seem to require.

Chairman WALSH (reading): "El Paso. Two rooms in the basement of an apartment house. Each room has four single beds. Employees have access to public bath. These rooms are very insanitary, as the wind blows almost constantly, and I have seen the beds and bathtubs covered with dust and dirt from the streets. Employees are obliged to sleep in these quarters, as they can not afford to pay the prices asked at the hotels."

Is that the situation at El Paso?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It is not the situation to-day. I guess it is, so far as the wind blowing. I think it blows there all the time. That has been my experience when I was on the Rio Grande.

Chairman WALSH. Well, leave out the elements.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The quarters have been changed. They are in the Hotel Raymond, I think, that is the name of it. They are satisfactory, so far as I know, now.

Chairman WALSH. So that has been eliminated?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And this gentleman says [reading]:

"I have slept in all of the above-mentioned quarters, and I am frank to say that I have not drawn on my imagination in the least. If anything, I have not pictured them quite as bad as they really are."

"The company does not furnish a call boy for conductors as the railroads do; but we are expected to be on the job, and protect our run regardless of how little sleep we have had. If we should oversleep and miss our run we are penalized in some way. In Ogden and El Paso in the sleeping quarters an alarm clock is used to awaken us in time for our train, but this is very annoying for the men who are still sleeping."

Do you have any comment to make on that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I have not any comment to make on it.

Chairman WALSH. Well, is it correct?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know anything about it. I don't know whether they have a call boy. They are supposed to report to their runs in time to take them out.

Chairman WALSH. You have no call boy such as the railroads have?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; not that I know of.

Chairman WALSH. Sir?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And those smaller details, about the alarm clock, you have no personal knowledge about?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Now, this is another letter, November 12, submitting an inclosed list of porters, and he says [reading]:

"I have questioned each man in the inclosed list of porters and find the company deducts a certain amount from their checks each month. I find it varies from 40 cents to $1.50, and in a few cases even more than $1.50. Most of the porters claim they do not offer a complaint, as their time and car fare would equal the amount deducted, as they would be compelled to go to the storeroom in the yards, then to their superintendent, and from the superintendent to the general office in the Pullman Building before their claim would be adjusted."

Does that honestly portray the situation?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; I think not. I don't know. He talks about the Pullman Building. That has reference to some Chicago porter.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; this is from Chicago.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The linen situation is one that is a pretty embarrassing situation all around. The linen is turned over to the porter, and it is part of his duties to handle that linen. I feel, though, that if he has exercised the proper care to count his linen that he will have no trouble. The fact of the matter is that they do not count their linen. Our shortage last year, what we call porters' shortage of linen, amounted to $178,000. That is in addition to our condemnation and shortage by theft, which would run it up to $300,000. Of that $178,000 there was about 17 per cent collected from the porters, more in the line of discipline for failure on their part to comply with the instructions to count the linen and to exercise due care. We have had that matter under consideration for some time, and the company is now doing away with these porters' collections—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). With what?

Mr. HUNGERFORD (continuing). Doing away with them and make them apply the disciplinary penalty for failure to carry out instructions when they do not do it. I do not think the porters would like it any better. I don't think that the porters generally feel that they are unjustly treated in regard to the collection of linen. There must be some restraint and some restriction put on the handling of the linen to prevent its promiscuous loss. As I say, now it runs up to $178,000 a year. It is part of the duties of the employee to take that linen and to take care of it and to exercise due care over it. They are given the benefit of every doubt in any mistake—the carrying off of linen by passengers—if there is any mistake made by the linen counter, they note it on their card that they sign, and they are excused. The trouble is they sign these receipt cards for the linen without counting it.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, as to that part of this complaint, that is, that they do not offer their complaint, as their time and carfare would equal the amount deducted, as they would be compelled to go to the storeroom in the yards, then to their superintendent, and from the superintendent to the general office in the Pullman Building before their claim could be adjusted. Is that correct?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know of any necessity for their coming to the Pullman Building. The fact of the matter is that they can't come to the Pullman Building in all these other districts, and I don't think they do here. I don't know why they should.

Chairman WALSH. Suppose the superintendent refused to adjust it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They can come to the Pullman Building; anybody can, to appeal.

Chairman WALSH. That is probably what is meant here.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It may; coming there to appeal; but I don't think the conscientious man who has tried to handle his linen in a proper manner has any occasion to appeal. I do not think that circumstance has arisen. I do feel that the superintendents are giving the men every possible consideration in regard to those linen shortages. It is a sort of moral effect. If we did not have anything; if we had it wide open, I don't know where our linen would go to.

Chairman WALSH. Here is a letter dated September 28, 1914 [reading]:

"I feel justified in saying the employees would not object to rules under favorable working conditions, but a conductor or porter who is on the road three or four consecutive days and night, as many of them are, with but four hours' rest each night, will find it a hard task to live up to some of them, especially the one "Don't sleep on duty." When the berths are all made down at night the conductors and porters are required to spend the hours of watch sitting on a camp stool at the end of the aisle night after night.

"I will outline briefly some things that a conductor and porter are required to do:

"They have to purchase their own pencils; indelible only permissible.

"Porters are required to furnish the shoe polish used upon the passengers' shoes.

"Both conductors and porters are required to appear in full uniform before the superintendent or one of his subordinates and be inspected each month before they get their check. If they pass O. K., they receive a slip signed by the inspector which they present to the cashier and receive their check. If they do not pass O. K., they are ordered to purchase a new uniform or some part of one, as the case may be. In this event they are given a slip with the amount to be deducted from their check by the cashier, who pays them the difference, if any."

They do purchase their own pencils, do they, and are required to purchase a certain kind?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I guess they furnish the pencils. We do not furnish them as a general practice. We do not furnish the pencils; no.

Chairman WALSH. And are they required to use indelible pencils?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know anything that calls for an indelible pencil; but it may be so.

Chairman WALSH. You have already mentioned that the policy is true as to the requirement about the uniform?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir; they are required to have their uniforms inspected each month. It is necessary that that should be done. We formerly had a great many complaints as to the appearance of the employees on the cars. A good many porters, especially new porters, would borrow the uniforms from one to another, so we had to have some fixed time to have them inspected. I don't know about making the deductions. I don't think that is so. They were probably told it would be necessary to get whatever uniform was necessary if the one they had on was not presentable.

Chairman WALSH. You think it is not the custom of the inspector, then, to give a slip to the inspected employee with the amount to be deducted from the check by the cashier?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't think so; he can't give him the amount to be deducted by the cashier; no. I will say that that is not right. He gives them a check to the cashier that everything is O. K., but I don't think he gives him a check to deduct the amount from the pay roll unless he authorizes it.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I will call your attention to another matter that was beyond my understanding there. I don't see how they could determine what was necessary to be deducted, but I will read you another paragraph to which I wish you would pay particular attention. It is about that semimonthly pay law. He says [reading]:

"Some States have a law compelling them to pay their employees semimonthly, which is very satisfactory to employees. Colorado was the first to pass this law, in 1897, and the company complied with it until the shops were moved from Denver to Richmond, Cal. This diminished the pay roll considerably. The company, since that time, have been paying but once per month. The shops were moved in 1910. This law is still in effect in Colorado, but no employees there question the company's right in not complying with State law. The checks are made out in Chicago and forwarded to the different districts to distribute them. By paying monthly it means that the company retains one-half a month's salary from each employee, which is quite an item, as they have several thousand."

What comment have you to make upon that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I think I covered that this morning about as fully as I am able to do.

Chairman WALSH. Who could tell—from your headquarters—what the practice is in the State of Colorado in reference to the semimonthly pay law?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, the legal department would have to pass on that.

Chairman WALSH. Well, what are the facts?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know that there is any such thing; but, as I said this morning, my impression is that we paid at the shops semimonthly. I don't think at that time the car employees were paid semimonthly. I don't think there has been any change. I don't know of any law there now requiring them to be paid semimonthly. If so, I do not know why we are not complying with it.

Chairman WALSH. He follows [reading]:

"The company is opposed to any organization among their employees, as it leaves them free to dictate to the man and to add any additional work they see fit for them to do.

"Conductors who operate between Los Angeles and Salt Lake City for the San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake road lay over in Salt Lake City from 6.30 a. m. until 11.50 p. m. They report for duty at 8. p. m., and at 9 p. m. the passengers are allowed to go aboard the sleepers. The tickets, both railroad and Pullman, are lifted at the depot gate as the passengers pass through. Ever since the road has been in operation, which is about nine years, or at least ever since this rule of taking up tickets at the gate was passed, the Pullman conductor lifted the Pullman tickets and an agent furnished by the railroad lifted the railroad tickets. August 31 of this year the ticket agent's position was abolished. This saves the railroad company $115 per month. Instead of ordering the train conductor who was due out on this train to report at 9 p. m. and collect the railroad tickets they requested the Pullman Co. to have their conductor lift the railroad tickets along with the Pullman tickets. This means extra work for the Pullman conductor without additional pay."

Is that correct?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It may be so. It is done in some places. We have been requested by the railroads to have our conductors, where the cars are placed in the station early for the reception of passengers for a train that departs late at night, to take up the railroad transportation at the time the Pullman transportation is lifted. It does not make any great amount of work. The passengers come dragging along one at a time and we asked them to put the railroad transportation in the envelope with the Pullman transportation; and it does not incur any great hardship on the men to speak of. As I say, it may be the case in some places and it may be so at Salt Lake.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "If the men were organized as the trainmen are, they would object to the above-mentioned as well as numerous other things they are compelled to do.

"On many roads they are compelled to handle the railroad tickets while on train. I will mention two roads, the Santa Fe and Pennsylvania."

Leaving out the conclusion as to the men being organized, you have already spoken about that, unless you care to say something—

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do they handle the railroad tickets on those roads?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They do on the Pennsylvania, and I think on most of the trains of the Santa Fe.

Chairman WALSH. We have a communication dated November 25, 1914, regarding insurance, as follows [reading]:

"Regarding insurance I will say the company urges their employees to carry insurance either in the Continental Casualty Co. or the Fidelity & Casualty Co., and the payments are deducted each month from the employees' checks. The company has printed circular letters pertaining to the indorsement of the above insurance companies, which they send out to the different districts. They formerly posted bulletins in the bulletin books referring to the indorsement of said insurance companies.

"When a conductor enters the service of the company he is introduced to an insurance solicitor by some one in the office, usually the instructor, and between the two the conductor is influenced to accept the policy. The report is current that either the Pullman Co. is interested in the above insurance companies or else the officials are carrying a free policy at the expense of the men."

I wish—what do you say as to that? Have you anything further than that your attention was directed to those two companies?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think not; no. I think that covers it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any instance in which any of the officials are furnished favors from those companies for soliciting insurance from the men?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. And do you know whether or not any of the officials of the Pullman Co. are interested as stockholders, directors, or managers in the insurance companies?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think I can safely say they are not.

Chairman WALSH. Now, another paragraph [reading]:

"I wish to call your attention to the manner in which conductors are being treated at the present time. In a number of the districts there is a surplus of extra men, due principally to the different railroads taking off some of their trains. In Los Angeles there are 19 extra conductors. The company, without consulting the men who are entitled to hold their regular run, assigned an extra man to the different runs, causing all men to lay over an extra day at their own station each trip, which they do not get pay for. Each man loses from three to five days each month. The company wishes to hold these men, as a great many trains will be put back later. I am sure if the old men were consulted in the matter they would be willing to meet the company halfway. The above method is not practiced by railroads proper among their employees."

What do you say as to that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, about all I know is that there have been a number of trains taken off to the Pacific coast, as there have been all over the country; and there are unfortunately. I am sorry to say, quite a number of men on the extra list. I presume it is the desire of the district superintendents to keep the men employed and to divide the work as much as possible among all of those men, as stated there, to let them share alike. Certainly that would avoid the statement that there would be any discrimination exercised. I don't know that to be a fact, but I should say that possibly that is correct. I know there are quite a number of men that are on the extra list—more than we should like to see.

Chairman WALSH. This gentleman says [reading]:

"For your further information I am writing you concerning conductors who operate on second sections of Santa Fe trains No. 3, Chicago to Los Angeles. I am told there is a second section on an average of every other day to take care of the extra travel to California at this time of year. As this train is a limited train, conductors are paid $100 a month regardless of time and service. The equipment of these trains is returned to Chicago deadhead shortly after their arrival at Los Angeles. The conductors and porters are due to return with the deadhead equipment, but the conductor is held in Los Angeles a couple of days and returned in service on a train of inferior class, either No. 2 or No. 10, and the conductor who is due to return on No. 2 or No. 10 is returned on the deadhead equipment on his arrival in Los Angeles. This is a saving of $10 per month in salary to the Pullman Co., as the limited conductor would be entitled to pay at the rate of $100 per month if he was allowed to return in charge of the deadhead equipment. But owing to the change his pay is reduced from that of a limited conductor to whatever his time and service entitle him to. This applies to his eastbound trip."

Is that correct?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't understand how that can come in. In the first place I don't understand that for deadheading they are entitled to that rate of pay at all. If they have been receiving that, it seems to me they have got more than they are entitled to. This limited rate of pay is paid for a special high-class service. If he goes out on an extra train—take a man that has a grade, say, of $90 or $95 a month and he goes out on that limited train, I should say he was only entitled to that limited rate of pay for the time he was employed on that. Now, if they have been allowing him the extra deadheading, I think probably he has got more than he is entitled to, and he can not complain if he don't get it every time. I don't know anything about it.

Chairman WALSH. He says further [reading]:

"Conductors on various occasions have asked the company when lost articles are turned in, and the company has kept same a reasonable length of time and are satisfied the owners will not claim them, that they be turned over to the porter who found same; but the company refused to do this. It would at least be an incentive to porters who are very much underpaid to turn in all lost articles promptly."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't see his point.

Chairman WALSH. Why, the point seems to be made by this gentleman that after a certain length of time lost articles should be given to the porter who found them. Is there any time at which the company disposes of articles for cash?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, we have the greatest quantity of stuff turned in from the cars you can imagine. If we could get rid of the lost and found properties, we could save quite a number of clerks—one at least in each district. Night-shirts and articles like that and clothing are turned over to the hospital at the end of a month. Rubbers and old stuff not sanitary are thrown away. Anything of any value is kept for a matter of two months before it is taken out of the district, waiting for a claimant.

Chairman WALSH. I did not catch it.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I say, waiting for a claimant. We endeavor to locate the owner just as far as it is possible to do it, and we are very careful about that. At the end of two months any articles of value are forwarded to the chief service inspector, who turns them over to the treasurer to be held. A receipt is always given to the employee for any articles of value. I will say that we have had very few articles of any value that we have not been able to locate. In regard to turning them over to the porter or to the employee who found them, it is pretty hard to tell when they will be claimed. I know I was in communication here only last week with some man out in Arizona, who was asking for a very valuable pair of field glasses turned in last October, and those were held out in Los Angeles, or the district office, wherever it was, for two months, the train conductor who was due out on this train to report at 9 p. m. and collect the railroad tickets they requested the Pullman Co. to have their conductor lift the railroad tickets along with the Pullman tickets. This means extra work for the Pullman conductor without additional pay."

Is that correct?

What do you say as to that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, about all I know is that there have been a number of trains taken off to the Pacific coast, as there have been all over the country; the next morning. From the 21 hours then he is given only 4 hours sleep. This run is covered by three train conductors, an average of 10 hours for each man. And the conductor from Denver to Salida, 215 miles, with a night over coming back to Denver, gets about the same lay-over at home that the Pullman conductor gets having gone to Ogden and return, 1,500 miles."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I guess that is ancient history. You say that is in 1913?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Your Mr. West advised us there was some complaint about that, so I looked it up. There is no Denver-Ogden run now. It is Denver and Salt Lake.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. West called your attention to this particular matter?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes. So I say I looked that up; but I do not pretend to keep all these runs in my head. But I can tell—they leave Denver about 8 o'clock in the morning and get to Salt Lake City the next noon, and remain there until the next afternoon, and leave there about 4 o'clock and get back to Denver the next evening, and lay over 36 hours—lay over at Denver, and 24 hours the other way, and they have their relief at night. Besides I don't consider it a long, hard run. Our service duties are different—entirely different from those of the train conductor. The train conductor has got the responsibility of the train on his hands, and our conductors have got about the same as the passengers.

Chairman WALSH. About the same as the passengers?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; it is no harder to make the trip than for the passengers. You know that a great deal of our travel is made for pleasure travel. The service is entirely different from that of the train conductor. He has got to be on his feet all the time and got the responsibility on his hands.

Chairman WALSH. Well, is that taken into consideration in the compensation given to the conductors as well as the hours they are required to remain on service; that is, that pleasure in traveling?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, not at all. We take the condition as we find it. As I said before, I don't believe, notwithstanding all that is said about the rate of pay, take a young man with a future before him, with the present condition, present arrangements of pay, has any better opportunity with any other concern than with the Pullman Co. The opportunity is worth something to the man. And his measure of success depends very largely on the energy and the conscientious effort that he himself makes. Ninety per cent of our officers in the various districts and assistants are—were Pullman conductors. They have risen from the ranks, and there are always vacancies for those who show aptitude to fill them. And even if we did not take advantage of these men that are making conscientious effort, they are running and coming into contact with men of affairs all the time. We have cases of men who will be advanced to other businesses and other lines—a great many men—men of prominence, I will say, have stated that they have ridden with a certain conductor and asked about him and have taken him away from us. A great many men to-day, who formerly have been Pullman conductors—I don't think the experience with them has ever been any detriment to them.

Chairman WALSH. He continues* (reading):

"We have a short run on the Union Pacific, Denver to Cheyenne, 107 miles. The Pullman conductor gets up at 5.30 o'clock a. m., leaving Denver at 7.20 a. m., and gets back to Denver at 6.05 p. m., it being 7 p. m. when he gets away from his train and home. He works every day; no holidays; no Sundays; and no vacations; 13½ hours every day. He has no opportunity to interest himself in the duties of citizenship and is almost a stranger to his family. The train conductor on this same run is given every fifth day off."

Is that correct?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. What is the date of that letter?

Chairman WALSH. That is the same letter. I will tell you when I leave that letter. That is a letter dated December 23, 1913.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The reason I say that, I don't think there is any such run. I don't think there is any run like it now.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "Conductors and porters make runs from Chicago to the coast, four nights with four hours' sleep at nights, and the porter often puts in two out of the four without any rest at all; and in case of trains being late, which they often are, many hours, the employee gets no allowance for extra time."

He adds to that:

"I have given only two or three runs, and what I give pertaining to them will no doubt apply to the entire working operation of the company throughout the United States."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I did not get the point of that.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I will give you the last. He says [reading]:

"Conductors and porters make runs from Chicago to the coast, four nights with four hours' sleep at nights, and the porter often puts in two out of the four without any rest at all; and in case of trains being late, which they often are, many hours, the employee gets no allowance for extra time."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. There is no run that I know of, and I am safe in saying there isn't any run where he does not get some relief between here and the coast. If the train is late an hour or so, though, he would not get any extra pay; if the train was late so as to interfere with the run, another car would be put on, and they would be held over and paid until they got back.

Chairman WALSH. He follows [reading]:

"I have given only two or three runs, and what I give pertaining to them will no doubt apply to the entire working operation throughout the United States."

"An investigation will show that employees are putting in 20 out of 24 hours from two to four days at a time; that porters are paid a mere pittance and expected to hold up the public in order to get the wherewith to live; and that conductors are entitled to a much higher salary, and their runs should be the same as the train conductors."

"As to porters, while the tipping system prevails, a porter fares best in remaining with his car from its start to its destination, however long the trip is, in order to see all his passengers when the trip is ended."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is his opinion.

Chairman WALSH. That is his opinion.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; well—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I notice you said this morning that the men objected to having their long trips cut up—what is there about that circumstance—that the porter wants to follow the man who is going to give him the money?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I had reference this morning to train conductors.

Chairman WALSH. What about porters?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think they like to run through as well. There may be something in what he says; I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. He follows [reading]:

"Make tipping unlawful, as it should be; create a condition whereby porters are compensated by the company with a living wage; and then it would be all to their advantage to have their runs shortened similar to what I have suggested for the conductors."

"Employees are fearful of making a move, as they know, should it become known, it would mean a discharge. For this reason, in the interests of other employees, whose assistance I shall secure, as well as in my own behalf, I hope the investigation is handled in such a manner that employees are protected in their positions."

What do you say as to his suggestion that tipping ought to be made unlawful, and that every person requiring the services of another should pay him a living wage?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We certainly would have to meet any changed condition. We will simply have to pay whatever wages are necessary to secure the help to carry on the business. That is all there is about it.

Chairman WALSH. Well, we are attempting to get constructive suggestions. Now, here is a man from the other side who says make tipping unlawful and pay the men who work for you a living wage. What do you believe about that as being proper? Should tipping be made unlawful, and should it be made unlawful, or at least not respectable, for an individual or company to have anyone work for them or for him that was not paid a living wage so that he would be an independent man, not dependent on the largeness or kindness of another man?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, that is a pretty comprehensive subject, and I would not care to answer it with the limited thought I have given to it.

Chairman WALSH. Here is another letter, December 11, 1913 [reading]:

"Several thousand employees, of which I am one, have been anxiously waiting for our company to do something of a substantial character; but it seems, when our petitions to them, which I honestly believe have been reasonable, are ignored—not even the courtesy of a reply—our only hope is through pressure being brought to bear from some other source.”

Are there several thousand of your employees that from time to time have petitioned you for improved conditions, to which petitions you did not give reply?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I have not seen any petitions about improving any condition, or heard of one. There have been, as I stated this morning, some petitions come in about increasing the rate of pay, and I think I have pretty well covered that.

Chairman WALSH. How many persons signed those? Did thousands of employees sign them?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; I would not say thousands, but I will say there were some; quite a number signed.

Chairman WALSH (reading). “November 30, 1913”—this is a letter received—“I am told of the existence of a body known as the Industrial Relations Commission. I would respectfully and confidentially ask you to investigate the conditions surrounding the employment of Pullman conductors and porters. As a conductor I can assure you that in many ways our position with the Pullman Co. is almost unbearable. Where employees, thousands of them, are putting in 20 hours out of 24, days at a time, and lay-overs not worthy of the name, at a quite insufficient salary, and this from an enterprise declaring huge dividends each year besides annually adding an immense amount to their reserve, I feel that it is high time that some move be made to bring about a change.”

That voices what seems to be a complaint on the part of some of those as to length of hours. Have you received many or few suggestions that the hours that the men work are too long, or that the hours that they were required to stay awake, leaving out of the question the work, are too long?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, they have been in some cases taken up. I can't recall any just now, but they have always received consideration, and would, any complaint by any employee. I do not—I can not conceive that that voices the feeling of the men generally, because I think the men generally know that they can take up any matter that relates to them, is of interest to them, and get proper consideration.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Hungerford, how would you get the wishes and voice of the men generally in your service, and how do you get it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The men generally?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Why, the men very frequently take up matters themselves, individually.

Chairman WALSH. How many individuals have called at your office for a raise in their pay during the last 12 months?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Have not been any.

Chairman WALSH. Well, the year before how many called there?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know that any conductors have come to me asking for an increase in their pay.

Chairman WALSH. Here is a letter from a conductor, dated October 10, 1914. He says [reading]:

“I have given the company about 10 years of my time and am still employed as a Pullman conductor. I do not wish to be known as a klicker, but there are a few points upon which we all would be pleased to see some changes.

“First. Some of the runs are very long, extending over three days and nights, and we work 20 hours out of the 24. On the run on which I am working we make the trip from Portland to Omaha and return every nine days. The mileage is 1,784 each way, making 3,568 miles for each trip. The cost of the trip, or, allowing for 40 trips per year, totaling over 141,000 miles per year. Another feature is the high cost of living on dining cars and in restaurants, which has increased about 40 per cent during the past year, without any increase in salary. In fact, there has not been any increase in salary for several years, except to the office force. Several times we have sent in a petition asking for an increase, but have never heard from them.”

Are you acquainted with what the men you have heard here say? Is it a fact that the cost of living on the dining cars and in restaurants during the period of the year ending December, 1914, has increased 40 per cent?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know that the increase has been 40 per cent, but we all know that the prices of meals in dining cars have increased in the last few years; that is, I imagine, one of those long runs, which, as I said before,

I do not believe in. I think we can get them straightened out some day. I think they are too long myself.

Chairman WALSH. At this point I will ask you how many high officers, district superintendents, and so forth, are there whose positions conductors may hope to rise to?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We have got some 80 or 90 of these district officers around the country, and they have their assistants and agents all throughout the country. I could not tell you the exact number.

Chairman WALSH. Here is a letter from a porter [reading]:

"I am sorry it is impossible for me to testify. I think it best not to testify for fear of losing my position. I run from Chicago to Los Angeles, 2,298 miles. I am on the road 3 days and 3 nights each way, with 4 hours' sleep each night and about 22½ hours' lay-over in Los Angeles. About 2½ of this 22½ is spent in the yards, which leaves about 20 hours' rest. When I arrive in Chicago I have 48 hours, but 4½ hours of this is consumed in riding the train from the depot to the yard on every arrival. The company always takes from 50 cents to $1 out of our check each month for linen they claim is short. The $27.50 per month we receive barely pays for our meals while on the road."

Is that a truthful statement of the condition on that run?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know that run. As I said before, I don't think that anybody pays for the linen if they will exercise due care in the handling of it.

Chairman WALSH. I called your attention a while ago to the statement of Commissioner Eshleman, of California. I find my memorandum of it. He says [reading]:

"As I told you in our office, we have yet to find a single employee of the Pullman Co. in the State of California that has talked to us—and we don't ask them; they talk to us from time to time—that thought your company was doing right by them; not a one. I have the first one yet to see who will say a good word about your company among the employees."

Now, you say you know about this. Have you made any investigation in the State of California as to the conditions existing there, so far as your company is concerned?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; we have. As I say, we sent inspectors out to cover that subject and talk with the men, and that effort has not developed any such thing as that. I notice he says that he has talked with some of the men. I hope and believe he did not talk with a great many.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you say that petitions were sent in that you deemed were gotten up by outside persons, and that therefore you did not notice them; but what was there about those petitions—because I want to call your attention to a letter there from a conductor—that caused no attention to be paid to those petitions?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; I did not say that no attention was paid to them.

Chairman WALSH. But I mean no answer given to them.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I don't know who you would answer.

Chairman WALSH. Well, just state were the names of the conductors signed to them.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many were there? Hundreds?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think I tried—I endeavored to make it clear that I would not say.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I did not get it clear.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; I tried to make it clear. I couldn't say. These petitions, as you know, came in here a year or two ago and were turned over to our vice president—he is the vice president now—and I have said I do not know what action has been taken. The only way you could make a reply to them would be to issue a general reply to them. I do know that the matter has been up for consideration with our people and is up now; but so far as making any reply, I don't know how you could reply to them. I don't see that there is any point in that in particular. Only one reply that you could make that would be satisfactory would be to grant an increase.

Chairman WALSH. How many conductors do you say you take on in normal times?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. About 2,500.

Chairman WALSH. Were 2,000 names signed to those petitions?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; I would not—you know—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Was there a thousand names signed to them?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, as I said before, I can not say. I know they were all not signed up. I can not say how many were signed up, but I am only expressing a general recollection.

Chairman WALSH. Did they come from the different districts of your company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Are they signed by some conductors in all of the districts?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I would not want to make a positive statement as to that.

Chairman WALSH. Would you say there were 1,000 names signed to them altogether?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I have stated that I could not make any definite statement.

Chairman WALSH. Were there 100 names signed to them altogether? I want to try to search your recollection now—I must for a moment—as to the number, as to how general that request was.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, I have made about as clear a reply as I am capable of doing, and that is that I do not recall. I do not know that I examined them all. I know that I did not examine them carefully. I did not examine to see how many signed and how many did not. The fact that the request had been made was sufficient, and it would be recognized just as quickly as if it had been signed by the rest, or signed by all, as far as that is concerned.

Chairman WALSH. We received this letter of December 29, 1913 [reading]:

“DEAR SIR: This, the inclosed, you will note, is dated June, 1912, and as yet we have received no reply. It was sent from every important district in the United States, signed by at least 75 per cent of the Pullman conductors.

“While there is nothing in it concerning working conditions, this matter has been taken up in a verbal way through the various district superintendents frequently and without results. And inclosed with that was this:

“CHICAGO, ILL., June 4, 1912.

“THE PULLMAN CO., Chicago, Ill.

“GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned Pullman conductors, beg to submit to you for your kind consideration a request for an increase in our salaries.

“Owing to the tremendous increased cost of living we find ourselves barely able to support our families, and we are unable to save anything for that rainy day which sooner or later comes to all of us.

“We take this opportunity to thank you for the due consideration which we have received from you in the past, and we want to assure you of our loyalty by putting forth our best efforts in a manner that at all times will retain the high standing of service which you require.

“Thanking you in advance for any favor you may see fit to grant us, we are,

“Very respectfully, yours.”

Is that the truth, that 75 per cent of your conductors signed a communication of that sort under date of June 4, 1912?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I make the statement, as I said before—

Chairman WALSH (Interrupting). That you don't know?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Well, is this the petition you refer to which you say you thought was supposed to be signed by outsiders?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. What is the date of it?

Chairman WALSH. June 4, 1912.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't think that is the date. I think we got a later one.

Chairman WALSH. I was going to ask you now, then, if there was not posted in the different offices and terminals of your company the following [reading]:

“Copy of petition”—this is our memorandum, which, according to Conductor “B,” was posted in every district in the United States in January, 1914, and generally signed by the Pullman conductors.

“JANUARY 23, 1914.

“THE PULLMAN CO., Chicago, Ill.

“GENTLEMEN: We the undersigned Pullman conductors beg to submit to you for your kind consideration a request for an increase in our salaries.

“Owing to the tremendous increased cost of living we find ourselves barely able to support our families, and we are unable to save anything for that rainy day which sooner or later comes to all of us.

“We take this opportunity to thank you for the due consideration which we have received from you in the past, and we want to assure you of our loyalty by putting forth our best efforts to serve in a manner that at all times will retain the high standing of service which you require.

"Thanking you in advance for any favor you may see fit to grant, we are,
"Very respectfully, yours.

"Pullman conductors, please sign and forward promptly to President J. S. Runnells, the Pullman Co., Chicago, Ill."

Did you receive that sort of request signed by the conductors in every district in the United States?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, they received that request, but I can not say that they got them from every district in the United States. As I said before, I did not check off the list of them. It is a matter that would have to be passed on generally, and I can not give you the number that was signed up.

Chairman WALSH. A conductor has sent in a comparative list, to which I call your attention and invite your comment. First, railroad employees: Conductors, Los Angeles to Las Vegas, $175 per month, brakemen $105; from Las Vegas to Callente, conductors $165, brakemen $99.55; Callente to Salt Lake City, conductors $175 a month, brakemen $170; Salt Lake to Ogden, conductors $146, brakemen $93; Ogden to Green River, conductors $165, brakemen $99.55; Green River to Cheyenne, conductors $165, brakemen $99.55; and that the compensation of the Pullman conductors between the same points is, respectively, $95, $90, $85, $85, $85, and $85. Perhaps I had better pass you that so you can look at it.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Of course, as I said before, our own men do not have to acquire any training, as they have to in the railroad business.

Chairman WALSH. That is all the comment you care to make, is it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH (reading). The time schedule and mileage for conductors on the Pullman run from Los Angeles to Cheyenne and return over San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad; Oregon Short Line Railroad; and Union Pacific Railroad, east bound, leaving Los Angeles Tuesday, report at 7.20 a. m.; leave Los Angeles at 9 a. m.; arrive at Cheyenne Thursday, 5.20 a. m. Time on duty, 46 hours, except 4 hours' rest each night; mileage, 1,303 miles; rest in Cheyenne 10 hours. Westbound, leaving Cheyenne Thursday; report 3.20 p. m.; leave 3.40 p. m.; arrive at Los Angeles, Saturday 10.30 a. m.; turning in reports at office, 10.30 to 11.30 a. m.; time on duty, 44 hours and 10 minutes, except 4 hours' rest each night; mileage, 1,303 miles; rest in Los Angeles, about 68 hours, or until Tuesday at 7.20 a. m. Total mileage, round trip, 2,606 miles.

"The above runs are operated by the Pullman Co. with seven conductors, one leaving Los Angeles each day, making one trip a week. These conductors operate along with 6 train crews each way, or 12 crews on a round trip.

"Pullman conductors on this run make 11,362 miles per month, while train crews make from 4,380 to 5,600 miles, according to their division and schedule.

"Mail clerks on the Union Pacific Railroad, Cheyenne to Ogden, make 4,907 miles per month."

Are those figures approximately correct?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I don't know; that looks to me like a hard run. Do you want to retain this paper?

Chairman WALSH. I can give you a copy of it if you would like to take it.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I would like to look into it.

Chairman WALSH. This has been submitted also [reading]:

"Below are a few runs that show the mileage Pullman conductors have to make per month:

"Denver & Rio Grande Railroad, Denver to Ogden, 9,515 miles.

"Southern Pacific Railroad, Los Angeles to San Francisco, 9,720 miles.

"San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad, Los Angeles to Salt Lake, 9,636 miles.

"Union Pacific and Southern Pacific Railroads, Omaha to San Francisco, 13,500 miles.

"Union Pacific, Oregon Short Line, and Oregon Railroad & Navigation Co., Omaha to Portland, 13,529 miles.

"Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, Chicago to Denver, 12,641 miles.

"Santa Fe Railroad, Chicago to Los Angeles, 15,191 miles."

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Am I to retain these copies?

Chairman WALSH. You may; but I would like you to answer that offhand, if you could, and then you may take this with you and verify them, so that the record may be straight on that. Have you any comment you can make offhand?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. You have not the information?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I have not.

(The witness later submitted data in regard to the mileage made by Pullman conductors, and the same appears as "Hungerford Exhibit No. 2," at the end of this subject.)

Chairman WALSH. I will furnish you, then, with a comparative statement here of mileage; round-trip mileage, Cheyenne to Ogden, Cheyenne to Green River, Los Angeles to Cheyenne, and Denver to Cheyenne, which purports to give these facts, that a mail clerk runs 3,709 miles per month and receives $150 per month, and that the regular train conductor runs 5,207 miles per month and receives compensation at the rate of $165 per month; and that the Pullman conductor on the same run runs 6,509 miles per month and receives compensation of $100 per month.

(Chairman Walsh here furnishes witness with copy of paper referred to.)

Is there a rule—I believe I read a rule against conductors soliciting business or recommending railroads or hotels—a rule against soliciting business or recommending hotels or railroads by your employees?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. You read that, did you not?

Chairman WALSH. I believe there is a rule of that kind?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Are you aware of the fact that hotels do furnish free accommodation to your conductors at different points?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I am.

Chairman WALSH. Why do they do it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I never investigated to ascertain why they did. I say it used to be a custom pretty generally to take care of railroad conductors and sleeping-car conductors. They seemed to be desirous of their patronage, but that has gradually drifted away, and they are not doing it so much now.

Chairman WALSH. Do they still furnish free accommodation at certain hotels, to your knowledge?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And is it not a fact that they furnish such free accommodation in the hope that they will recommend travelers to stop at those hotels?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is merely a supposition. You ask me, however, about the matter, and I think it is possibly so, but that is merely supposition.

Chairman WALSH. Is it not a fact that conductors and porters frequently carry cold lunches with them because they can not afford to eat in the dining cars and have enough left out of their salaries to support their families?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It would be optional with them to carry their lunches, if they so desired.

Chairman WALSH. Has that been going on?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not know whether it has, or to what extent, but I assume that it would.

Chairman WALSH. Would the company be willing to meet a committee of conductors and porters to talk over their grievances, with a view of remedying them, if such a committee were fairly selected from among the employees?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Entirely so; at any time.

Chairman WALSH. What has been the tendency in the past year to cut down or increase lay-overs—about cutting down or increasing lay-overs?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We have increased lay-overs and cut the runs, considerable of them during the last year.

Chairman WALSH. Is it or is it not a fact that some of the railroads from which Pullman conductors handle the railroad transportation for the railroad company offer to pay the Pullman conductors a stipulated sum for their work, and that the Pullman Co. refused to allow their conductors to accept it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; not to my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Did this ever happen on the Santa Fe Railroad?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Not to my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Did it ever happen on the Pennsylvania Railroad?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It never happened on any road that I have any knowledge of.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that Pullman conductors have taken the place of gatemen employed by the San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad at the Salt Lake station?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think you covered that this morning. I think you said they had taken the train conductor away and asked that our conductor take up the railroad transportation at the same time the Pullman transportation was lifted, and I said that probably that was so; it has been done in some cases.

Chairman WALSH. Are Pullman conductors ever charged for railroad transportation when called away by sickness or death, when there is no time to obtain transportation through the Chicago office?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Are they charged with that?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not understand the question.

Chairman WALSH. Are Pullman conductors charged for railroad transportation when they are called away by sickness or death, when there is not sufficient time to get transportation from the Chicago office?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. If they do not get transportation or do not have a pass, I suppose they have to pay fare.

Chairman WALSH. What is your rule or method for providing them with transportation when they are called away in an emergency?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Any of our superintendents can make up application on the road for that.

Chairman WALSH. Is it done by wire?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They can do it, yes, sir, without any wiring or writing.

Chairman WALSH. Are the porters required to occupy a camp stool while on watch during the night at the end of the car?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are provided with a camp stool—it ought to be a camp chair—so that they can keep watch of the car.

Chairman WALSH. At page 43 of the book of rules I find the following [reading]:

"It must be understood that the passengers and employees, and the baggage belonging to them, can not be searched without their consent, except by officers of the law, but prompt report must be made in any case where an employee declines to be searched. Employees are cautioned, however, not to suggest any personal search unless it be suggested by the passenger, in which event it is assumed that any employee of the company will readily consent to such search, and in that case the passenger should be requested to make the search personally, and it should be done, if possible, in the drawing room or smoking room."

Does that mean that a penalty would follow the refusal of a conductor or a porter who refused to allow a passenger to search his person?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It does not.

Chairman WALSH. What does it mean?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It means, in case of loss, if claim is made by a passenger sustaining loss on the car, if they questioned the employee, as they often do, and endeavored to throw suspicion on him, that it would be better for him to submit to the search to satisfy the passenger, and clear himself. But there is no penalty attached to it if he does not do so.

Chairman WALSH. On page 65 of the book of rules is this provision [reading]:

"The time at meal stations will be divided between employees, and under no circumstances will the conductor and the porter leave the car at the same time to go to the dining room."

Does that arrangement always give your employees sufficient time for their meals?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think so. The point of that is that sneak thieves frequently get into the cars when no one is there and make away with the passengers' effects.

Chairman WALSH. On page 70 of the book of rules, under the heading, "Accidents and damage to cars," is the following provision [reading]:

"Whenever wheels are removed en route, the employee left in charge of the car will ascertain the maker's name of the wheels removed and applied, their numbers, their position in the trucks, and the cause of the removal, and report the occurrence to his district superintendent, giving the location of the car at the time the change was made."

Are porters, when in charge of cars, required to make this sort of a report?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. When the porter is in charge of the car he performs the conductor's duties.

Chairman WALSH. And your answer would be that they would be required, under those conditions, to make such report?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, they would be.

Chairman WALSH. Referring again to this book of rules, on page 73, beginning at page 73, and on down to page 82, under the heading, "Communicable diseases," and including "Means of prevention, the temperature of the car, the use of disinfectants, fumigation," and so forth, that chapter being signed by Thomas R. Crowder, M. D., superintendent of sanitation; are porters supposed to familiarize themselves with the instructions contained in this book from page 73 to page 82, inclusive, and carry out those instructions?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. These instructions, under the head "Means of prevention," give detailed instructions as to the handling of ice and water, the use of disinfectants and fumigation; and they are held responsible for the carrying out of these instructions, and the health of the traveling public to that extent—the porters are?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. On pages 85 to 89, inclusive, of this book of rules, is a digest of the laws of different States regarding the playing of cards, public drinking on trains, and the sale of tobacco and liquor in various States. Are the porters expected to familiarize themselves with those interpretations of the laws of the various States and see that they are complied with?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are expected to familiarize themselves with any information contained in the book; that is issued for their guidance.

Chairman WALSH. Then, I take it that they are supposed to familiarize themselves with the interpretations of the laws of the various States?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Who is responsible for the enforcement of these laws in the cars of the company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That information is conveyed to them. The train conductor is the only man on the train who has police jurisdiction; they report occurrences to the train conductor.

Chairman WALSH. Are the porters and conductors ever arrested for violating these laws?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We hope not.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any instances in which they have been?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; I can not recall any now.

Chairman WALSH. Has the company ever been fined for violating those laws?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I can not recall a case.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell would like to know what is the usual and general arrangement that obtains between the Pullman Co. and the railroads for the use of Pullman cars.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, that is a pretty comprehensive question, but the general practice is that we furnish the cars on the request of the railroad companies; we are under agreement to do so for the accommodation of their passenger travel as in their opinion may be necessary.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I wish, if you could, you would make it a little more specific. What contractual rights usually exist between the railroad companies and the Pullman Co.; the character of them—your right to run cars on the roads?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We have no right to run cars at all; we furnish cars to the roads, as I have said, for the accommodation of their passenger travel.

Chairman WALSH. You might take a typical case and just state what your arrangement is with the company.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It would be to furnish cars to the roads to accommodate their passenger business, and they call upon us for the cars as they find it necessary on certain lines, and we are under obligation to furnish them. That is about the general idea. I don't altogether get the point.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What I want to get at is the matter of compensation from either party for the use of the cars. Do the railroad companies pay you for the privilege of using your cars?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; we furnish the cars to them. The cars are used for the transportation of their passengers, and we get our revenue for the special accommodation furnished them—the seats, berths, or beds, and special accommodation.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is that particular contract? Can you briefly outline it for me? Have you a copy of a contract that you can furnish us? Are they usually the same?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are very similar. They are on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. We can get them?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask a few questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. I would like to ask you, for instance, in going from Chicago to Louisville the porter leaves Chicago Monday night and arrives at Louisville on Tuesday morning, and then, returning, gets back to Chicago on Wednesday night; does he run continuously or have one day off a week, for instance?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. He has one day off a week. He makes two round trips a month and has four days off.

Commissioner BALLARD. You spoke of the matter of sanitation and temperature. Do you have a thermometer in each car and try to keep the car at a certain temperature?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir. It is more easily regulated with the improved methods we have at the present time, such as steam heat, than formerly. Those temperatures are being maintained, as far as possible, to comply with what the medical people think is the best for the public health.

Commissioner BALLARD. You spoke of blankets. Do you have two blankets for each bed in the car?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. What if there is a change of temperature; then there are two blankets?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; we know some people want a room hotter than others; we keep it cool and furnish them with additional blankets on request.

Commissioner BALLARD. You have additional blankets in the cars that the porters can get?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ashton would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner ASHTON. Under the rules you have spoken of is the number of lay-off days proportionately larger on the long runs you have spoken of than on the one-night runs?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir; on the Overland Limited a man has three days and two nights away.

Commissioner ASHTON. He has three days and two nights at his home town?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner ASHTON. And that applies to runs other than the Overland Limited?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner ASHTON. And it applies to conductors as well as porters?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner ASHTON. I think that is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell has another question or so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do the conductors and porters—are they required to give bond of any kind?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The company bonds its men at its own expense.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It has a bonding department?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; it has an arrangement with some bonding concern and bonds the men with what you might call a blanket bond.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are the employees taxed for that in any way?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are the porters charged up with all losses of toilet articles in the cars on their return trips?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are not; very little charge is made for that. The only charge made for linen or anything else is for what might be considered necessary for the moral effect, where they are found to be careless or negligent; but the toilet articles, they are not charged up with them at all, to speak of.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Not for brushes or combs?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; they are carried away sometimes; you can not prevent that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the matter of the men waiting—the extra men waiting for an opportunity to take a run—are these men permitted to seek other employment, or must they be at all times ready to be called by the Pullman Co.?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, no; no at all; not at all; we could not keep them out of employment.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If they are called and not found, or if they have a position and they can not come up right away and some one else takes that particular place that is ready then, does that mean that they are set back in any way?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Not at all.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They could then go to the foot of the list, as I were?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is the average earnings of a Pullman porter per year? I mean not the $27.50 a month; but what are the total earnings; what would the average be?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Deducting lost time?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes. I take it for granted that every porter does not get to work a full month the year round.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is true.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There must be an average.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; but I could not tell you what that is.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If he had an average loss of time that is allotted to the usual workmen—that is, he works 300 days a year?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That would naturally reduce his income materially?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In other words, if his wage was $27.50 a month, it would average $24 or $23, as the case might be, so that his year's earnings would be much less?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. You want what his average earnings would be, based on his actual days' service?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I could not tell you that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does your company publish, in connection with your beneficial features, such as sick benefits, reports showing the amounts paid to the men, and the number of men sick during the year?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not know that we publish it; but we have it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you any such matter you can give us?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I can tell you what it was for last year; the sick benefit in the operating department was $60,000, and the pension fund was $66,000.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How many employees would that probably affect?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, that would have an effect on all those connected with the operating department; and we have in that department between 14 and 15—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. (Interrupting). That would apply only to employees in the service 10 years?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Five years in case of sickness and 20 years in case of pension, except where pension might be granted under exceptional conditions—in exceptional cases where a man has been long in the service of the company and has given out under unusual conditions. In the event a man has been in the service from 15 to 20 years his case is presented to the board for the action of the board in those exceptional cases.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then, as I understand it, a man must be five years in the service to come under the sick-benefit rules?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And 20 years to come under the pension system?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How many of the 6,500 porters have been in the employ of the company 20 years, approximately?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think I can give it to you on the 15-year men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Whatever it is.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The reason I was going to give it to you on the 15-year men, I had the number of men that received the 5 per cent on account of 15-year service; I did have it, but I do not seem to have it now. I can furnish you that information.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And in addition, if you have not got it now, I would like to know the number of employees who have been five years in the service who are eligible to sick benefits.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

(Under date of April 15, 1915, Mr. Hungerford submitted the following statement in regard to the term of service of employees:)

Car employees in service 5 years and over: Conductors, 1,293; porters, 3,425.
 Car employees in service 20 years and over: Conductors, 214; porters, 516.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And you have given us, as I recall it now, in answer to a question by the chairman, the number of additional employees during 1913 and 1914, I think, showing something like 2,500 porters in one case.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think the number was taken up this morning; yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You think that would be a fair average of the number of employees—additional employees each year to keep up that number?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; as I said to you—as I tried to make clear this morning—that was an abnormal period in 1913 and 1914, but that seems to be the period covered by the investigation, so I have those figures. As I said, the last part of 1913 and the fore part of 1914 was the heaviest in the history of the company. The travel was the heaviest.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does that mean this number of additional employees have been permanently in the service?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They were taken up, but all did not remain permanently; no.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It does not mean this large number was on an extra list?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It means they were taken up on account of unusual conditions, but it does not mean that they have continued to serve, because a great many necessarily, with the falling off of business, are let out—rather, they are carried on our extra list as satisfactory employees, but some have gone into other business; but that is the number we took up during that period.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You have a system whereby the oldest employee is given the opportunity for a more favorable or better position?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Seniority counts where everything else is equal.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You do apply seniority?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You spoke about the opportunity for conductors to rise up in the service of the company and get other positions, such as clerkships, and so forth; that about 90 per cent of your present force has risen from conductors?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What opportunity is there for a porter to rise in the service of the company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, we have not any great number of positions they could enter from their positions as porters. There are, however, a great many porters on our cars who, by coming in contact with men of affairs that ride with them as passengers, have entered their service, but we have not many positions open to them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There is no other opportunity for them, with the possible exception of length of time of service, which would bring them a certain percentage of increase in wages?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; that is correct.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is the only opportunity they have?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes. I can tell you the number of porters 10 years and over in the service, if you would like that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. All right.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is 1,721.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That would be about what percentage?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is about one-fourth. Over 5 and under 10 years it is 1,704. That makes a total of 3,425 that are over five years in the service out of the 6,500.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would there be a possibility of the porters and conductors, with their experience as operating men, having charge of the affairs of the Pullman Co. on wheels, as it were, in conference with the officials of that company, that their judgment might not be very effective in the way of suggesting remedial rules and regulations governing operations for their improvement and that of the company; that is, might not the company, by a conference with them, be able to bring that about?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We have conferences with the men to which some questions have been raised apparently every three months. We have them with porters and conductors all over the country, and they are invited to make suggestions or comment or criticism.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there any premium or prize of any kind offered to employees for suggestions?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In what way is that done?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They are fully informed in regard to that. I would like to submit a pamphlet about that.

(The witness submitted, in printed form, a pamphlet entitled "The Pullman Co.—Policy and Procedure in Patent Matters.")

Any suggestion made by an employee is received and considered, and although the suggestion he may make may not not be altogether practical, if anything can be worked out of it he is rewarded for it. I will cite one case of a conductor that called attention to the fact, out at Denver, of rain falling off of the vestibule doors. I think everybody has got on those trains—I know I have and our passengers have—on rainy days and had the rain drop off of the door onto their hats. This conductor suggested putting a little V-shaped strip over that door, which was a very simple matter, and it is a wonder that no one else had thought of it, and the company rewarded and gave him $25 for the suggestion. That is all there was to it; there was nothing patentable about it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The company did not patent it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No; there was nothing patentable about it; it was simply a suggestion, and he was rewarded for that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Supposing a conductor left Chicago to go to San Francisco and return, and supposing on his trip out to San Francisco some charge was made against him for violation of some of the rules and the charge was sufficient to warrant him being discharged and taken off the train at San Francisco and not let return as conductor, would the company furnish him with transportation back to Chicago?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. You say, if it was sufficient so that he should be taken off?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. We would furnish it back to Chicago, unless he was arrested for some criminal offense.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Of course, in that event.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. But they do not usually take men off away from their home stations unless they are compelled to do so for very good cause.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If they were taken off, you would return them to the home station?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Oh, yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose the grievance charged was made against a conductor or porter for having violated some rule or for having done something that was offensive to the traveling public and he was brought up before the officials and charged with whatever it might be, and it was substantiated; do you place fines upon them? Do you fine them in any way financially? I don't mean a suspension for a certain time, but an actual money fine of say $50 or $100 for the offense?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Supposing that he is suspended for 30 days and he feels that he has been unjustly suspended; how does he go about having his case properly presented to the officials of the company and have a hearing?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Most of the men would appeal to the chief service inspector, and if he was not satisfied with that he could appeal to me, or to the president. Any official will receive a petition of the employee and give it the proper attention.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose he is out in San Francisco and the officers of the company out there should take his case and decide it, and he must return to Chicago; will the company furnish him transportation and provide for him to come back to Chicago?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. In order that he may present his case?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That matter would be determined on the merits presented by the petition; if it was justified, yes; to put him in service would be the way it would be done.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How would the man have an opportunity to come back?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Put him in service and send him here.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That would be done in all cases?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes. Anybody will be heard and given every opportunity to be heard about anything they do not think is right.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have the conductors or porters ever been invited in to discuss with the company the question of wages and hours, or conditions of employment, at all?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. As I said, we hold these meetings and request them to make any suggestions they have to make. I do not know that they have been especially asked to come in on any specific subject, but they are given an opportunity to air their views on any subject.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What I mean is, have the men ever, by committee, or on invitation of the company, selected some of their number to come to Chicago to take up with the Pullman officials the question whether there will be an increase or reduction in wages, or any change in their wage?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Not to my knowledge.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Or as to their hours or conditions of employment?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Not to my knowledge.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then the position of the Pullman Co., as I see it, is that it states the rate of wage, the hours of service, and the trips and other conditions, and simply says to the workman who may make application for employment, "Those are the conditions under which your job is presented, and you can accept it or not, as you choose"; they have no say whatsoever as to the conditions under which they are to be employed?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Well, they understand the conditions before they accept the employment.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understand that they accept the position simply as it is made for them, with the understanding that those are the conditions under which it is to be accepted.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the moment they felt that was not fair, they were expected to give up and allow some one else to accept it who was satisfied with it. I understood you to say to the chairman there were such a number of applicants that they seemed to be satisfied with the conditions?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes; and, furthermore, there is about 90 per cent of the men—I will say 80 per cent to be safe—that are dismissed for one cause or another, that make strong efforts to get back. If conditions were so bad, I do not understand why, when once out, they would be so insistent to get back; but that is a fact.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I can not explain that, and I would like to know myself. I was going to ask a question, and I think the chairman asked it in another way: If the porters' wages are $27.50 a month, and he is a man of family, and traveling must necessarily cost him extra expense, traveling from San Francisco, for instance, to Chicago and back, and gone several days, and if he has not a liberal lot of passengers with him I imagine the major portion of his salary would be eaten up by expenses while away from home; has your company given some thought as to the question of whether that wage is a sufficient wage for a man to keep himself and rear a family? Is there not an anticipated value of some kind in that position that is not in print or is not before us?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Of course, as I said—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does not the possible liberality of the traveling public cut some figure? Does not the porter, when he accepts that position—is he not imbued with the idea that the salary question is not so great with him as getting a run upon which there is a large number of people traveling, and that the larger the number of people traveling upon it the greater his income will be? Does he not speculate, as it were, with the number of people traveling on the run?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That may be so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And would that not be largely why he is anxious to stay in the service of the company or come back into the service of the company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That may be. As I say, we take the conditions as we find them. There are a great many men anxious for the positions and anxious for the work.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, it does not seem possible that any man, white or black, would be seeking a position at an average of $7 a week, unless he saw in it some other condition or circumstance that would bring him a larger income. We are enacting, or trying to enact, minimum-wage laws for women in Illinois, and it was figured somewhere around $8 a week as a minimum upon which a woman could live in respectability. Now, if a woman can not be expected to live on less than eight dollars and some cents per week, then a man traveling, as your porters do, and with the expenses they are put to, could not live on less than that amount and rear a family, could he? Has there any thought been given to that?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That does not come up in the line of operation, and that has not been put up to me; that would be considered by a higher official than I. Commissioner BALLARD. In other words, do they get so many tips that they are willing to work for a small wage?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think that enters into it. It is what goes with the position that makes it desirable; there is no question about that.

Chairman WALSH. Where do porters sleep on crowded trains that carry the modern steel cars, in which there are small wash rooms?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is the berth designated as No. 1, usually upper No. 1.

Chairman WALSH. Supposing that all of the upper berths are taken by passengers; does that not occur at times?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is a very desirable supposition, but it is so rare that it is not worthy of consideration. We would be very glad if it were so. There may be times when the porter finds difficulty in finding a berth, but I do not think it is so frequent that it may be considered.

Chairman WALSH. Would your company sell upper No. 1 to a passenger?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They would, under forced conditions, I suppose, but they are supposed to hold for the porter that berth on the character of cars you speak of, upper No. 1.

Chairman WALSH. What is the rule of your company?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. It says in the book there—I think you read it—that they hold that berth.

Chairman WALSH. Sir?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I think the regulation provides for that in the book there.

Chairman WALSH. Is upper berth No. 1 reserved for the porter to sleep in on the modern steel cars?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. It is not?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. That is, he can not sleep in upper berth No. 1 if the car is full?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. He sleeps in the smoking room. The majority of our cars have smoking rooms. You asked the question awhile ago about the cars that do not have smoking rooms, and I said in those cars they probably designated upper 1. The book provides that the district superintendent will provide the space for them—arrange the space for the men.

Chairman WALSH. How many cars have you that have the small wash rooms without berths?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I could not tell you offhand.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; I could not. The majority of what we call our standard cars have smoking rooms—what we call our standard cars. The other cars mostly run on trains of a special character, where there are other means for smoking, combined cars.

Chairman WALSH. Do the Chicago-New York trains; do the cars in those trains have sleeping accommodations in the smoking rooms usually?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. On the Pennsylvania Railroad?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They have—we have combined cars on the Pennsylvania Railroad, and have two sections arranged for sleeping.

Chairman WALSH. The Chicago-San Francisco trains, how are they? Do they have the small smoking room without berth?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Yes, sir; but I do not think we ever saw a Chicago-San Francisco train loaded that way.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any instance where all of the upper berths were taken, and the porters had no place to sleep?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; I never heard of it; it may have occurred; it possibly has, but I do not know of it.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you, Mr. Hungerford. You may be permanently excused, but please remain in call in the event that we may wish to recall you.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Very well.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you another question. I call your attention to a situation of this kind: Take a case like this, where only three Pullman passengers come through from Seattle to Chicago, arriving in Chicago on Saturday at 10.15 a. m.; how would a porter be supposed to live on a trip of that kind, if that is a fact? This was handed to our investigator by some one, and we might assume that that occurred.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Probably that is not the average; I do not know whether that is a fact; I do not know anything about it. The men get along all right, as far as I know.

Chairman WALSH. Do you make any attempt to ascertain how many passengers ride on the cars, with reference to the way the porters maintain themselves? Have you runs that are very meagerly patronized?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. There is a difference in the amount of patronage; certainly.

Chairman WALSH. Many that affect the porters' way of making a living?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. They would be what would be considered less desirable runs, I suppose.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have that in mind and change them off, men that probably might be put on runs where they could not possibly get enough?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. The better grade of men are put on them, and they look for promotion to some other line.

Chairman WALSH. Would he make a request of you to that effect?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How is that taken care of?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. That is handled by the local district superintendent.

Chairman WALSH. Would the local district superintendent take that into consideration if a man was put on a poorly patronized line for any length of time and put him on a better one?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I can not say about that; he probably would not disturb the men on the better lines.

Chairman WALSH. Do you make any investigation to find out whether there are instances of runs where porters can not possibly maintain themselves just from the tips and their compensation?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. I do not know of any such runs.

Chairman WALSH. Do you make any investigation to ascertain whether there are any such?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you make any investigation to find out what porters make on any particular runs?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any established knowledge, from custom or otherwise, in your company, that would indicate how much a porter would make, supposing he had a 14-section train filled up with passengers?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir; there is not.

Chairman WALSH. You do not figure on that in any way?

Mr. HUNGERFORD. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you, Mr. Hungerford.

Mr. R. W. Bell.

TESTIMONY OF MR. R. W. BELL.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name?

Mr. BELL. R. W. Bell.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside, Mr. Bell?

Mr. BELL. 12051 Parnell Avenue, Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you resided in Chicago, Ill.?

Mr. BELL. Well, consecutively I have been here 16 years; I have been away at different times, though.

Chairman WALSH. What is your present occupation?

Mr. BELL. In the mercantile business.

Chairman WALSH. In what line, please?

Mr. BELL. Groceries and meats.

Chairman WALSH. Are you in business for yourself?

Mr. BELL. No; I am employed.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been in the service of the Pullman Co.?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir; three times.

Chairman WALSH. Just describe the length of each one of your services and in a general way what runs you had.

Mr. BELL. The first time I was with them I was in the storeroom at the Dearborn Station.

Chairman WALSH. How long were you in the storeroom at the Dearborn Station?

Mr. BELL. Six or seven months. I don't remember exactly; it was during the World's Fair in Chicago. Some years later I went on the road and worked about 25 months—I am not sure of the exact number—and I quit and went into business for myself, and after being out for about 6 years I went back in the Pullman service again until they decided they did not want me any longer. I was there about 25 months at that time.

Chairman WALSH. So you were with them about six months the first time and two years the other two times of service with the company?

Mr. BELL. A little over two years each time.

Chairman WALSH. Just describe the runs you had in each period of your service.

Mr. BELL. I ran pretty near all over creation; I don't know hardly how I could describe it.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a married man?

Mr. BELL. I am a married man now, but I was not when I went in the service of the company the first time; I was married when I was in the service.

Chairman WALSH. The first or second time?

Mr. BELL. The first time. They would not give me permission to get off to get married.

Chairman WALSH. But nevertheless you seem to have accomplished your purpose?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I pretty nearly always get what I go after.

Chairman WALSH. Was that during your first service that you were married?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir; my first service on the road.

Chairman WALSH. Now, were you connected with any effort to organize the employees of the Pullman Co. at any time?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I was probably as active or more active than anyone else.

Chairman WALSH. Was it during your first or your second term of service?

Mr. BELL. The second term.

Chairman WALSH. How long were you with the company before you undertook to assist in the organization of the employees?

Mr. BELL. Well, in June, 1913, I was with them two years. We commenced this movement in the latter part of May, 1913.

Chairman WALSH. The last two years' service you were conductor and you were only in the storeroom the first six months?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. All the rest of the time you were conductor?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead.

Mr. BELL. We commenced this movement in May, and in June I would have been in the service two years.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I wish you would give us as concisely as possible the history of the effort to organize the Pullman employees. What was its inception? First, what reason did you have and what moves did you make to do it?

Mr. BELL. Well, it was a common subject of conversation in the conductors' room when we were waiting to go out on our runs that organization would be the only remedy for our grievances.

Chairman WALSH. Briefly and generally stated, what were your grievances?

Mr. BELL. It is easier to say what they were not. It was in regard to working conditions, wages, and all those things; working conditions and wages, of course, would cover everything.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have a specific demand for an increase in wages, or could you state briefly what was your objection to the wages? That is, were the wages inadequate for the service rendered, or what?

Mr. BELL. Well, we were in luck to break even. That was my experience, and I was running a good part of the time. The last period of service I put in I was on a run where you could live as economically as almost any one of the runs out of the district—on the Chicago & Alton to St. Louis.

Chairman WALSH. What was your salary then?

Mr. BELL. Eighty-five dollars.

Chairman WALSH. What was your salary when you first went with the company?

Mr. BELL. Seventy dollars; that is the regular schedule pay to start with. Of course, I only worked for $70 about two months.

Chairman WALSH. And then you got $75 or $85?

Mr. BELL. Seventy-five dollars.

Chairman WALSH. How long did you run for $75?

Mr. BELL. Six months at $75, and then there was the balance of the time that I got credit on the $70 term. There was a time when you got credit for past service, and that was added to your salary, but that was discontinued.

Chairman WALSH. What was the addition that you got for past services?

Mr. BELL. Well, I worked for six months in the storeroom at the Dearborn Station, and when I went on the road, after I worked a couple of months, they gave me credit for that six months' service, which put me in the $75 class.

Chairman WALSH. When was that discontinued?

Mr. BELL. When I had served a year I was paid $80, the regular schedule pay; I was given $80 when I resigned, and I went back at $80 and finished out; I started in at $80, and after that I got $85 until I was discharged.

Chairman WALSH. Was your service with the company during your first period satisfactory? Did you quit of your own accord in harmony with the company?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I resigned the first time.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning; please be here at 10 o'clock to-morrow.

(Thereupon at 4.40 p. m., Monday, April 5, 1915, an adjournment was taken until Tuesday, April 6, 1915, at 10 a. m.)

CHICAGO, ILL., Tuesday, April 6, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners Lennon, Ashton, O'Connell, Ballard, and Garretson.

Chairman WALSH. We will please be in order; the commission will resume.

TESTIMONY OF MR. R. W. BELL—Continued.

Mr. Bell, will you please resume the stand, and I will have to ask you to speak a little louder, as the commissioners at this end [indicating] could not hear you very well yesterday.

When we adjourned last night I think you had finished giving your experience with the Pullman Co. Now, I wish you would give a history of this effort to present the matters of the employees collectively—your effort to organize.

Mr. BELL. Well, we got the idea of organizing from the expressions of the men. They seemed to think that was our only remedy to combat the grievances we were up against.

Chairman WALSH. Were there persons that came in from the outside to promote the organization?

Mr. BELL. I never heard of any.

Chairman WALSH. From any other organization, craft, railroad, or others?

Mr. BELL. All we got from outside crafts was where we made the advances ourselves. The movement was purely from within, and for the reasons I stated we started the movement. We worked under cover, as we knew it would be the wisest thing to do.

Chairman WALSH. Just describe what you did; just tell what you did toward organizing the men.

Mr. BELL. We had the application cards printed and visited the men and talked to them and got their signatures to the application cards, and got their expressions; and conducted it along that way, and we were, in turn, let out of the service, and a great many of the men were very much in favor of the organization.

Many of the old men expressed themselves as being very much in favor of the organization, but they said they could not afford to sign up because they were getting along in years and could not work at anything else, and they said if they did that meant the termination of their relations with the company; and they expressed themselves as being with us as soon as we could get to a point where they could come out openly.

Chairman WALSH. You say you lost your position?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many men were discharged?

Mr. BELL. Of the organizers, you mean?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELL. There were three of us; we were all discharged.

Chairman WALSH. Who were the three men discharged? Have you got the list?

Mr. BELL. Mr. Stewart, Mr. Bernadickt, and myself.

Chairman WALSH. What reason was given for your discharge?

Mr. BELL. I asked the reason for my discharge, and they said they didn't know. Mr. Waite discharged me, and I had gone down to the train to go out on my run, and I was sent for to go back to the office; I was called in, and Mr. Waite was busy and said he would see me in a few minutes; and he called me in the office and said that he was sorry, but the company did not want my service any more. I asked him the reason, and he said he didn't know. And I was given my discharge papers, and was told to see the chief clerk and get my time, and we were afterwards told to stay out of the station.

Chairman WALSH. Who was told to stay out of the station?

Mr. BELL. Mr. Stewart was, Mr. Bernadickt was, and I was, myself. And some of the men working for the organization in the East were taken out by the police. That happened in Jersey City. In New York, at the Pennsylvania Terminal, they were forbidden to go into the Y. M. C. A. rooms.

Chairman WALSH. I wish now—that is all of the evidence, is it, that you have, that men were discharged for attempting to organize, what you have stated? If you have anything else, please state it.

Mr. BELL. I have some letters here.

Chairman WALSH. Very well.

Mr. BELL. Here is one from Houston, Tex.

Chairman WALSH. Please give the substance of them, instead of reading them at length.

Mr. BELL. I will just read the matter stating the discharge. This was addressed to me [reading]:

"I have just been handed a card." I don't want to take up any extra time. [Continues reading:]

"I was called into our office yesterday. Our district superintendent said he had a letter from Mr. Davis stating my services were no longer required with the company; not stating any reason why I should be let out.

"On reporting for my run to go out on February 20, was called into the superintendent's office and discharged from the service without any investigation."

That is Jacksonville, Fla.

Chairman WALSH. Were all those men men who had taken part in the organization? I noticed by the testimony of Mr. Hungerford yesterday that that was the usual way of discharging men, no matter what the cause. Were these men active in the organization to your knowledge or not?

Mr. BELL. I might read a little further and give their statement.

Chairman WALSH. Just give your knowledge, please.

Mr. BELL. The letters I have here, nearly all, state that they thought it was on account of their connection with the Federation, as they had been active in talking organization; some give that in their letters.

Chairman WALSH. Well, then, give the dates of those letters and the names, and then we will have that in the record without reading.

Mr. BELL. The names of the writers?

Chairman WALSH. The names of the writers, unless you wish to withhold them for any reason.

Mr. BELL. I would rather not give the names of anyone in the service.

Chairman WALSH. All right.

Mr. BELL. These discharges are not, of course, in the service.

Chairman WALSH. I thought you were just giving those, Mr. Bell, at the present time that had been discharged for activity in the organization?

Mr. BELL. Well, these are, Mr. Walsh.

This is Houston, Tex., J. M. O'Williams; New York is E. D. Shortledge; here is another one from the New York district, C. R. Weygandt; Jacksonville, Fla., S. J. Roberts; St. Louis, A. P. Ferguson; here is a letter, an appendix into a letter, that I would like to read, Mr. Walsh.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Mr. BELL. It is from a discharged employee. It is a postscript [reading]:

"Mr. Wood, our superintendent, called me into his office some time ago and said, 'Hunsicker, I want you to tell me the truth, and if you do not, I will find it out anyhow.' I said, then, 'Yes, sir, Mr. Wood.' He said, 'I hear that you are mixed up in this Pullman union business.' I said, 'Yes, sir.' So he read the riot act to me."

The rest of it is not important. It is [reading] "W. O. Hunsicker, San Francisco."

That is all the letters I have with me on that, Mr. Walsh.

Chairman WALSH. For the benefit of two of the commissioners who were not here yesterday, I wish you would please give the wages of conductors and porters in the Pullman service, if you have it there?

Mr. BELL. I can give that from memory. I haven't it.

Chairman WALSH. Do it from memory, please.

Mr. BELL. A standard-car porter gets $27.50 per month; tourist-car porter gets, I don't remember the exact amount—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Thirty dollars per month?

Mr. BELL (continuing). Thirty-six dollars and seventy-five cents, I believe. That is approximate.

Chairman WALSH. Thirty-six dollars and seventy-five cents?

Mr. BELL. The first six months the conductor gets $70; the second six months, $75; the second year, $80; the third year, $85; after he has been in the service 4 years he gets $90. After 10 years he gets $95 and free uniforms.

Chairman WALSH. I think there is a hundred-dollar scale, is there not?

Mr. BELL. That is for special runs, the limited runs.

Chairman WALSH. Now, please describe the bonus system.

Mr. BELL. There is a bonus of an extra month's pay for a good record made during the calendar year. If you are in the service from the 1st of January to the 31st of December and have not sufficient penalties against your record, why, you will get the bonus.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe the system of book suspensions.

Mr. BELL. Well, I could not tell you what the suspensions were given for. They have plenty of them—plenty of reasons.

Chairman WALSH. I believe they run—the punishments run—from a mere reprimand to a 15 days' suspension?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Well, now, can you describe how the bonus is lost by book suspensions?

Mr. BELL. Well, if they get sufficient penalties against you.

Chairman WALSH. Well, can you describe offhand, for instance, how long it takes them to work out a suspension of 15 days?

Mr. BELL. Nine months, I believe it is—nine calendar months.

Chairman WALSH. Well, we can get that out of the record, anyway.

Mr. BELL. You will find that in the book of instructions there—book of rules.

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Well, we had that yesterday. Now, I interrupted you. Proceed. Have you something else you desire to submit there that you had in writing?

Mr. BELL. No; I had nothing.

Commissioner LENNON. May I ask one or two questions?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. What do you pay for meals when you are on your trips in the dining cars?

Mr. BELL. On almost all roads—the Santa Fe and Chicago & Alton are the only exceptions I can recall—we pay a half rate—50 per cent of what the passenger pays. We do not always get the half portion. That depends a good deal on the dining-car steward, I suppose.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you have opportunities for sleep on long runs?

Mr. BELL. Yes; the regular rules of the company are for the conductor to retire at 3 o'clock in the morning and be up by 7. That is varied some by the conditions on the run.

Commissioner LENNON. Suppose you are a day or two days in San Francisco after a long run. Does the company pay half your expenses for meals?

Mr. BELL. They do not pay anything.

Commissioner LENNON. Just while you are on the train?

Mr. BELL. They do not pay anything in regard to your meals at any time.

Commissioner LENNON. I know, but you get a half rate. Do you get any such arrangement while at the end of the route?

Mr. BELL. No, sir.

Commissioner LENNON. Otherwise than at your home place?

Mr. BELL. In railroad eating houses where trainmen are allowed a crew rate, we get it on identification. We can often get it, and usually get it.

Commissioner LENNON. That is, if you are at the end of a route; otherwise than your home place?

Mr. BELL. Yes. We do not always get that, even.

Commissioner LENNON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any information other than what was listed here yesterday as to what sort of accommodations are furnished conductors by the Pullman Co. at terminals?

Mr. BELL. Well, there are many of them I have seen personally—not a good many; several I have seen.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe them briefly.

Mr. BELL. In St. Louis there is a room over the storeroom with 10 single beds. It is about—it is just across the street from the shops. The street viaduct runs right in front of it with the street cars running over it, and you are only about 100 feet from the railroad tracks; and the storeroom is underneath, and the men are working down there all day. The room is not kept in very good condition, but the linen is always clean. The room has not been properly swept—is not usually; was not while I was there.

In Denver there is a room in the depot there with six beds, right off the cashier's—the waiting room to the cashier's office. It is quite noisy. There are single beds, and the linen is usually clean, so far as I was ever able to tell, although I never slept there, as I stayed at the hotel. The Oxford Hotel would give us rooms.

Chairman WALSH. Of whom did you buy your uniforms while on the road?

Mr. BELL. Marshall Field & Co.

Chairman WALSH. And give the price of them, please?

Mr. BELL. My uniform and cap together cost $21.50. I believe it was. I understand the price has been changed since. I think they pay more now.

Chairman WALSH. State whether or not you know anything about any petitions for increased wages or improved conditions having been submitted to the company by the conductors and porters?

Mr. BELL. Well, I have signed several petitions for increased pay myself for the conductors. I have never seen any for the porters. I understood there was some sent in.

Chairman WALSH. How were they circulated? How did you happen to sign them?

Mr. BELL. The form of the heading was usually gotten up in type and left in the conductors' room to sign—for the conductors to sign; and usually some conductors were active in seeing that you did sign. It did not take much persuasion to get them to sign it.

Chairman WALSH. How, generally, were they signed?

Mr. BELL. Well, I have seen some of them with over 200 names on.

Chairman WALSH. In a district containing how many conductors?

Mr. BELL. I don't know just how many conductors the St. Louis district has. I understood it was about 250, but I can not tell you about that.

Chairman WALSH. It has been stated that the men were generally satisfied with wages and conditions. Now, I wish you would sketch, if you will, what your observation was with reference to that—whether or not the men are satisfied; how they view the company; what they think about their wages and conditions?

Mr. BELL. I do not believe that I ever heard a man state that he was satisfied, and I have talked to a good many. As an organizer I come in contact with a great many, and I have never heard anyone say, though, that he was satisfied with wages and conditions.

Chairman WALSH. Well, do they generally express dissatisfaction?

Mr. BELL. That has been my experience, that they were pretty free in expressing dissatisfaction when they were where they would not be heard by the officials.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever receive the bonus of one month's salary for a clear record during the calendar year?

Mr. BELL. I got it once, and once was the only opportunity I had to get it.

Chairman WALSH. That was in 10 years' service?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir. The first time I was there they did not have that bonus system. The next time I commenced in June and I was not eligible, and the next year I got it, and the next year I was discharged, so I was not likely to get it.

Chairman WALSH. What is the rule as to receiving your entire month's salary when you miss one or more of your regular runs by being "out of line"?

Mr. BELL. They pay you for the time put in, and if you miss anything that is deducted from your salary.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a possibility of missing it? What is the usual custom in regard to that?

Mr. BELL. That is the custom, that if you are out of line or you take—where they assign you next, if you lose any more time than you are entitled to in that lay-over, that is deducted from your pay.

Chairman WALSH. Does that occur frequently enough to make an appreciable difference in the amount of your actual earnings?

Mr. BELL. To some men it probably does. I never missed much myself.

Chairman WALSH. When was the wage scale last changed by the company?

Mr. BELL. I was not in the service at the time. I believe it was in 1911.

Chairman WALSH. When was the bonus system established?

Mr. BELL. I was out of the service at that time. I believe it was about 1910, I think; I am not sure.

Chairman WALSH. At what time in the month and in what manner are the Pullman Co.'s employees paid—the car-service employees?

Mr. BELL. In Illinois they are paid semimonthly, and it is about the 10th and 25th; something like that. I don't remember the exact dates. In New York they are paid weekly, and in Missouri they are paid semimonthly; and I think in the rest of the districts they are paid monthly.

Chairman WALSH. In those States in which they are paid more frequently than once per month, are there laws requiring such payments to be made?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any State in which there is no legal requirement, in which they pay oftener than once a month?

Mr. BELL. I don't know of any. I know somewhere they do not.

Chairman WALSH. Is there anything added to the revenue of the conductor by tips?

Mr. BELL. Well, occasionally. It is his good fortune if he gets a tip.

Chairman WALSH. It is not usual?

Mr. BELL. It was not in my experience.

Chairman WALSH. Could you tell what is the average monthly revenue there would be from it, or was it so infrequent as not to cut a figure?

Mr. BELL. It don't cut any figure. My experience was that I got very little. Once in a while a passenger asked me to go to dinner and eat with him, and he would pay the bill. That was about all the tips I ever received.

Chairman WALSH. Could you give us any light on what might be the average revenue of a porter from tips, taking the most heavily traveled runs and the lighter ones, say, and then the average in between?

Mr. BELL. No; I can not; because that is something you couldn't count on. The only way it could be told is where the porter would keep an account of what he got from the tips.

Chairman WALSH. What superior officers do conductors deal with?

Mr. BELL. He deals directly with his district superintendent and his assistant and the chief inspector's office. Sometimes when there is something serious he is called into Mr. Hungerford's office.

Chairman WALSH. Usually speaking, what are the relations between the officers and the men? Are they best? Do they get along well or otherwise? What is the attitude of one toward the other?

Mr. BELL. Well, of course, it is concealed a great deal; but, in my experience it is not very friendly from the men toward the officials.

Chairman WALSH. Well, do the officials treat them with courtesy and consideration?

Mr. BELL. Well, the dealings with the company are usually very arbitrary. My own experience with them has not been so unpleasant. I had a little unpleasant experience in Mr. Davis's office; but, of course, that don't leave any feeling on my part. It is all over with.

Chairman WALSH. Are you able to state from your observation, running through these years, what effect the employment seems to have upon men? Is it an employment that is conducive to ambition and forward-moving economically or otherwise?

Mr. BELL. I don't think it is conducive to ambition. I think it has just the opposite effect. In the first place, lack of sleep puts a man in a state of coma—partially, anyway. He does not get regular and sufficient rest. And the attitude of the men toward the company does not give them much reason to hope for much better, although there are men promoted. Some of them are promoted to good offices; but there is very little hope for them as I have been able to learn from the men themselves.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall from your experience—could you—how many men have been promoted from positions of conductors into higher positions in the service of the company?

Mr. BELL. Oh, well, I could name a few who have become superintendents.

Chairman WALSH. Just state now how they advanced from the position of conductor and to what other position they were advanced and how many of them there were that you recall?

Mr. BELL. I could not name very many without giving it some thought.

Chairman WALSH. Well, have you given it any thought?

Mr. BELL. Not much. I know several men who are holding district offices now who have been promoted from conductors; but I do not know what—

Chairman WALSH. Well, does the tendency seem to be to favor the men who are running upon the road when those promotions come to be made?

Mr. BELL. Well, I could not tell you in regard to that, because that is something I did not have occasion to look into.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any appointments to assistant superintendencies that have been other than from the ranks of the men?

Mr. BELL. I do not know where many of the higher officials came from.

Chairman WALSH. You do not know, then, but what they were all appointed from the ranks, so far as your information goes?

Mr. BELL. Well, I know some of them that were not. Mr. Davis was not a conductor.

Chairman WALSH. Was he in some other branch of the company's service?

Mr. BELL. I do not know. He used to be a railroad man. Mr. Kramer came from outside, and others—

Chairman WALSH. Pardon me.

Mr. BELL. There are others I could not tell you about. I never gave that matter any thought.

Chairman WALSH. State the manner in which conductors and porters are inspected as to their uniforms before drawing their salaries.

Mr. BELL. Well, before you can get your pay you are called in the district superintendent's office and inspected by some of the—usually by some of the assistant officials; sometimes by the district superintendent himself—the uniform, to see if it is in good condition, and if it is not you are told to get a new one, and if you are passed you are given an order to the cashier to get your check. And they give it a pretty thorough inspection, too.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I do not understand exactly about giving you an order for your check. You mean that if the uniform does not pass the inspection that there is some delay about receiving your money, or does that have any effect?

Mr. BELL. I never knew it to, but I do not know what the orders are given for the checks unless it would.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. When you get an order for your check, what does the order say?

Mr. BELL. I can not repeat that from memory. The order can be gotten. It is a printed blank, signed by the district superintendent's office.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would please state how a conductor is dismissed from the service.

Mr. BELL. He is usually called in and told that he is not wanted any more, his services are not satisfactory. They have a printed blank to that effect, and whether it is a conductor or porter, that is filled out and signed by the district superintendent's office, or whoever is discharging him.

Chairman WALSH. Is it common for conductors and operators to protest against their discharge or demand reasons therefor, and if so, are the reasons given?

Mr. BELL. So far as I have investigated, the reason is given—no reason is given—pretty hard to get a reason.

Chairman WALSH. What system has the company for checking the conduct of their employees, both as to how they act when on the trains and as to the handling of the company's money and turning it in?

Mr. BELL. Well, you are bonded to turn in the money that you receive, and for your conduct they have the inspectors and the spotter system—special agents they call them.

Chairman WALSH. Could you give us a description as to how that is operated?

Mr. BELL. The special-agent system?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BELL. Well, a special agent, so far as the conductor or porter was supposed to know, was a passenger, and he spies on the service and reports. You are not supposed to know who he is, and if you do get to know him, I suppose he is not wanted any longer. It is secret service.

Chairman WALSH. When a report is made against a conductor, has he information given to him as to his claimed dereliction?

Mr. BELL. He is called in and the report is read to him.

Chairman WALSH. Is he given an opportunity to justify himself or produce countervailing evidence?

Mr. BELL. He makes a statement nearly always—usually—in writing.

Chairman WALSH. Are there cases in which the statement of the conductor has been accepted, where there is a conflict between the conductor and the special agent?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I have had my word taken in preference to the special agent's, but not usually. In fact, I don't believe a special agent's report is any stronger than a passenger's report, whether it is right or wrong.

Chairman WALSH. What is your experience with reference to passengers' reports?

Mr. BELL. My experience—I was reported on the Burlington for a passenger's displeasure; I was taken over to the chief inspector's office and inspected there, and I was given much more opportunity to listen than to talk. I told them, and truthfully, that the report was not true, but I got five days for it, just the same; and Mr. Williams, the assistant inspector, asked me to come back when I was in a better humor and talk it over, and I told him I was asking no mercy from anybody, if it stood that way and that was the way they did business; and I guess it is there yet.

Chairman WALSH. What is the system of insurance carried by the car-service men?

Mr. BELL. Well, there is—I believe there are three companies that are approved by the company. Their solicitors are allowed to work among the men and get insurance. You sign an application that gives the company authority to deduct it from your pay, and it is taken out in payments. I believe it is four payments during a certain period of time, but I don't remember what that period of time is.

Chairman WALSH. In any instances do the porters act as conductors?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any case where porters are put in charge and the service of conductors dispensed with?

Mr. BELL. I have a letter here, Mr. Walsh [reading]:

"The conductors of this district are no doubt very dissatisfied with general working conditions, as doubling out the men under the new schedule, which was protested"—I don't know whether I have the right letter there or not.

On the Boston & Maine, or a road from Boston to Albany—there is a case there where there was a protest [reading]:

"There are at present about 40 men here in this district (Boston) out of work. The porters in charge on a number of runs, since the change of time and election of President Hustis of the Boston & Maine; not only are these conductors loafing, with no prospects here, but we understand there is no place to transfer to, as no Boston men are to be transferred this fall; bright prospects, is it not?"

Commissioner AUSTON. May I ask the date of that letter?

Mr. BELL. November 6, 1914.

Chairman WALSH. Is that all the information of that kind you have?

Mr. BELL. Those are all the letters I have.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever had your porters figure on the total amount of tips they had, so as to compare them with salaries, to any amount?

Mr. BELL. No; I never did.

Chairman WALSH. Is there anything else now that you care to volunteer that has not been asked, that you would think would throw light on the general situation in the car service of the Pullman Co.? If so, you may state it.

Mr. BELL. I have some letters here with extracts I might read, in regard to conditions of employment.

Chairman WALSH. Could you epitomize them? Could you state what they are without reading the letters in full?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir; I would not attempt to read the letters in full, because there are other things in them that came to me personally, without having any bearing on the company's affairs [reading]:

"The conductors of this district are no doubt very dissatisfied"—this is Boston also—"with general working conditions, and doubling up the men under the new schedule, which was protested, and a number of copies of a petition sent to the different officials of the company, declaring that the first-class service could not be given without the proper amount of rest and time allowed for meals," and so forth.

"To be sure, it seems strange that every man should not want to go to it at once and try and better our miserable conditions, but they seem to lack confidence. On this district we never had such hard working conditions; men work from 16 and 18 hours out of every 24, as the company has doubled the men out on the runs, cutting down our lay-overs for rest, and I understand this not only applies here, but in other districts as well. If this is kept up we will be physical wrecks in a short time. The conductors are very bitter against the company and the service in consequence is demoralized.

"Are you not in a position to at least bring the matter to the attention of the I. C. C."—Interstate Commerce Commission—"relative to the long hours the company compels us to make?

"Can it be that we are wholly at the mercy of the company and that they are free to work us 18 hours out of 24? Are there not State laws with regard to hours of labor? Surely there is some way to cause an investigation into our conditions and arouse public sentiment.

"I am going to expound the principles of federation in an open manner so as to help bring the organization to a stage of efficiency in as short a time as possible. Of course, I know that by doing this I am putting myself in position to be dismissed by this company. But this is not time to stand on the principles of individualism.

"The conductors are all very much dissatisfied with present working conditions, as we do not get time for rest. Never in my 18 years' service have I ever seen such hard working conditions in this district. There seems to be no limit as to the number of hours the company sees fit to work us."

Commissioner ATSHTON. Is that the Boston district, Mr. Bell, that you are referring to now?

Mr. BELL. No; there is Boston and New York—

Chairman WALSH. Give the last district, please.

Commissioner ATSHTON. What was the last letter that you read?

Mr. BELL. That was Boston. [Continues reading:]

"For several years conductors and porters have requested from the Pullman Co. increase in pay and better conditions." This is Jacksonville. "Petitions for increase in salary have been made and signed by every conductor in several districts and forwarded to the general manager of the Pullman Co., and the Pullman Co. have never made any reply to them. After talking to a large number of employees, I send you the following facts and figures."

This is a record of personal expenses, the balance of this, on the road.

Chairman WALSH. Personal expenses on the road?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Well, that might be enlightening. Could you briefly state what they are?

Mr. BELL. Would you like that in detail, Mr. Walsh? It is two pages, and it has a summary here, a recapitulation.

Chairman WALSH. We have been trying to get, as we have gone along, what the expenditures were, and if it is well stated there, if it meets with what you believe are the facts, why, you may read it. Do you have a summary?

Mr. BELL. I have a summary.

Chairman WALSH. Well, then, give us the summary.

Mr. BELL. Let us see. I don't remember the—here is a summary relative to just what is stated there [reads]:

"On many of the day runs the men are required to run every day without relief and lay-over. On relief runs the men, when relief is due as allowed by the company, are required to report, to protect their runs, until sure that a man has been assigned to relieve them. But, in many instances throughout the system, men run two to three months, being compelled to miss several reliefs without pay for that relief time. On the Pullman buffet cars employees must pay full price for all meals—the same prices as are charged to the passengers. Am sending you several reports of runs and expenses of same.”

Here are 9 breakfasts away from home $5; dinner at home, supper at home—that is relief—9 meals, at 50 cents for trips, $4.50. Six trips a month, $27.

Another place, 7 meals at 50 cents, including street car, tips, etc., $3.50; one room, 50 cents—$4. That is the shorter trips.

And I will say, further, that it is compulsory to tip waiters on dining-room cars to get service, just as much for the crew as it is for passengers.

Eight trips per month, $28; four days at home each month. I will not read you the rest of that, because I will submit this to you, and you can have it.

Here is a summary of 6 meals at 50 cents per trip, $3; 10 trips per month, $30. And in his summary, his conclusion, “Uniform, pro rata, $2; insurance (health and accident), $3; groceries, meats, and so forth, at home, $25; house rent (house not heated), $18; water, light, and fuel, $4; lodge dues, $1; laundry, shirts, collars, and cuffs, $4—57”; and to that add meals and room away from home. That is his cost of living at home.

Chairman WALSH. I can't hear you. What did you say there, just at the last?

Mr. BELL. I say that was his living expenses at home. He says, add to that expenses away from home—add what it costs him to live.

Chairman WALSH. Have you added that to it?

Mr. BELL. No; I have not.

Chairman WALSH. All right; go ahead.

Mr. BELL. Do you wish to take this?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; you may hand that up.

(Statement handed to Chairman Walsh.)

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever figured out the actual living expenses of a Pullman conductor?

Mr. BELL. I never kept account of my own. It always took all I made, so I knew how much it was.

Chairman WALSH. Well, this man seems to have figured it up at $57.

Mr. BELL. At home.

Chairman WALSH. At home. Then he must add meals and room away from home.

Mr. BELL. Well, there is the report of the rest of it on the sheets.

Chairman WALSH. The record of the rest of it is where?

Mr. BELL. That is his expenses away from home on those sheets. Here is another conductor [reads]:

“I can not get by—I can, by being economical, get by on $6 a trip, or $1.50 per day, which totals $30 per month. They even charge extra for bread and butter on the diner now. The men who are the same—the men who are on the same train from Omaha to Oakland claim their expenses equal that or a little more. Of course, the conductors who operate on the Santa Fe get their meals for 25 cents, where we have to pay half rate.”

That is all I have on that, Mr. Walsh.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. You spoke in a letter that you read, November, 1914, from the Boston & Maine, of the conditions. Were those conditions caused because the Boston & Maine changed the schedule and laid off a great many men, and a great many conductors were thrown out of work, or what was the reason?

Mr. BELL. His reason given there was that the conductors were taken off and the porters put in charge.

Commissioner BALLARD. Porters put in charge of the cars?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. You say, on the buffet cars they charge the porter in charge the same price for meals as they do the passenger?

Mr. BELL. Charge the porter and conductor—

Commissioner BALLARD (interrupting). The porter and conductor. Is that the porter—

Mr. BELL (interrupting). That is, for meals.

Commissioner BALLARD (continuing). For meals. Is that the porter that cooks the meals himself?

Mr. BELL. He or any other Pullman employee that eats from that buffet.

Commissioner BALLARD. Then the porter that cooks the meals pays the whole price of the meals that he cooks for himself?

Mr. BELL. That is my understanding, according to the letter. I do not know whether there are any exceptions.

9610 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Commissioner BALLARD. The cook who could not take care of himself is a pretty poor cook.

Mr. BELL. That is their good fortune, and not anything that the company allows him.

Commissioner BALLARD. Do they generally put on old or young men on these runs—these Pullman runs—the conductors?

Mr. BELL. Well, they will take any man that looks good to them, if he is 25 years of age.

Commissioner BALLARD. Are they generally young or old men?

Mr. BELL. Well, they are pretty well mixed as to age.

Commissioner BALLARD. You say that you used to go to the hotels and to the Pullman rooms to stay, you yourself. Do the hotels give the conductors reduced rates?

Mr. BELL. Many hotels will give you a room without charge.

Commissioner BALLARD. Well, do they expect the conductor then to recommend the hotel, or is there any reason for it? Why do they give the conductors the room?

Mr. BELL. I suppose they do. They never said anything to me about it.

Commissioner BALLARD. You used to get your hotel rooms free of charge?

Mr. BELL. In some places.

Commissioner BALLARD. The porter and the conductor on the car, would not they ever—the porter ever tell the conductor that he had a good run or a bad run with regard to tips? Did they ever mention tips to the conductor?

Mr. BELL. They made that expression; yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. That they had a good run this trip, or a poor run?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. Did it ever occur to you to ask how much he had made on any one of those trips?

Mr. BELL. No. I did not.

Commissioner BALLARD. Never did ask how much he made?

Mr. BELL. I never did ask. I was not—I never attempted to make—take any statistics from it, and I never put it down.

Commissioner BALLARD. You do not know what they would make on a good run, or about what they would make on a bad run at all?

Mr. BELL. No. I know what salary they got; the rest, I did not.

Commissioner BALLARD. When the porter talked about having a good run, it did not occur to you to ask how much he had made?

Mr. BELL. Whether it occurred to me or not, I never did. I seldom—that was his own private business.

Commissioner BALLARD. I notice in these expenses you have here, 10 trips per month at $4 per trip, making $40 for the 10 trips; that would be $40 if a man made 10 trips. Then at home it seems to be $28.

Mr. BELL. That was his living expenses at home.

Commissioner BALLARD. That, then, would make his expenses about $68; that would include probably most of his salary?

Mr. BELL. According to what he gives there. Take it in Chicago and many cities a man can not get rent for what he gives there. I haven't had that good fortune.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do the porters divide tips with the conductors?

Mr. BELL. I never knew of a case like that; I do not think anybody else does.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. At these places at the terminals where they have sleeping facilities, do they also have facilities there for porters, or do they occupy the same rooms?

Mr. BELL. No; they do not occupy the same rooms. In St. Louis there is a room for the porters—a separate room. I never was in it. In some places they use cars, and there are other places where they have some rooms.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you ever been any place where the porters and the conductors occupy the same rooms?

Mr. BELL. No; unless they sleep in the car while laying over.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is the wage of a buffet porter where he is supposed to act as cook and waiter and porter?

Mr. BELL. I do not know that, Mr. O'Connell.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Where they run a buffet car on a train with other cars attached, is it part of the duty of the porter of other cars to go into the buffet car and help serve there, in addition to working their own car?

Mr. BELL. Only in cases of emergency. They can go in there and get provisions for the passengers in their own cars and take them to the car. But they seldom go in the car and help the buffet porter in his own car.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There is no extra compensation of any kind what^{er} ever if he does go into the other car?

Mr. BELL. Not unless he gets it from the passengers.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you ever taken up with, or thought of taking up with, the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation the question of having that board take up with the Pullman Co. the questions of grievances in behalf of conductors and porters?

Mr. BELL. No; I have not. I—I do not quite—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you understand the laws under which the board is operating, now known as the Newlands Act, formerly the Erdman Act, under which the organizations engaged in interstate commerce—this board acts as mediator between the workman and the employer in the adjustment of disputes?

Mr. BELL. I have read extracts from this. They were sent me by the Interstate Commerce Commission and by the Bureau of Labor.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. This is not under the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is separate entirely.

Mr. BELL. Well, but they sent me extracts of the law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You have never looked into the matter as to whether the employment under which conductors and porters are working would properly come under the jurisdiction of that department?

Mr. BELL. I never went into that, to tell how much there was to it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you got one of those orders you say is given to the conductor, ordering the paymaster to pay him if he has passed the inspector and had his uniform inspected?

Mr. BELL. No; I have not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You have not got one of those?

Mr. BELL. No, sir; I have not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you ever received one of those yourself?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I received one almost every time I was paid.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Almost. Does it occur every time men are paid?

Mr. BELL. It is supposed to occur every time they are paid. But cashiers have given me my checks without giving me that slip.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then it is not a fixed rule or custom that you should pass examination before you are paid?

Mr. BELL. It is a fixed rule, but—

Commissioner O'CONNELL (interrupting). Not enforced?

Mr. BELL. It is, sometimes, business transacted differently with some men. In my case where I got it without the order was where I had very little time to get to the cashier and had almost no time in the office while the cashiers were on duty.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Under what circumstances would the paymaster refuse to pay you your month's salary?

Mr. BELL. I do not know.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would he have any right to do it under any circumstances?

Mr. BELL. I do not know whether he would or not. I don't think he would.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose an inspector found your uniform with no buttons on and a lot of things the trouble with it; what would he do with you before you went to the paymaster? Would he give you an order so you could get your pay, or would he hold up the pay until you got the buttons put on your clothes, or what?

Mr. BELL. No; he would give you an order to get your uniform put in condition. And I suppose he would give you an order for your pay at the same time. I do not think they would attempt to hold out your pay. They know better than that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They would give you warning not to appear in that condition again?

Mr. BELL. Yes. That is as far as I could tell about that.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Alshon, did you have some questions?

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes. I would like to ask one or two questions, Mr. Bell.

I have forgotten whether you testified or read from the correspondence regarding the number of hours work in every 24-hour period; 16 to 18, was it, that conductors were required to work in 24 hours?

Mr. BELL. Yes, I read that.

Commissioner AISHTON. That was read from correspondence? Is that a fact, from your personal knowledge, on any large number of runs, or any runs?

Mr. BELL. Well, there are many runs where you have to work from 26—well, say from 20 to 60 hours.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is, those are the long runs?

Mr. BELL. Those are the long runs.

Commissioner AISHTON. To the Pacific coast?

Mr. BELL. But the runs he has reference to are not long runs, because the runs where he was running were not long runs.

Commissioner AISHTON. Those runs were short runs, what you call one-night runs?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. What would be the general average of work on runs of that kind as to lay-over? Would he ordinarily get several hours lay-over at the end of his run?

Mr. BELL. I should judge on those runs he would go in about 7 or 8 o'clock in the morning and leave in the evening, probably from 8 to 10 o'clock.

Commissioner AISHTON. From 8 to 10 o'clock. And arrive at destination, the home terminal, the following morning?

Mr. BELL. The following morning.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then what is the practice with regard to the lay-over? When will he go out again, ordinarily?

Mr. BELL. The following evening.

Commissioner AISHTON. He would go out the following evening?

Mr. BELL. Supposed to go out every evening except when he has a relief.

Commissioner AISHTON. He has stated reliefs, has he not, that are provided, and that are granted?

Mr. BELL. He has not stated reliefs. They are only reliefs, but you know reliefs are customary with the company that you are supposed to have a certain number of reliefs on short runs, and on long runs you have lay-overs.

Commissioner AISHTON. How many reliefs would a man ordinarily get on what you would call a one-night run, in a month, say?

Mr. BELL. It is usually one round trip a month. That is what it amounts to; sometimes that is divided.

Commissioner AISHTON. One round trip a month?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. Now, on the long runs, if you take the Pacific coast runs, say, that occupy three days, a man reaches San Francisco, how long does he ordinarily lay over there before he comes out?

Mr. BELL. They are there sometimes over night; some of the runs I believe leave there the same day. There was a change in that, but I do not know just what that is. They used to be there over night, and they used to be there sometimes—in Los Angeles—two nights.

Commissioner AISHTON. On arrival at the home terminal, what is the practice on that class of runs, say a run from Chicago to San Francisco, when a man arrives at Chicago, what opportunity does he generally have to rest? Possibly you may not be able—I think testimony was given yesterday—if you are not familiar with it.

Mr. BELL. I could not tell you; but there is plenty of testimony on that by men—

Commissioner AISHTON. 48 to 64 hours, I believe, is the testimony.

Chairman WALSH. Sixty-eight hours.

Commissioner AISHTON. Sixty-eight hours; the testimony was given yesterday.

Referring to this matter of substitution of porters for conductors, as referred to in a very large number of letters that you read, Mr. Bell, is it not a fact that on the Boston & Maine Railroad, the New York, New Haven & Hartford, and a number of those that are commonly called "summer-resort railroads," it is customary to put conductors on those same cars in the month of May and generally continue them until the month of September or October, and through the summer-resort business, and through the balance of the year the travel is very thin, the number of cars that run in that territory very limited, and is that not possibly the cause of dissatisfaction that was referred to in those letters rather than to any act of the company trying to bring about the present conditions?

Mr. BELL. I know that Boston is a district where they use a great many more conductors during the summer than they do in the winter. The custom has been to transfer many conductors to other parts of the country during the winter season. I do not know how the travel is in that section during the winter.

Commissioner AISHTON. Is it not fair to assume that that same condition prevailed, in rather accentuated form, last October on account of the depression of business everywhere, and that it is possible that the failure to transfer the conductors was due to the condition rather than any desire to put more men out of employment?

Mr. BELL. I don't know as to that; that is a question. As I never was in that section very much, I do not know what the conditions of travel are during the year.

Commissioner AISHTON. I have forgotten, Mr. Bell, just what your testimony was as to your last service with the Pullman Co. at the time you were discharged for various reasons. What was the last date you worked for the Pullman Co.?

Mr. BELL. August 25, 1913.

Commissioner AISHTON. 1913?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. So that your knowledge of the conditions since that date has been from the correspondence you have had with the various parties?

Mr. BELL. From correspondence and interviews.

Commissioner AISHTON. You worked for the Pullman Co. three different periods, I believe; once in the Dearborn Station, where you left for certain reasons of your own; then you resought employment with them and was employed as a Pullman conductor for 2 years or 18 months?

Mr. BELL. About 25 months.

Commissioner AISHTON. About 25 months?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. Then you were in some other line of business for a period of how long?

Mr. BELL. After being a conductor, do you mean?

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes.

Mr. BELL. About six years.

Commissioner AISHTON. You left the service of your own accord, I believe?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. And was in some other line of business six years?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. And then you sought employment again with the Pullman Co. as conductor?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. What was the—may I ask—I do not want to be personal at all and you need not answer if you do not want to.

Mr. BELL. You can ask me any question you wish, and when you ask me something that I do not wish to answer, the chairman will have to overrule me.

Commissioner AISHTON. What I want to get at is why did you go to work for the Pullman Co. again? Did you consider the employment desirable at that time?

Mr. BELL. I resigned as conductor to go into business for myself. I was in business for myself six years and sold out, and I went back with the company after—this was in June, and I thought I would go back and stay until spring. What I had in mind in the spring did not materialize, and I stayed until they did not want me any longer, then I quit.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is all, thank you, Mr. Bell.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard has another question.

Commissioner BALLARD. I was just going to ask you: When you were dismissed the last time were you organizing a union among the conductors and porters?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. And you are still doing that, are you?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is your profession now?

Mr. BELL. I am secretary of the organization.

Commissioner BALLARD. Do you think that the secretary of a union—that you being secretary of the union it would be difficult to find men complaining of the company? Do you think it would be difficult to get men to sign petitions for almost anything?

Mr. BELL. I know it is not, but when men write voluntarily I do not see that the secretary has anything to do with it but to read it.

Commissioner BALLARD. You think then those letters you have read were not solicited or inspired letters, but just the honest statement of the feelings of the men?

Mr. BELL. They were not asked for by me.

Commissioner BALLARD. They were in no way inspired or sought for?

Mr. BELL. Not that I know of; they did not come that way to me, I know.

Commissioner BALLARD. Are they all of them addressed to you?

Mr. BELL. I believe all that were read are addressed to me.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all, Mr. Bell.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Bell, is a Pullman conductor under the charge or direction of the train conductor?

Mr. BELL. That is your instructions. If you go to do anything in regard to the passengers or anything, you are supposed to consult the train conductor.

Commissioner LENNON. Do the Pullman conductors take up the tickets of passengers, or does the train conductor always take them up? I mean the transportation tickets; I don't mean the Pullman tickets; but the transportation tickets?

Mr. BELL. On the Pennsylvania and on the Santa Fe, on most all of the trains, the Pullman conductor takes the transportation in the Pullman cars. On other roads, the train conductor is supposed to take up the transportation, and usually does leaving the terminals, but passengers getting on after that, their transportation is in most cases lifted by the Pullman conductor.

Commissioner LENNON. Can you tell us as to the number of hours per month served on trains as to the conductor compared with the Pullman conductor? Have you made out that schedule?

Mr. BELL. No.

Commissioner LENNON. Have you such figures to submit to us?

Mr. BELL. No; I have not.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, will you do so? Will you ascertain and submit a statement to this commission as to the number of hours, as a general proposition, worked by the Pullman—train conductor—that is, that he is on the train, not somewhere else—and the number of hours served by the Pullman conductor? Can you do that?

Mr. BELL. I could not do that accurately.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, we do not want it unless it is accurate; at least I do not.

Mr. BELL. Well, for this reason, in going from here to Denver—we will take the Burlington. You leave here on No. 3 and go to Denver. You are on the road about 30 hours. You have five train conductors.

Commissioner LENNON. I know; but the others serve a certain number of hours, and you say you serve 30 hours?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. It seems as though there should be some way to ascertain the number of hours served by each in the month or in the week or—

Mr. BELL (interrupting). But that train conductor goes from Chicago to Burlington and lays over there, and after getting a certain amount of rest he comes back to Chicago. He may go back there again and meet the Pullman conductor again by the time you get back from Denver. That is what makes it difficult to tell.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, can you submit a statement as to the number of hours per month that the Pullman conductor is usually on the trains?

Mr. BELL. I can tell you how many hours a month he is on the train on certain runs, and you can—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, give us that statement, when you can.

(Witness subsequently furnished information desired. It appears among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Bell exhibit.")

Commissioner AUSTON. May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AUSTON. Mr. Bell, you are familiar with the work and responsibility of both the train and Pullman conductors?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. Does the Pullman conductor have any responsibility whatever for passing on the validity of transportation; that is, if he—

Mr. BELL (interrupting). Please ask that again.

Commissioner AISHTON. Does the Pullman conductor have any responsibility or any jurisdiction as to the acceptance or rejection of the transportation that may be offered by a passenger—railroad transportation?

Mr. BELL. He is not supposed to have anything to say about the transportation at all.

Commissioner AISHTON. He simply collects the transportation for the action of the train conductor in passing on it and seeing whether it is valid or invalid or right?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. Does the Pullman conductor have anything to do with the handling of the orders connected with the movement of that train or the operation of the train?

Mr. BELL. No, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. Nothing whatever?

Mr. BELL. No.

Commissioner AISHTON. In other words, the Pullman conductor's responsibility is limited to seeing that the revenue due the Pullman Co. for seats, berths, or rooms is collected and properly reported to the company—to seeing that the porters under his charge carry out their duties properly, that the cars are ventilated, and anything else?

Mr. BELL. He is supposed to have complete supervision of the Pullman service, really, without any authority. He has no authority even to put a passenger out of the car for refusing to pay their Pullman fare, even if they have paid their railroad fare.

Commissioner AISHTON. And the train conductor, in other words, is the man they would have to—

Mr. BELL (interrupting). You are instructed to see the train conductor before you take any action—any action of any importance. I was told by Mr. Ryan, the assistant superintendent at St. Louis, that I had no right to give a passenger any information without first seeing the train conductor.

Commissioner AISHTON. I think that is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask you a few questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Bell, is it not a fact that on those lines where Pullman conductors are required to lift transportation and pass it on to the train conductors, that if they accept transportation that is wrong, they are regularly disciplined for so accepting it?

Mr. BELL. I do not understand, Mr. Garretson.

Commissioner GARRETSON. On those lines where the regulations of the railway company, as on the Pennsylvania, requires the Pullman conductor to lift the train transportation, if he makes an error in accepting outlawed transportation, he is liable for discipline therefor?

Mr. BELL. They certainly are.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In other words, they have all the responsibility for doing those things and get no pay for it?

Mr. BELL. Yes. They get disciplined for anything that leads to trouble in that respect.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is there not a very large number of local-service short lines in the Pullman service, as, for instance, Chicago to Des Moines, Chicago to Ottumwa or Burlington, and similar runs, that a Pullman conductor never has his foot on the car in at least one direction, and sometimes more? That the porter handles everything—

Mr. BELL. I did not get the question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That the porter handles the transportation without any conductor on those runs in at least one of those directions, and sometimes both?

Mr. BELL. There are some places, some runs, where the porter handles both in one direction; sometimes there is a conductor part of the way, and sometimes no conductor.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, a very considerable number where there is no conductor in one direction?

Mr. BELL. There are some; yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What line were you on, Mr. Bell? What Pullman line?

Mr. BELL. Well, I have been on several, Mr. Garretson.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, name them.
 Mr. BELL. Well, I ran on the Burlington.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. Between here and Denver?
 Mr. BELL. Yes. I have been on the Northwestern.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. Omaha or Denver?
 Mr. BELL. I have been to Boone on the Northwestern.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. What is that?
 Mr. BELL. Boone, Iowa.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. Boone?
 Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. One of the short lines?
 Mr. BELL. Yes, sir. On the Chicago & Alton—
 Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). St. Louis or Kansas City?
 Mr. BELL. Both.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. Both.
 Mr. BELL. On the Burlington to Kansas City. On the Burlington to Lincoln.
 On the Rock Island to Sioux Falls. On the old Wisconsin Central to St.
 Paul and Minneapolis; and all over the Illinois Central.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. South or west?
 Mr. BELL. Both ways.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. New Orleans on the south?
 Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. Omaha and Sioux City west?
 Mr. BELL. I have been to Sioux Falls and Omaha west, and south to Cairo, to New Orleans, to St. Louis. I have been on the Big Four to Cincinnati; on the Monon to Cincinnati; on the Wabash to Detroit; on the Michigan Central to Buffalo; on the—I guess it is—G. R. I. & P. to Mackinaw, Mich.; on the Y. & M. V.; on the Southern Pacific; on the Santa Fe—
 Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). Now, the Santa Fe were? San Diego or Los Angeles or Frisco?
 Mr. BELL. I was out in Arizona—out there and back. Some of those roads
 I have made only one trip on.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. On the short lines that you were on, were most of them—
 Mr. BELL (interrupting). Sir?
 Commissioner GARRETSON (continuing). Seven-day runs usually?
 Mr. BELL. Well, those short lines, you are supposed to have one trip a month relief; some run two.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. Where the car runs seven days to the week?
 Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. Whatever the calendar days of the month are?
 Mr. BELL. Yes.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. With one relief trip a month?
 Mr. BELL. Yes; I was on Illinois Central to Omaha runs, and have been on 31 nights a month when there were that many nights in the month.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. Did you get any extra pay if you did not have a relief trip?
 Mr. BELL. No.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. If you took more than the one relief trip that is arranged for, your pay is docked for it?
 Mr. BELL. If you get your relief that is on the schedule, why, that is not docked.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. But if you take another relief trip, if you have a relief run for you, another trip besides the one arranged for, do they dock you for that?
 Mr. BELL. They do not have those.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. You can not get relief, then, on your own initiative?
 Mr. BELL. You can get off; yes. You lose that time.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. But they dock you the time?
 Mr. BELL. Certainly.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. What is the average number of trips that a conductor makes, for instance, over the Santa Fe to Los Angeles from here?
 How many hours are used from here there?
 Mr. BELL. It is approximately 60 hours.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How much lay-over does he have either at Los Angeles or Frisco?

Mr. BELL. I think he is there overnight now. It depends on what time he gets in.

Commissioner GARRETSON. So he puts in 120 hours on the trip on the train?

Mr. BELL. Approximately; yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How long a lay-over does he have here when he comes back?

Mr. BELL. I could not tell you accurately, Mr. Garretson. That was given in evidence here yesterday, I believe. I believe it was something like 60 hours.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Sixty hours?

Mr. BELL. Something like that; yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then he puts in two sixties on a trip and has one sixty off?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir. Well, he has a lay-over at the other end.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Could you furnish us a definite statement of those runs, we will say where a man is allowed one trip off during a 30-day month? Take the actual run as the man is required to make it and the time he has off.

Mr. BELL. I could make it accurately if I had the itinerary of the run that the company uses.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, I supposed possibly that might be available to you?

Mr. BELL. Not to me, I don't think; the commission could get it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you know anything about the Chicago-Jersey City or New York run—time on and off?

Mr. BELL. The men are here; some of them are here overnight and some of them are here all day.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is made by men whose home lay-over is Jersey?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you know how many hours off they have there?

Mr. BELL. Not exactly; no.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Can you tell on the Chicago-Los Angeles run, or the Chicago-Frisco run, or the Chicago-Portland, or the Chicago-Seattle, how many meals during the month a man has to buy away from home? Can you furnish definite information on that and the prices he has to pay?

Mr. BELL. I could not give you that accurately, Mr. Garretson, because it varies some.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You could not get it from the men who are on those runs and furnish it?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I can give it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Will you do so?

Mr. BELL. When do you want that produced?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, as soon as you conveniently can.

Mr. BELL. Yes; I will give it.

(See "Bell exhibit," at end of this subject.)

Commissioner GARRETSON. The question was asked you a little while ago in regard to conductors finding out what the income was from tips. If the conductor on the car asked his porter about four or five times as to what his collections were, what conclusion would the porter probably arrive at?

Mr. BELL. I have an idea that he would think that the conductor wanted to furnish information to the company. I don't see what other reason he would have.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Or squeeze his bit from him?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Isn't it a fact that conductors of cars avoid asking such questions on just those grounds?

Mr. BELL. I always avoided it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is there a strong belief on the part of the conductors and porters in the Pullman service that each is induced to furnish information about the other, or is there?

Mr. BELL. It is encouraged.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How is that?

Mr. BELL. That is encouraged.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And the men are aware of the fact, are they?

Mr. BELL. That is their expression. I have heard it frequently.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Among the Pullman conductors what is the general impression as to the line of conduct that brings promotions in the company's service?

Mr. BELL. A pull—influence.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And is it the general belief that anything else will bring it?

Mr. BELL. I don't know as to that. It may be that special service would. I don't know. I never pried into those things. I am above that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Does the company give service letters when they discharge men?

Mr. BELL. I think it would be a souvenir if they did. I never knew one.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What is that?

Mr. BELL. I think it would be a souvenir if they did. I never saw one or heard of one.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then there is no cause of leaving stated in a service letter?

Mr. BELL. Not that I know of.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it a fact that there have been a continuous effort on the part of the Pullman conductors, as well as the porters, for very many years past to perfect an organization among themselves?

Mr. BELL. Very often; several times.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Or in connection with others?

Mr. BELL. Very often.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a general subject of comment from the Pullman men to the train-service men that they desire to either organize independently or by being attached with one of the other train-service organizations?

Mr. BELL. Well, they have expressed desires for both—either way.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a fact that Pullman conductors have made appeal after appeal to the train-service organizations to take them into membership and organize them?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir; it has.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has the discharge of the people who were in charge of such movement invariably—

Mr. BELL. I did not get that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has the discharge of the men who were connected with the efforts to affiliate with the other train-service organizations always been followed by discharge?

Mr. BELL. Those men have been gotten rid of.

Commissioner GARRETSON. They are not in the service if they are known?

Mr. BELL. No; they are undesirable citizens.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a fact that the conditions existing in regard to discharge in the Pullman service at the present time are exactly as they were on the railroads before the employees were organized?

Mr. BELL. I think so; as far as I can learn, they are much the same.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you ever known of an instance where a district superintendent discharged a conductor or porter where that decision was reversed by a superior officer on account of efforts made on his behalf by himself?

Mr. BELL. I have known of cases where they have been reinstated on account of the efforts of somebody, but whether on the efforts of themselves, or some outside influence, I do not know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has the man any chance of appeal above the officer discharging him?

Mr. BELL. Yes; he has a chance.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How is that?

Mr. BELL. Yes; he has a chance.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has he got an appeal?

Mr. BELL. He has the privilege if he can get in and get a hearing.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Can he get a hearing in practical experience? Is that right recognized?

Mr. BELL. It is the opinion among the men that they might as well not try, and many give up because they think it is useless to try. I have known of those cases.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you ever seen any results from it in the way of reversal of decisions?

Mr. BELL. Yes; there has been.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Where the man used no political or business influence, but simply depended upon his own efforts?

Mr. BELL. I do not know of a case of that kind; I would not say that there was not; I don't know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Commissioner AISHTON. I think you said, Mr. Bell, in your testimony, that you yourself appealed a case to an officer at one time, did you not?

Mr. BELL. No, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. Possibly I was mistaken.

Mr. BELL. You are mistaken in that; I never appealed.

Commissioner AISHTON. But as a matter of fact, if a man is discharged by an assistant superintendent, or whoever has that power in the Pullman Co., he has the right of appeal to certain officers of the company—to Mr. Davis?

Mr. BELL. Mr. Davis's office, as I understand it, is always final on that; he passes on all discharges, I understand, and, of course, you always have the privilege of seeing Mr. Davis, even when you would rather not see him.

Commissioner AISHTON. You do not know whether there have been cases appealed to officers above Mr. Davis in rank, do you?

Mr. BELL. I have heard of cases; I have no individual knowledge; but I have heard of cases where they were.

Commissioner AISHTON. You read a number of letters from different conductors who had been discharged or lost their jobs in various parts of the country; you have no personal knowledge other than as contained in those letters, as to the cause of their discharge, or what steps they took to be reinstated, or as to taking an appeal?

Mr. BELL. I have had some interviews with them personally.

Commissioner AISHTON. You have had interviews with them personally?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. But you have no personal knowledge of their cases, other than as you have told us?

Mr. BELL. No; I have no means of getting that information.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is all, thank you.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask some more questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Since you were discharged from the service of the Pullman Co., Mr. Bell, have you made application for service elsewhere in any capacity?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I have to eat; I am employed now, but not in connection with any transportation company.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you applied for any service with transportation companies?

Mr. BELL. No, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Not since?

Mr. BELL. I applied to nobody for service. I was told whenever I wanted to go to work to come and go to work.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You were told what?

Mr. BELL. I was told whenever I wanted to go to work to come and go to work. I have made no application any place. I could have gone to work the following week if I so desired, or that week, the same place I am now; if I saw fit.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Not in the transportation service?

Mr. BELL. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, there are a couple of letters here from porters that I would like to read, if I can have permission.

Chairman WALSH. Very well.

Mr. BELL (reading). "At the present I am not with the company"—this is a Denver porter—"having resigned last month"—this was November 23, 1913. "Having resigned last month, the 28th, on account of the drastic red tape and charges. They paid me a dollar and a quarter short for August and a dollar for September, 1913, besides starting time I claim, where their agent says they don't pay for; that is, I leave Denver for Portland, line 341½, on car, 5 p. m.; leave Denver 7.05 p. m. They claim my time commences at 12 midnight. That is seven or eight hours caring for their property, making beds, and so forth, and no pay. I am for a full-month pay check."

"I trust the movement for better pay and conditions for the porter will be successful. I would suggest that if the Pullman Co. does not increase their wages to fifty or sixty dollars per month we should strive to prevent new men from coming into the service, especially those coming from the southern schools, until our demands have been acceded to by the Pullman Co. If need be, send circulars to the principals of the schools explaining the situation just as it is."

That is from New York.

I have here a financial statement given the Interstate Commerce Commission showing that the company is in position to pay ample salaries to their men.

Chairman WALSH. How long is that statement?

Mr. BELL. It is not very long.

Chairman WALSH. Read it into the record.

Mr. BELL. (reading). "The capital stock of the Pullman Co."—

Chairman WALSH. (interrupting). What is the date of the report?

Mr. BELL. It is not dated; it is the last report, I think.

Chairman WALSH. To the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. BELL. Yes. The dates are on here, and the amounts; they appear here. [Continues reading:]

"The capital stock of the Pullman Co. has been increased from $36,000,000 in 1893 to $120,000,000 in 1915, without the investment of a single dollar by the stockholders of the company. That has been done by the issuance of stock dividends of $18,000,000 in 1898, $26,000,000 in 1906, and $20,000,000 in 1910, and by the issue of $20,000,000 in 1899, which is shown in the reports of the Pullman Co. to have been an issue for the purchase of property and equipment, but which is generally understood to be issued in stock in exchange for the stocks of other companies.

"The total cash investment in the Pullman Co. is shown in its report to the Interstate Commerce Commission to have been $32,601,238.

"On its inflated capitalization of $130,000,000 the company pays regular cash dividends of 8 per cent, which is equivalent to a dividend of approximately 29 per cent on the actual cash investment.

"The Pullman Co. on June 30, 1913, had a surplus of $3,933,793 and a so-called reserve and adjustment account amounting to $27,844.50.

"The Pullman Co. has paid to its stockholders in cash—in regular cash dividends—since 1877 at least $160,000,000. It has paid an extra cash dividend of $7,200,000. This is 1893. And in addition has paid stock dividends amounting to $64,000,000, making a total of $231,000,000 in dividends which has been paid on an actual cash investment of $32,601,238.

"Even with its inflated capitalization, the stock of the Pullman Co. is now selling at 155, and the assets of the company were listed in 1913 in their report to the Interstate Commerce Commission at $156,704,000.

"The company has no bonded debt, and the only claimants on the property of the company are the stockholders."

Commissioner AUSTON. I would like to ask you if that statement covers both the manufacturing and the operating companies, or do you know that?

Mr. BELL. Judging from the statement, I would think it covered both.

Commissioner AUSTON. That it covered both?

Mr. BELL. Yes; its entire Chicago business.

Commissioner AUSTON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Mr. Bell. You may be excused.

Mr. BELL. May I make one statement?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BELL. It was stated yesterday that an employee who did anything to improve the service was recognized. I will say that in my own experience I got up a ticket and submitted it to my superintendent, H. J. Clark, now in New Orleans, and he told me he did not think much of it. I sent it through the mail to Mr. Middler, who was chief ticket agent, and they sent for me, and in the presence of Mr. Clements and Mr. Davenport I explained that ticket, and they only made one objection to it and that was they said it was not large enough. I said, "That is one of the things I want to overcome; you can make the ticket a half a mile long if you wish." The ticket was adopted and they not even said "Thank you." For my part I never expected anything, but I would have been pleased if they had acknowledged the use of it, but they never said "Thank you," or acknowledged the use of it in any way.

Further, I will say that many of the men who have been discharged that have been connected with our organization have found it very difficult to get employment since they were discharged.

Commissioner LENNON. You mean in other lines or from the company?

Mr. BELL. Any line, especially connected with transportation companies.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Mr. Bell.

W. H. Burton; is W. H. Burton here?

TESTIMONY OF MR. WALTER W. BURTON.

Chairman WALSH. State your name.

Mr. BURTON. Walter W. Burton.

Chairman WALSH. How old are you?

Mr. BURTON. Twenty-seven.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. BURTON. 5009 Wabash Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you lived in the city of Chicago?

Mr. BURTON. I was born and reared here.

Chairman WALSH. Did you go to school here?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What schooling did you receive?

Mr. BURTON. A grammar-school education.

Chairman WALSH. Did you graduate from the ward schools or go through the ward schools?

Mr. BURTON. I graduated from night school; I took the last grade in the night school.

Chairman WALSH. What is your present occupation?

Mr. BURTON. I am a waiter at the Panama Cafe and Restaurant, at Thirty-fifth and State.

Chairman WALSH. What time did you leave school? At what age did you leave school?

Mr. BURTON. About the age of 13 or 14.

Chairman WALSH. What businesses have you been in since?

Mr. BURTON. Well, have had numerous positions since then; the most important was porter. That is about the longest position I held since.

Chairman WALSH. You were a Pullman porter, were you?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. When did you enter the service of the Pullman Co.?

Mr. BURTON. I don't remember the exact date; it was in March, I guess. About six years ago this March.

Chairman WALSH. About six years ago?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How long did you remain in the service?

Mr. BURTON. A little over four years.

Chairman WALSH. What was your first run?

Mr. BURTON. My first regular run, I believe, was to Denver, on the Rock Island.

Chairman WALSH. What is the practice of the company with reference to the assignment of porters when they first begin? Do they assign them to any particular service or any particular type of car?

Mr. BURTON. Usually you are given a tourist car, in the district I entered in.

Chairman WALSH. What salary is paid tourist-car porters?

Mr. BURTON. I believe it is $32.50.

Chairman WALSH. How much?

Mr. BURTON. About $32.50; I would not say for sure.

Chairman WALSH. What is paid to the standard-car porters?

Mr. BURTON. Twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents.

Chairman WALSH. Twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know why more is paid to the tourist-car porters—a greater salary—than to the standard-car porters?

Mr. BURTON. There is a good deal more work and you carry a poorer class of people and you don't get as much tips.

Chairman WALSH. Did you run from Chicago to Denver on the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific trains numbered 7 and 8?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Please state what that run was; that is, give the time you were required to report for duty, the time of leaving Chicago, your hours for sleeping, and the time of arrival, your lay-over in Denver, and the time you reported in Denver; give a description of the trip you made.

Mr. BURTON. I was supposed to be at the yards before 7 o'clock in the morning.

Chairman WALSH. Before 7 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir; at the Fifty-first Street yards; to set up my car and have it in condition to receive passengers about half an hour before leaving time.

Chairman WALSH. What was the time of leaving?

Mr. BURTON. As near as I remember, it was 9 or 9.30. We were on the road one night. We left here at 9.30 and arrived at Denver the next afternoon about 2.30, I think it was.

Chairman WALSH. What were your hours for sleep on that run?

Mr. BURTON. As near as I can remember, we slept one way; that is, either going from Chicago to Denver or coming back from Denver to Chicago. We were due to go to bed at 10.30 or 11 and were awake at 3; but quite often passengers occupying berths in the car would wish to stay awake until after that hour, and, of course, I would have to wait until they went to bed.

Chairman WALSH. What was your arriving time in Denver?

Mr. BURTON. About 2.30 in the afternoon.

Chairman WALSH. What time did you leave here?

Mr. BURTON. I left here at 9.30 in the morning.

Chairman WALSH. 9.30 one morning and got to Denver at 2.30 the next afternoon?

Mr. BURTON. About that; I am not very sure of that.

Chairman WALSH. What lay-over did you have in Denver?

Mr. BURTON. Until the following morning.

Chairman WALSH. What time did you report for duty on that morning?

Mr. BURTON. About 7 o'clock.

Chairman WALSH. What time did you leave Denver?

Mr. BURTON. About 9.30.

Chairman WALSH. Were the hours for sleeping the same?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; we just slept one way. If we slept en route to Denver, we did not sleep coming back.

Chairman WALSH. I do not understand that; why did you not?

Mr. BURTON. There was one conductor to two cars, and he relieved one man on one trip and relieved the other man coming back. There is someone supposed to be on watch in the car all the time.

Chairman WALSH. Do I understand that coming back you did not get any sleep at all?

Mr. BURTON. That is right.

Chairman WALSH. Over what period of time did that extend?

Mr. BURTON. From 7 o'clock in the morning—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I understand. How long did you run on that run?

Mr. BURTON. I guess about three or four months, or something like that.

Chairman WALSH. Did that condition exist during the entire time you ran on it?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; that is about the regular time of sleeping.

Chairman BURTON. What was the regular time you ran on that run?

Mr. BURTON. I don't understand.

Chairman WALSH. During what period did you have that run?

Mr. BURTON. I entered the service in March and it was about three months before I got the run—before I went on to the run.

Chairman WALSH. That was during the early part of your service with the Pullman Co., was it?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did you later run on Rock Island 5 and 6, between Denver and Chicago?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What time did you report at the yards?

Mr. BURTON. I reported at the yards at 5.30.

Chairman WALSH. In the evening?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; p. m.

Chairman WALSH. What time would the train leave?

Mr. BURTON. About 10.30 at night.

Chairman WALSH. Why were you required to report at such an early hour prior to the time of the departure of the train?

Mr. BURTON. The car equipment was kept in the storeroom at the yards, and the storeroom closed between 5.30 and 6 o'clock, and all porters leaving at night were supposed to be there before the storeroom closed; if not, they could not go out.

Chairman WALSH. Just give us all of the duties you were required to perform before your train left.

Mr. BURTON. The car was to be set up; that is, put combs and brushes and water glasses—drinking glasses—and making down most of the beds, probably leaving open one or two sections, and keeping watch over the car until she backed up into the station that night, and seeing that everything was clean and checking up the linen and counting all of the equipment on the car and seeing that everything was in order.

Chairman WALSH. How many nights were you on the road, on 5 and 6 between Denver and Chicago?

Mr. BURTON. That is a two-night train.

Chairman WALSH. What time was given for sleep on that trip?

Mr. BURTON. One out of the two nights.

Chairman WALSH. Why did you get only one night? Did the same conditions obtain as obtained on the other run?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; the conductor relieved one man each night.

Chairman WALSH. How long did you remain on that run?

Mr. BURTON. I don't remember now exactly how long it was; I guess about four or five months, or something like that.

Chairman WALSH. Did the same porter—would they run the same porter on that train continuously for weeks or months?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How long a lay-over did you have in Chicago?

Mr. BURTON. We arrived in Chicago at 7.45 and left in the evening of the following day.

Chairman WALSH. At 7.45 in the morning?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; a. m.

Chairman WALSH. And left at the hour you have already indicated of the following day?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How long was your lay-over in Denver on that trip?

Mr. BURTON. We doubled right out the same day we arrived at 7.45 in the morning, and doubled out in the evening at 10.30 p. m.

Chairman WALSH. And it was on the night return trip that you were not allowed any hours for sleep at all?

Mr. BURTON. There was two nights each way, and we slept one night out of the two.

Chairman WALSH. Either coming or going?

Mr. BURTON. Both coming and going.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you sleep?

Mr. BURTON. We had a 12-section standard car, and were due to sleep in the smoking room. If there is no berth in the smoking room for the porter we occupy upper 1.

Chairman WALSH. On those runs did you always have a berth?

Mr. BURTON. Generally we had berths. Of course, when traffic is very heavy, and all the uppers and lowers are taken, there is no place for the porters to sleep, but that does not often happen.

Chairman WALSH. You say it does not often happen; could you give us some idea of how frequently it does happen?

Mr. BURTON. I never had it happen to me very many times in my experience.

Chairman WALSH. During the whole four years it did happen three or four times, would you say?

Mr. BURTON. It happened about a dozen times to me in the four years I was running.

Chairman WALSH. You were then required to sit up all night, were you?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What was the rule in regard to polishing the shoes of the passengers? Is that something you can do or not do, or something you are required to do?

Mr. BURTON. It is something you are required to do; you are supposed to do that. It goes along with the other rules.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any particular place in the car where you are required to take your station to do that?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir; on the camp stool at the smoking-room end of the aisle.

Chairman WALSH. Did you run between Chicago and Lincoln on the Rock Island trains 13 and 14?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe that run, giving the same details you have given us to the other run; what time, for instance, did you leave Chicago?

Mr. BURTON. I left Chicago at 6.15, I think it was; 6 or 6.15, something like that.

Chairman WALSH. P. m.?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; p. m. We were supposed to be at the yards about 4 or 4.30 in order to step up before receiving time; we started to receive about half an hour before leaving time.

Chairman WALSH. How long did it take you to make the trip to Lincoln?

Mr. BURTON. We arrived at Lincoln the next morning at 8 or 9 or 7.30, or somewhere around there; I was not on that run very long, and I don't remember the exact leaving or arriving time.

Chairman WALSH. What hours did you have for sleeping on the way over there?

Mr. BURTON. I don't remember that very distinctly; it is one out of two, I believe.

Chairman WALSH. What is that?

Mr. BURTON. One night out of two; it takes two to make the round trip, and I believe we slept one night out of the two. That run I was not on very long, and I don't remember.

Chairman WALSH. Is it clear enough in your mind that you can give us the details of it, or would you prefer not to?

Mr. BURTON. I would not care to make a statement on that, because I am not sure.

Chairman WALSH. Did you later run on the Chicago & Eastern Illinois between Chicago and St. Louis?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How long did you run on that road?

Mr. BURTON. About two years.

Chairman WALSH. What time did you report on that run?

Mr. BURTON. I reported on that run at the yards at 5.30.

Chairman WALSH. What time did your train go out?

Mr. BURTON. At 11.59.

Chairman WALSH. What time did it arrive in St. Louis?

Mr. BURTON. It arrived in St. Louis at 7.45 or 7.47, or something like that, the following morning.

Chairman WALSH. What sleep did you get that night?

Mr. BURTON. No sleep.

Chairman WALSH. Why did you not get any sleep?

Mr. BURTON. We were not due to have any sleep on that run.

Chairman WALSH. None at all?

Mr. BURTON. No.

Chairman WALSH. How long did you run on that run?

Mr. BURTON. About two years.

Chairman WALSH. Did you run steadily on it?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How long did you lay over in St. Louis?

Mr. BURTON. I laid over in St. Louis all that day until 5.30.

Chairman WALSH. What time did you leave St. Louis?

Mr. BURTON. At 11.59 that night.

Chairman WALSH. What time did you report?

Mr. BURTON. We were due to report before the storeroom closed, at about 5.30.

Chairman WALSH. What time did that train arrive in Chicago?

Mr. BURTON. About 7.45.

Chairman WALSH. What time did you have to sleep on the way back?

Mr. BURTON. No sleep at all.

Chairman WALSH. What relief, or time off, did you get while on that run?

Mr. BURTON. One night a week.

Chairman WALSH. One night per week?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever run between Chicago and Cleveland on the Lake Shore road?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would describe the details of your service on that road.

Mr. BURTON. That is not very clear to me; I was not on that run very long. That was sort of relief work over there. I swung between Toledo—between the Toledo run and the Cleveland run.

Chairman WALSH. What did you pay for your meals while you were running on these various runs?

Mr. BURTON. When we were required to eat in the diner, we paid half price.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate what it would cost you for your meals for a day on the diner where you paid half price?

Mr. BURTON. Well, they averaged about 30 cents a meal.

Chairman WALSH. They averaged about 30 cents a meal?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir; if you were not very hungry; if you wanted to economize you could get along on 30 cents a meal.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate about how much it cost you a day, just as you ran, where you ate on the dining car?

Mr. BURTON. Well, between 90 cents and $1.

Chairman WALSH. Between 90 cents and $1 a day?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, your pay, when you were running on a standard car, was $27.50 a month?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, we will take that C. & E. I. work, where you ran for two years; what would you say your tips would amount to?

Mr. BURTON. Well, that varied quite a bit. One week it would be pretty fair.

Chairman WALSH. When you would call it "pretty fair," what would it be?

Mr. BURTON. Well, if I made on a round trip, which took two days to make—if I made about $4 or $4.50, I had a good trip.

Chairman WALSH. About $4 or $4.50, you would call a pretty good trip?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. When it went down to what might be called a poor trip, what would it be?

Mr. BURTON. I have made as low as 50 cents, that is one way, when traffic was light.

Chairman WALSH. On that road, what would you call your very best?

Mr. BURTON. The very best we averaged about $5 on the round trip, or $6, possibly.

Chairman WALSH. During the time you ran upon that road—are you a married man?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Were you married when you were running on the Chicago & Eastern Illinois?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any children?

Mr. BURTON. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any time that you were running when your salary and tips were insufficient to live upon.

Mr. BURTON. Well, by economizing in the greatest way we could manage to get along.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever receive a bonus of one month's extra salary for having a clear record?

Mr. BURTON. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Why not; what was your experience?

Mr. BURTON. There was always some little trouble that arose, mostly on account of sleeping. I was caught sleeping several times that I should not have been sleeping.

Chairman WALSH. Was that day or night?

Mr. BURTON. At night.

Chairman WALSH. Now, there is a book suspension, I believe, that deprives you of the bonus, that forfeits the bonus?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Was that the offense for which you received book suspension, that caused you to lose the bonus? You say you did not get it once in six years.

Mr. BURTON. Sleeping was one of the offenses; if they caught you sleeping you got anywhere from 5 to 30 days, or something like that; besides, we were generally pulled off of the run and given a bad run, or probably run around extra for two or three months, or sent to the shops at Pullman, which only pays $1 a day. We were sent to the shops for punishment for other offenses also; that is, the cars that needed repairs were sent there and we were supposed to stay on the car until it arrived at Pullman; it is sometimes a day and one-half or two days.

Chairman WALSH. What are you compensated for? What are you paid for doing that?

Mr. BURTON. About $1 a day.

Chairman WALSH. About $1 a day?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. In addition to your $27.50?

Mr. BURTON. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Well, how frequently did that occur?

Mr. BURTON. Well, I made about five trips to the shop.

Chairman WALSH. What other offenses were you given book suspensions for?

Mr. BURTON. I do not recall any but sleeping, I was given punishment for.

Chairman WALSH. The record that you have to have, a clear record, is for the calendar year, from the first of one year to the first of the next year?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How far did you ever run through a year with a clear record before you had a book suspension?

Mr. BURTON. I don't remember that, either.

Chairman WALSH. You don't remember that?

Mr. BURTON. No; often we were given days and didn't know anything about it. That is the reason I don't know.

Commissioner AIGHTON. Just one or two questions, please. You say that you got a book suspension and were deprived of a bonus on account of sleeping?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Commissioner AIGHTON. That was sleeping at night, was it?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Commissioner AIGHTON. Every case was at night?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Commissioner AIGHTON. Sleeping in the smoking room?

Mr. BURTON. I was sleeping in section 1.

Commissioner AIGHTON. You were sleeping in the section?

Mr. BURTON. That was made down—made up, rather—just sitting in a seat; I was sitting in the seat with a blanket wrapped around me. At one time the steam was cut off; I had no steam at all, severe cold weather, and I took a blanket and wrapped it around me.

Commissioner AIGHTON. Were there passengers in the car at that time?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Commissioner AIGHTON. A conductor, did he have knowledge of that at that time, that you were asleep?

Mr. BURTON. I don't believe I had a conductor on that time. We missed connections and they put us on behind a mail train.

Commissioner AIGHTON. That is one of the cardinal offenses, is it not, of the Pullman Co., to sleep at night and leave the car unguarded?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Commissioner AIGHTON. I believe that is all.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. Any questions, Mr. Lennon?

Commissioner LEMON. No; I think not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. To get to the book suspensions, how many grounds are there for discharge?

Mr. BURTON. I didn't understand.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Does he destroy himself when he gets so many brownies under the bonus system?

Mr. BURTON. I couldn't say, exactly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You don't know?

Mr. BURTON. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is there any system of reduction by which you can wipe out brownies?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; there is, for the year.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If you go a year without any, it takes so many off your record?

Mr. BURTON. If you receive five days during the year I think it takes six months clear record to work that off, something of that sort, six months to work five days off. I am not sure whether it is six months or over, but something like that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Out of the porters you know, how many of them got the bonus of a month's salary by having clear records, out of every hundred?

Mr. BURTON. I would say about one out of five.

Commissioner GARRETSON. About five?

Mr. BURTON. One out of five.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Oh, one out of five?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Commissioner AISHTON. Just one other question in regard to that Denver run that you were on on the Rock Island road. I understand you to say that you had a lay-over in Denver of 12 hours, about; that you got in in the morning and left that night?

Mr. BURTON. That was on the two-night run?

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. On the two-night run we arrived at 7.45 in the morning, I guess.

Commissioner AISHTON. You had to be in the car at 5 o'clock in the afternoon?

Mr. BURTON. About 5.30 or 6 o'clock, before the storeroom closes. We are not supposed to leave the car until it backs in the station in the morning.

Commissioner AISHTON. So there was about a 10-hour lay-over in Denver?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. When you reached Chicago, as I understand it, you got a lay-over of 36 hours; that is, you arrived here at 7.45 a. m. and left the next day following whatever time the train left?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. As a matter of fact, if that lay-over had been divided a little more evenly, if you had had 24 hours in Denver and 24 hours here, it would not have been considered as desirable a run to porters? In other words, the sleeping-car employees, as well as the train employees, like to get all the lay-over possible at their homes?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. And are willing to take quite a short lay-over away from the home terminal?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, in a way; yes, sir; for one reason that is.

Commissioner AISHTON. And it reduces your expenses, of course?

Mr. BURTON. Reduces your expense, and your sleep at the other end is usually not so very comfortable.

Commissioner AISHTON. No; because it is daylight sleep?

Mr. BURTON. Daylight sleep and quite a bit of noise around, cleaning cars while we are sleeping in the car.

Commissioner AISHTON. And if you stayed there 24 hours you would get one full night's sleep?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. And that would not be so desirable as to get the entire lay-over at the home terminal?

Mr. BURTON. No, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is all.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. I want to ask you a question. Referring once more to the collection of tips, this run from Chicago to Denver, was that considered a good run?

Mr. BURTON. The one-night train was considered a good run.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. And that is considered the best because you get more tips?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. Otherwise, the long run from here to Denver is considered a poor run, and the porters would rather not have runs of that character?

Mr. BURTON. I would rather have the one-night run.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. If a porter got pretty good tips, would he sometimes say to the conductor, "I made a good run this time," or "I am pretty well pleased on this run"?

9628 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. BURTON. Well, as a usual thing he would not say anything about it at all.
Acting Chairman BALLARD. Does not say much about it at all?

Mr. BURTON. No.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. You started in as a porter when you were 20 years old, as I understood you to say?

Mr. BURTON. About 21.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. About 21. And you were with the company about four years? After you had been with the company two years you got married?

Mr. BURTON. No, sir; I have been married seven years.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. You were married, then, when you went with the company?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. You were married before you went with the company?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. And since you left the company about three years ago, how many different positions have you been in?

Mr. BURTON. Two.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. Just been in two places?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. And you were working for a restaurant?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. Do the restaurants pay larger wages than the Pullman Co. does?

Mr. BURTON. No.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. Don't pay as much?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, there is a better chance to get tips.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. There is a better chance to get tips?

Mr. BURTON. More tips.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. Then, it is customary for waiters of restaurants as well as the Pullman porters to rely largely on the tips?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. Did you, when you worked for the Pullman Co., did you belong to the union—the porters' union, or anything like that?

Mr. BURTON. I was partially connected with Mr. Bell.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. You were with him in helping him organize a union among the porters.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. And finally you think you were discharged on that account?

Mr. BURTON. No.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. That was not the reason.

Mr. BURTON. I wasn't discharged, in fact. I know that was not the reason. I quit voluntarily.

Commissioner AUSTON. He resigned.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. Are you still in the porters' union?

Mr. BURTON. No, sir.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. You are not in that at all.

Mr. BURTON. No, sir.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. There was something said yesterday about the question of extra blankets in the cars. Each berth in the car is provided with two blankets, and neither more nor less.

Mr. BURTON. Each berth, each single berth, is provided with a blanket.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. Do the porters have any extra blankets?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir; they have what they call the porter's blanket.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. How many blankets would each porter be supplied with?

Mr. BURTON. It is a double blanket.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. Just one.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. That is his own, to be used by himself?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. No extra blankets for passengers besides the two that go with each berth?

Mr. BURTON. When a passenger wishes an extra blanket, if there is a vacant berth anywhere a porter may allow him to use the blanket from that berth.

Acting Chairman BALLARD. That is all.

Commissioner Aishton. Mr. Burton, what proportion of the meals, take in your own case, what proportion of your meals would you eat in the dining car between here and Denver—all of them, or would you get some out at the various lunch counters along the line of the railroad?

Mr. BURTON. You are not allowed to leave the car that long to get anything from the lunch room.

Commissioner Aishton. As a matter of fact, there is some arrangement, is there not—I have seen it in traveling over the country—where porters do get meals from the lunch rooms and dining rooms along the line?

Mr. BURTON. On some of the longer runs where the trains have a schedule to stop, say, 20 minutes for the passengers to get out and eat at lunch rooms, then the porter may eat, but usually not. They do not stop at places long enough for you to eat.

Commissioner Aishton. On this Chicago to Denver run, for example, on the Rock Island Railroad, if you happened along at Peoria, Ill.—I think they have a lunch room there, have they not?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Commissioner Aishton. Isn't it customary for the lunch-room people and dining-room people to bring meals out to the porters?

Mr. BURTON. No, sir; never heard of it.

Commissioner Aishton. So that most of your meals are taken in the dining room.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; except some times in the—way late at night, along about 11 or 12 o'clock, I have known porters to jump off at stations like that and get a pail of coffee.

Commissioner Aishton. That is all, thank you.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. You may be excused.

At this point we will stand adjourned until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

(At 12:24 of this, Tuesday, April 6, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 p. m. at the same place.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. Is Mr. Seawell in the room?

TESTIMONY OF MR. H. H. SEAWELL.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Mr. SEAWELL. H. H. Seawell, S-e-a-w-e-l-l.

Chairman WALSH. What is your present business, Mr. Seawell?

Mr. SEAWELL. I am representing an eastern manufacturing concern.

Chairman WALSH. In Chicago?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been a Pullman conductor?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. When did you enter the service?

Mr. SEAWELL. In July, 1909.

Chairman WALSH. And when did you retire from the service?

Mr. SEAWELL. March, 1912.

Chairman WALSH. What salary did you receive when you entered the service?

Mr. SEAWELL. Seventy dollars.

Chairman WALSH. And when you left?

Mr. SEAWELL. Eighty-five dollars.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state briefly what roads you ran over, between what points, during your service with the company?

Mr. SEAWELL. I ran over the C. & E. I. from Chicago to Jacksonville over the same road from Chicago to St. Louis; over the same road to Nashville, Tenn., and over the Pere Marquette to Traverse City, Mich.; the Rock Island to Denver; and over the Chicago Great Western to Des Moines.

Chairman WALSH. Now, will you please take up the first road, beginning with the first, and give us your experience as to the time you reported for duty, the hours you were on duty, the time you had for rest, and these other details that you have heard us ask of the other witnesses?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, on the run between Chicago and Des Moines, the train left at 10:30; I reported for duty at 8 o'clock, and the train arrived in Des Moines the next day at 12:30. We left the same evening at 8:45 and arrived in Chicago at 9 o'clock the next morning. We were out that same night on the Pere Marquette from Chicago to Traverse City arrived in Traverse City the next afternoon at 1 o'clock, leaving Traverse City the same day at 5, and arriving in Chicago the next morning at 6.50. We had—the lay-over was from 6.50 until 10.20 the next night, or rather 8 o'clock, when we reported for duty.

Chairman WALSH. What was the next run?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, the next run was—in fact, I had several different runs. There was no particular run at that time; but the next run of any length of service was between Chicago and Jacksonville, Fla. That was a run that we reported for duty at 8 o'clock or 7.30—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). P. m.?

Mr. SEAWELL. 7.30 p. m., the train leaving at 9.15, or 9.20, rather, and arriving at Jacksonville at 7.50 the second morning. We laid over in Jacksonville until that evening, reported for duty at 7.30, leaving at 8.20, and arrived at Chicago at 6.50 the second morning.

Chairman WALSH. What was your total mileage per month on that run, Mr. Seawell?

Mr. SEAWELL. I do not know. I can figure it very rapidly. [Witness figures.] About 10,580 miles.

Chairman WALSH. And during how long a period did you run over that line?

Mr. SEAWELL. I was on that line about a year and a half.

Chairman WALSH. What was your next line that you ran over for any extended period of time?

Mr. SEAWELL. I had a run for probably four months between Chicago and St. Louis on the C. & E. I., leaving Chicago at 11.50 and arriving in St. Louis at 7.50 the next morning; leaving St. Louis the same evening and arriving in Chicago at, I think it was 6.30 or 6.50; I am not just exactly familiar with the exact time at this moment. The mileage on that, the average mileage per month, was 13,728 miles. We ran six days a week and had a lay-over one night at home.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever figure out what your living expenses were while you were on the road for the company?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir; I have tried to keep them down to the minimum, and the lowest I could live on on the road would be $30 per month.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a married or single man?

Mr. SEAWELL. Married?

Chairman WALSH. Were you married during all the time you were a conductor for the company?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And where was your residence?

Mr. SEAWELL. I was living in Woodlawn on Sixty-third Place, most of the time.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any children?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many?

Mr. SEAWELL. Two.

Chairman WALSH. You say it cost you $30 a month to live while upon the road. What was your total earnings?

Mr. SEAWELL. Total earnings, the beginning of the service were $70; leaving the service, $85.

Chairman WALSH. Did you find your salary sufficient to support your family?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, not to support them in luxury, or anything of the sort; but, of course, if a man had to live on his income he had to be economical as possible in his living.

Chairman WALSH. What was the cause of your discharge from the company—I understand you were discharged?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir. Well, that I don't know. The company never gives any reasons for discharging a man.

Chairman WALSH. Just send out a slip?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is it customary for the men to know what they are discharged for?

Mr. SEAWELL. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do they ever inquire?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, I did not, because I did not feel it worth while.

Chairman WALSH. What are the discharges usually made for, if you know?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, they have offenses for which they discharge men.

Chairman WALSH. Well, what are the offenses that are deemed grave enough to cause a man's outright discharge in place of disciplining him?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, dishonesty, insubordination, and immorality, practically the three principal reasons.

Chairman WALSH. Do the conductors receive any tips from passengers?

Mr. SEAWELL. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any practice among the conductors, or have you observed any practice, by which they add to their earnings, as to their keep?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, I have talked with several conductors and a great many of them do not feel that it is any dishonest act to hold out seat sales sufficient to pay their expenses.

Chairman WALSH. Well, you say you have talked to many conductors that admitted that they—

Mr. SEAWELL (interrupting). Admitted to me; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). Took seat fares from the company?

Mr. SEAWELL. Admitted to me; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What is the supposition, if any, with respect to discharges for that practice?

Mr. SEAWELL. I do not just exactly get the drift of the question?

Chairman WALSH. Is there anything by which it is indicated to the man that he is charged with dishonesty when he is discharged?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, the company, I do not think, would discharge a man for the first offense. They usually send for him and take the matter up with him, and if he continues the practice, why, they usually discharge him for that offense.

Chairman WALSH. So that when a man is charged with what in ordinary parlance is called "knocking down" fares, it has been the case that they have sent for him and discussed the matter with him?

Mr. SEAWELL. I have known it to be a fact; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, does that practice exist to any very great extent in the Pullman-car service?

Mr. SEAWELL. In my talk with a number of conductors that I have had, I think it does; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Does that require the use of the porters as accomplices?

Mr. SEAWELL. Not always; no.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I do not understand; why should not the porter know that such a thing was done, if it was done?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, there are a good many ways, probably, that a conductor could do that without the porter being in connection with it.

Chairman WALSH. In what ways, for instance?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, a passenger can board a train at a given point, and he can leave his grips and effects in one car and be seated in the observation car; the conductor does not necessarily have to check him up in the car in which he leaves his grips; that is supposed to be the car he is checked up in.

Chairman WALSH. How long since you terminated your employment with this company?

Mr. SEAWELL. In March, 1912.

Chairman WALSH. During the time you were with the company what would you say as to the feeling of the employees toward the company? Were they satisfied, as a rule, or dissatisfied?

Mr. SEAWELL. As a rule they were dissatisfied.

Chairman WALSH. Of what did they complain?

Mr. SEAWELL. Of their meager salaries and hours and working conditions.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have anything to do with any of the organizations that were gotten up on the road?

Mr. SEAWELL. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you join in a petition at any time for an increase in pay or change in working conditions?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How was that petition gotten up?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, I can not give you the exact wording of it; the petition was read yesterday.

Chairman WALSH. Yes, but what action was taken by the employees to get the petitions out and get them to the company?

Mr. SEAWELL. The petition was left in the conductors' rooms at different terminals or division points and the conductors signed it, and I know, in the district I was working out of, we tried to get a delegation of two or three conductors to take it and present it to the district superintendent, but I don't believe anyone had nerve enough, and so they mailed it in.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any concerted action among the employees to get up these petitions?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir; they would talk about it.

Chairman WALSH. How would they get together on it. Did they do it by correspondence or holding meetings or how?

Mr. SEAWELL. These petitions were circulated in each district.

Chairman WALSH. Did each district have a representative, or how did they get into concert of action?

Mr. SEAWELL. They simply left it lay on the table where the order books were.

Chairman WALSH. Was there an agreement between a certain number of them that they should be laid on the table, a certain number of those petitions?

Mr. SEAWELL. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. If there was any such concert of action, were you among those that took such action?

Mr. SEAWELL. No.

Chairman WALSH. You never belonged to any such organization?

Mr. SEAWELL. No; the organization was started, I believe, just prior to my leaving the service.

Chairman WALSH. Did you make any appeal to the company as to the cause of your discharge?

Mr. SEAWELL. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of other conductors having done so?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did they get any result?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir; I know of some that have been reinstated.

Chairman WALSH. Who took an appeal to higher officers and received a hearing and were reinstated?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. But you did not see fit to do that?

Mr. SEAWELL. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner BALLARD. When you spoke of this knocking down of fares and that the porter would not know of it, would the passenger know if the money he paid to the conductor was not turned into the company? Would the passenger know when a conductor held out the money?

Mr. SEAWELL. He probably would if he cared to consider the matter; if the conductor did not give him a check for it and he thought anything of it, he would probably know.

Commissioner BALLARD. The conductor does give you a little check that he punches?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. And if the conductor intended to hold out the money the passenger paid him, he would not give him a check?

Mr. SEAWELL. No, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. And the passenger would know that the conductor was keeping the money?

Mr. SEAWELL. Evidently; yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. And he might care or might not care?

Mr. SEAWELL. He might or might not.

Commissioner BALLARD. As I gathered from what you said, your expenses on the road were about $30 a month; that included your meals and sometimes a suit or two extra?

Mr. SEAWELL. No; that was just bare living expenses; you see, on long runs, say, for instance, between Chicago and Jacksonville, the conductor had to take nine meals away from home, because he was on the road two days, or three days practically—three days and two nights; one day on the road going, one day in Jacksonville, and one on the road returning to Chicago.

Commissioner BALLARD. And you charge a dollar a day for that in the expense?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, it will cost you $1 a day.

Commissioner BALLARD. On a $75 salary that would leave $45 for the man's family to live and pay house rent and—

Mr. SEAWELL (Interrupting). Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. So could a Pullman conductor pinch anything bigger than a seat fare without collusion with the porter?

Mr. SEAWELL. No, sir; he could not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. His remittances would have to equal the diagram sheet and the porter's berth checks?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The only possible way, then, that he could put it over the porter would be to report, of course, on a pass that he knew the number for and thought it was not in use that day?

Mr. SEAWELL. He could do it that way; yes; but I don't think he would take the chance; but on the other hand, the porter can put it over the conductor, and often does.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How so?

Mr. SEAWELL. Well, the passenger boarding a train late at night, and the conductor not checking up his train the next morning, and the porter collects the money and fails to turn it over to the conductor.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But the porter could not do that if the conductor checked the people close, unless the passenger got off within the period of a couple or three hours?

Mr. SEAWELL. No; not if the conductor checked his train closely; but that is not always convenient to be done, especially a train arriving in the terminal early in the morning.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, the conductor is supposed to be asleep only from 2 or 3 o'clock—

Mr. SEAWELL (interrupting). Yes; 3 o'clock; and he rises at 7.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The only way to make that trick successfully, the passenger would have to get on after he went to sleep and get off before he woke up?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AIGHTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed.

Commissioner AIGHTON. Mr. Seawell, you have been in a commercial business since March, 1912?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AIGHTON. So your knowledge of runs and lay-overs and conditions of runs and conditions of employment in the Pullman service are more by hearsay than by actual knowledge at the present time?

Mr. SEAWELL. I am speaking of the time when I was in the service.

Commissioner AIGHTON. There have been changes of conditions from 1909 to 1912?

Mr. SEAWELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AIGHTON. Thank you, that is all, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Bourke.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN T. BOURKE.

Chairman WALSH. Your name, please?

Mr. BOURKE. John T. Bourke.

Chairman WALSH. What is your present occupation?

Mr. BOURKE. I am employed at the Northwestern Terminal in Chicago as gateman.

Chairman WALSH. As what?

Mr. BOURKE. Northwestern Terminal in Chicago as gateman.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been in the employ of the Pullman Co.?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. In what capacity?

Mr. BOURKE. I operated as a Pullman conductor.

Chairman WALSH. When did you enter the service?

Mr. BOURKE. In October, 1908.

Chairman WALSH. And when did you retire from the service?

Mr. BOURKE. August, 1913.

Chairman WALSH. Now, while you were conductor, what runs did you have, please, Mr. Bourke? Pick out, if you can, runs upon which you were engaged for some little time.

Mr. BOURKE. Well, I have really only operated on three runs during the time I was in the service. One of those runs, and the first one after I had served my time as extra, which took, I imagine, to the best of my recollection, about two or two and a half months—I was placed then on a run on the Northwestern from Chicago to Rapids City. We left Chicago at 7.45 in the evening, arrived at Rapids City the second morning at 8 o'clock, or thereabouts; left the same evening at 8.15 and arrived in Chicago the second morning following around 7.50 or 8 o'clock; went out again the second night, laid over that day and that evening, and out again the next night, and reported at 5.30 or 6 o'clock.

Chairman WALSH. Now, follow out the runs that you had in the same way, if you please.

Mr. BOURKE. After I left that run—I was taken from that run and placed on the Burlington 5 and 12 as what is termed a relief run. It operates between Chicago and Lincoln, and between Chicago and Minneapolis. Burlington 5 and 12 and Burlington 47 and 48. Burlington 5 and 12, or Burlington 5, leaves Chicago at 6 o'clock in the evening and arrives at Lincoln 10.10 the following morning; leaving Lincoln 4.15 of the afternoon of the same day, arrive in Chicago at 8.07 the following morning. Go out that same afternoon to Minneapolis, reporting about 5 o'clock and leaving at 6.45, arrive at Minneapolis the following morning at 8 o'clock; leave Minneapolis that same evening at 7.45, arrive in Chicago at 9 o'clock the following morning—four nights on the road—and then I laid off that day and that night until 5 o'clock the next day, when I reported for Burlington 5.

After I served on the relief run for some time—I don't recall for just how long—I was given the Chicago-Lincoln run and it was called my regular line. I reported on that line—that was without making the trip to Minneapolis then. There was another relief man placed as I was doing and two conductors, myself and another. We operated the line between Chicago and Lincoln, I imagine, about a year or a year and a half. Finally they took me from that run and placed me in line 100—that is, Chicago to Denver, Burlington train No. 1, leaving Chicago at 5 o'clock in the evening—reporting to the yards about 4 o'clock, leaving Chicago at 5 o'clock in the evening, arriving at Denver at 7.30 the following evening. Laid over in Denver until 4.15 the following afternoon, arriving in Chicago at 9 o'clock the next night; lay over in Chicago that night, the next day, the next night, until 5 o'clock in the evening of the second day of my arrival; and that is the run I was operating on at the time I resigned my position.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would go back over those runs, if you can, and give the hours of sleep while actually upon the road that the conductor and porter had?

Mr. BOURKE. On the Chicago to Rapids City run the porter retired—one car on the run, one sleeping car, that is, that went through to Rapids City; one that cut off at Winona, if my memory serves me right—it was Rochester, pardon me—and the porter on the Rochester car went to bed the first night out of Chicago. The porter on the Rapids City car remained up; he went to bed the second night at 10 o'clock; was called at 3, when I retired; I slept until 7 o'clock in the morning. Coming back from Rapids City the porter retired at 10 o'clock. There was a change of time at Pierre, S. Dak., which very often threw either one of us out of an hour's sleep. The change of time—I have forgotten now whether it is an hour closer or an hour the other side of it; but anyhow, I went to bed at Pierre, leaving Pierre at 2.50 in the morning—3 o'clock, rather. We arrived there at 2.50 and left there at 3, and I slept until 7 in the morning.

On the Lincoln run, Chicago to Lincoln, the porter on the car—there were three cars operating on the line; one car was cut off at Omaha, the other two cars went on to Lincoln. The porter on the Omaha car remained up all night, and the porter on car 2, which went to Lincoln, remained on watch all night, and the porter on car 1, which went to Lincoln, retired at 10 o'clock—10.30, rather—and was up at 3, when I retired. I had to get up at 7 then. Slept from 3 to 7. Coming back from Lincoln the porter on the Omaha car had to remain awake all night again, and the porter on car 2, who remained on watch the night previous going out, retired that night, while the porter on car 1 remained on watch. While the porter is in bed the conductor is expected to stand watch in the car in which the porter is asleep.

On the Chicago to Denver run two cars went through from Chicago to Denver, and the porter on car 1 went to sleep, and the porter on car 2 remained on watch all night. Returning we had a car 3 which was taken from Denver to Omaha and cut off at Omaha. That porter went to sleep. The porters on the other two cars remained on watch. The conductor retired at 3 o'clock in the morning, and up at 7 in the morning.

Chairman WALSH. Are you single or married?

Mr. BOURKE. I am married, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Were you married while you were in the service?

Mr. BOURKE. I got married shortly before leaving the service—six months.

Chairman WALSH. How long were you in the service altogether?

Mr. BOURKE. Four years and ten months; from October, 1908, until August, 1913.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever receive an extra month's salary, paid as a bonus for a clear record?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir; I did.

Chairman WALSH. How many times?

Mr. BOURKE. I received it each time I was eligible to it.

Chairman WALSH. How many years was that?

Mr. BOURKE. That would be four times.

Chairman WALSH. What opportunities were there during the time you were on there; were there charges made at various times by inspectors and special agents against you?

Mr. BOURKE. There were a few of them; I was called in and interviewed.

Chairman WALSH. What opportunity was given employees to explain the charges made against them by special agents and inspectors?

Mr. BOURKE. Well, the opportunity was given at the time. They were notified. We would report into the conductors' room, and our names would be on a regular paper for that purpose. We were to report into the office, or whoever it was that we were to report to, and we had a spotter's report, for instance, against us, dating back possibly a month or possibly six weeks, a little too long to recall just what particular trip; have no way of knowing who the spotter would be; whether it would be a passenger's report—it might sometimes be a passenger's report. It was not always a spotter's report; it might be an inspector's report. The inspectors' reports were always made quicker than the spotters' reports, as was my case for the times I was called in on the spotter's report. There were not many. I do not recall just how many times, but there were at least three or four. And as a general rule I had a pretty fair report, but there was always an "if" or "but" there that had to finish up the spotter's report—in my estimation, in order to satisfy the company that he has really done his work. Everything would be satisfactory, the porter's work was satisfactory, or the linen and the clothes of both conductors and porters were in satisfactory condition, but the porter putting his foot on a berth while shoving up an upper berth, a matter of that kind would always kill a report. I might not be in the car at the time. Perhaps the porter did it, and perhaps the porter did not do it.

Chairman WALSH. Were those incidents which you say did not come to your notice until such a date that it was difficult for you to figure out the trip, so that you could not make response to it?

Mr. BOURKE. The date of the trip was always given in this report; he would give the report about the trip the time he made the report.

Chairman WALSH. But you were not notified of that?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir; not until later.

Chairman WALSH. Until it was so late it was sometimes difficult to figure out in your own mind just what the occurrences were?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What salaries did you receive during the time you were running?

Mr. BOURKE. I started in—I have been trying to recall it since they got to talking over the money and salary part yesterday, since yesterday, and I think when I entered the service the conductor starting out was paid $65 a month; increased after six months to $70 and after a year to $75. Then there was a raise in 1911, I think it was, where there was a $5 raise given. I am not sure about that. I am not positive whether I started out at $65 or at $70, but I imagine from my figures, from the way I figure in my mind, I started in at $65 when I went in; I figured so it would bring me my salary when I was quitting at $85, eligible in two months longer to $90.

Chairman WALSH. During the time you were running, Mr. Bourke, what did you observe, if anything, as to the general feeling of the employees toward the company and its higher officials and as to their satisfaction and dissatisfaction with wages and the conditions of their labor?

Mr. BOURKE. Well, you could hardly go into the conductor's room on any trip, off of a trip, or going out on a trip, that there was not some discussion with reference to the working conditions, the salary paid, and it was always thought to be an opportunity to better those conditions by taking it up in the way of petition in an organization. That was talked about just prior to—the organization was talked about just prior to my leaving the service. Previous to that time there was some—not all of the men, but some of them were dissatisfied about the working conditions, the hours, and the rest; a good many were satisfied—

Chairman WALSH. You say that was general or sporadic?

Mr. BOURKE. Why, I would say it was hard to say one way or the other, when you judge of all the men according to what were in the district office. I never came in contact with many of those talks of that kind, or listening to it, only those who were in our own district.

Chairman WALSH. Were you engaged in any efforts to organize among the employees?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you sign any petition at any time to the company asking for an increase in wages or change in working conditions?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What was the occasion of that, and how did you do it?

Mr. BOURKE. The petition would be hanging, as it was in our district, it would be hanging up against the wall under the relief notice—the notice of the relief runs—hung on a nail there, asking—the petition simply set forth, as you read yesterday. That was pretty nearly the wording of three petitions that I remember to have signed. I have seen the same petition that I saw in our district office, the petition I saw afterwards in Minneapolis, after it had served its usefulness—no; I have this reversed. I saw the petition in Minneapolis, and signed it in Minneapolis, and later on I found the same petition hanging in the district office in Chicago, or the conductor's office in Chicago; it was the same petition.

Chairman WALSH. Could you give us an idea as to the number of signatures that were on the petition, comparatively—that is, as to the total number of conductors?

Mr. BOURKE. I should judge the petition, as near as I can remember, it would hold about 40 lines, and there must have been at least three or four pages at the time that we were operating out of the Chicago western-district office.

Chairman WALSH. How did the number of signatures stand in proportion to the number of employees, would you say?

Mr. BOURKE. Why, I should say it ought to stand at least 65 to 70 per cent.

Chairman WALSH. Did the petition entirely express your views and desires?

Mr. BOURKE. It did; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you sign it at the request of any person else, or to your knowledge did any influence come from the outside or from the company, or was it the conductors themselves?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir; I signed it of my own free will.

Chairman WALSH. Anyone promoting it, that you knew?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What would you say were your expenses while on the road?

Mr. BOURKE. I endeavored to curtail my expenses as much as I possibly could. I carried a lunch a long time, provided myself with a thermos bottle, and in that way kept down considerable of my expense. I ate as sparingly as I could in the diner; that is, as far as meals were concerned, going into them. I very seldom ate a meal in the diner while on the Chicago-Lincoln run. And on the Minneapolis run I didn't eat a meal going up on that run oftener than on the Lincoln run, because I had an opportunity at Mendota to supply myself with whatever I had not taken from home, while on the Denver run I found it a little harder to do that on account of the run being longer. I could supply myself with enough—I used to leave Chicago, have a good dinner at home—leave Chicago and eat my lunch that I had brought with me to take the place of my supper, and in the morning at Omaha get a cup of coffee and rolls and let it hold me until dinner time. Then I would eat my meals in the diner—eat my dinner in the diner.

Chairman WALSH. Were you a resident of the city of Chicago during all the time you were with the company?

Mr. BOURKE. Until the last three months that I was with the company. Then I lived in Lake Bluff, Ill.

Chairman WALSH. Could you give the commission some idea as to the living expenses of a man situated as you are, doing the work that you were doing, who was married? Give us an idea of the rent, the grocery bill, clothing for a couple, and the expenses on the road, living in an ordinary way that a conductor lives.

Mr. BOURKE. Well, for the last six months I was in the Pullman service I was married, and I endeavored then to curtail my expense the same as I had done previous to my becoming married. I can safely say that on the run that I was on, from Chicago to Denver and return—I had no expense at Denver outside of my meals. I stopped at the Metropole Hotel there, which gave me a room.

Chairman WALSH. Free?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Right at that point, why did the Metropole give you a room free?

Mr. BOURKE. Because I went to them and inquired.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I understand they give it to all Pullman conductors free; is that the idea?

Mr. BOURKE. This hotel didn't.

Chairman WALSH. You have no special arrangement with them—some special reason?

Mr. BOURKE. I was referred to them by a conductor who was on the run previous to me.

Chairman WALSH. Do they expect any return for that courtesy?

Mr. BOURKE. They never inquired for it; never asked me for it at all.

Chairman WALSH. Well, did they expect any return for that courtesy?

Mr. BOURKE. They never inquired for it; they never asked me for it at all.

Chairman WALSH. And the rules of the company forbade you to suggest to travelers their going to any particular hotel?

Mr. BOURKE. According to the rules; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Is that rule generally observed by the employees?

Mr. BOURKE. Well, I don't know. I did not observe the rule altogether, for the simple reason that I knew where I was referring anybody to; I knew what the Metropole Hotel was, because I stopped there, and knew it was as good a hotel as any in Denver, outside of the Brown Palace, and I could simply send anybody there and not feel in the least afraid they would not receive the proper sort of treatment.

Chairman WALSH. So the hotel really extends the courtesy in the belief that the conductors will reciprocate, and, as a matter of fact, they do reciprocate?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir; and if I was running a hotel I would be very pleased to take that man.

Chairman WALSH. Now, if you will just resume where I interrupted you and see if you can give me just what it cost to live?

Mr. BOURKE. I figured that my expenses between Chicago and Denver, taking in Denver all day while I was there—my meals in Denver and my meals I ate in the dining cars—I feel it would be around $3 or $3.50 a round trip.

Chairman WALSH. And how many trips per month?

Mr. BOURKE. Six trips per month. That would be around $30—or rather, I would say, $20; I think $20 would probably cover it. I was paying $33 a month rent while in Chicago and that left me a balance between $33—well, my grocery bill always came close to around $20 and we tried to eat as economically as we could.

Chairman WALSH. Did that $33 include light and heat?

Mr. BOURKE. It did not include light, but did heat.

Chairman WALSH. What did your light cost you?

Mr. BOURKE. The light cost me around $2 a month.

Chairman WALSH. How much?

Mr. BOURKE. About $2 a month—that is, light and cooking by gas.

Chairman WALSH. Do you carry insurance?

Mr. BOURKE. I do.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of insurance do you carry?

Mr. BOURKE. Fraternal insurance.

Chairman WALSH. To what extent are you insured?

Mr. BOURKE. Well, I am insured in—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I mean in what amount?

Mr. BOURKE. Well, I am insured for about $2,500.

Chairman WALSH. Life or accident insurance?

Mr. BOURKE. I carry no accident insurance.

Chairman WALSH. You carry no accident insurance?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What would your insurance cost you per month?

Mr. BOURKE. It would cost me about $50 a year.

Chairman WALSH. About $4 per month?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you pay dues to any religious organization or anything of that sort?

Mr. BOURKE. Well, I paid no dues of any kind.

Chairman WALSH. Well, did you contribute for religious purposes?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. About how much per month?

Mr. BOURKE. At certain times of the year a little more than at others—that is, such as the season just passed.

Chairman WALSH. How would it run by the year, would you say $10 a year?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes; say about $10 would be the average.

Chairman WALSH. About a dollar a month; and laundry, did you have any bills for that?

Mr. BOURKE. I can not estimate that; I usually let that go to my wife; I don't know about what it would be.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have any work done by the laundry outside?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever keep house?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. But you did not keep help?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You were fortunate, both you and your wife, in having good health?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir; thank God.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever go to the theaters or picture shows?

Mr. BOURKE. Very little; we did not have any time to do that.

Chairman WALSH. Any amusements of any kind, such as dances or anything of that sort?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir; we would usually take in any socials or card parties or things of that kind around the neighborhood—with my mother and father—in the place I was raised, around in that neighborhood.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have any other property or source of income than your salary as a Pullman conductor?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. If my figures are correct—if I have computed it correctly and you have given the correct figures—these expenses amount to $80 a month, and there is no clothing included.

Mr. BOURKE. I was fortunate enough to save up considerable before I got married, and I was very lucky to be able to hold considerable up to a short time ago, but it is gradually commencing to dwindle down now.

Chairman WALSH. So, after your marriage, your expenses for yourself and wife, your ordinary expenses without amusements, amount to $80 a month?

Mr. BOURKE. Pretty close to that.

Chairman WALSH. And that only leaves $5 a month for clothing for both of you?

Mr. BOURKE. We were never able to save anything in Chicago and that is why I moved out to Lake Bluff.

Chairman WALSH. What rent did you have to pay at Lake Bluff?

Mr. BOURKE. None, because I owned the place. I am living back now in Chicago. We have left there, but are going back this spring for that same reason, because we have not been able to put a cent aside.

Chairman WALSH. How is it with the conductors generally who are on the Pullmans; do they own property outside, or how do they make ends meet, if they have the same general expenses that you have? Do you know; do you hear it discussed?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir; I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you leave the service or were you discharged from the service?

Mr. BOURKE. I resigned from the service, owing to a little trouble which was the direct result of my resigning. It came up shortly before I did resign.

Chairman WALSH. Did it have to do with the discipline of the company or the conduct of the company toward its men?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir; it did not—that is, the real, direct result of my leaving did—yes.

Chairman WALSH. That is, it was on account of the way that you felt that the men generally were treated?

Mr. BOURKE. Well, my particular case, Mr. Chairman, would not call for—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Is it true that you resigned from the company because action was taken in a matter that affected you, that you thought reflected upon your own manhood and that they would not stand up for?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. As briefly as you can, please, detail the circumstances.

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir. Leaving Denver on May 24, 1913, the train conductor and myself repaired through the train to take up the regular tickets, as we had always done, or as we did all the time out of Denver. When we arrived at section 9 in car 2 a lady that I should imagine would be around 35 or 40 years old, accompanied by a young lady around about 18 or 19 years of age, were sitting in section 9 in car number 2. The train tickets—transportation, rather—called for Denver to Omaha and the sleeping-car ticket called for Denver to Lincoln, which rate is $3, and the transportation called for Denver to Omaha, which rate in the sleeping car would be $3.50, showing a shortage of 50 cents on the difference in the two points, Lincoln to Omaha. The train arrived at Lincoln at 5.15 in the morning and passengers that did not go beyond Lincoln were expected to be called to get out of the car at Lincoln, according to the ruling. If they were going to Omaha they should have bought a ticket for $3.50. I inquired if she wished to be called at Lincoln, and she said, "No, sir; I don't." I said, "You only bought your ticket to Lincoln." And she said, "That is all the ticket agent could sell me," notwithstanding the fact that he had sold seven or eight other passengers in the car tickets from Denver to Omaha. I told her that unless she paid the 50 cents difference between Lincoln and Omaha she would be called at 4.30 or a quarter to 5, in order to leave the car at 5.15, the time we were due at Lincoln and at which time her berth was supposed to expire. This she refused to do and said she would straighten out matters with the porter, and I told the lady I was the one to straighten the matter out with, and I would have to have it done before she retired. The woman absolutely refused to pay me 50 cents, and I refused to continue the conversation with her any longer and gave the porter his call card to call her at 4.30.

When we got to Fort Morgan, about an hour's run out of Denver, leaving Denver at 4.15 and arriving at Fort Morgan at about 5.15, at that point the Chicago train passed the train coming from Denver. As a general rule, we would exchange papers. The conductor leaving Chicago the night previous would bring the papers of the night previous, and I would have the Denver papers to throw to him, and he would give me the Chicago papers. I was on No. 6, and while waiting for No. 1 to pass me and get those papers I had the vestibule open. It was one of the new steel cars with a high platform, and I was waiting outside for the other car to pass with my arm outside to get the papers, usually tied with a rope, and catch them.

The same young lady that was with the elderly lady, or the woman 35 or 40 years old, came out and stood in the vestibule and asked me if I was acquainted with so and so, running out of Omaha—five or six conductors whose names I can not now recall, but their names are on the statement I made the day after I returned to Chicago. She asked me if I knew those conductors, two or three of whom I did know on account of running from Lincoln to Omaha a few years before that. The others I did not know. The conversation continued with reference to those conductors for a few minutes, and soon the train passed, and I got my papers and went into the room in the car and sat down and read some of my papers and did part of my work. I had a full car, and all berths were taken. All but one room was the only space open. After I got through looking over the papers, sketching through, the young lady and the other lady I imagine had gone to the diner or observation car—I don't know where, but that is where I imagine they had gone to. But I always had, since I first went into the Pullman service, a feeling of not wanting to sit in a section which had been sold or occupied, and that is one thing that I carried out from the time I first got into a little trouble on account of it. Where a space is sold or occupied I never sit down to do my work in that section, simply because of a comb or a hat pin that was lost on one of the Rapids City trips, and a lady made the remark the following morning: "The conductor sat here doing his work." For that reason I never after that sat in a section and did my work where the space was sold. If I had no vacant space in the berth section through the car, I would repair to a room, and the company extended the privilege of leaving the door open when we were unable to find other space to do our work, as I did in this case.

After a short time—I can not recall how long; it was still daylight—I went into the compartment to do my work in there—to write up my diagram of three loaded cars. When I went into the compartment I sat, as near as I can explain, this way. The window is in that direction [indicating], and my equipment case comes here [indicating], and I sat on this side of the compartment [indicating]. There is a similar seat directly opposite, and the door of the compartment entering in is on the aisle outside and to my back. The next time I saw the young lady my attention was called to her as she was standing at the door with a remark about Pullman conductors she knew and putting her hand against the jamb of the door in that manner [indicating]. I occasionally turned and talked to her and continued to do my work, at the same time remaining as I was, with my back to the door. Finally she came in and sat on the arm rest of the seat opposite me—not in the seat proper, but on the arm rest of the seat. Something drew my attention to the door being closed. Whether I noticed it out of the corner of my eye or some sound attracted my attention to it, I can not recall, but the minute I realized that the door was closed I spoke to the young lady and said: "Did you close that door, lady?" And she said: "No; I did not." I said: "This is not a very nice thing to be in here with you." She said: "I told my friend I was coming to talk to you." That is the first time I knew that the woman with her was not the girl's mother. I immediately got up and opened the door, and as I opened the door the other woman was standing outside the door, and she remarked to me: "What are you doing with this girl in this room?" The young lady said: "He is not doing anything to me; you mind your own business," or words to that effect. I do not recall the exact words, but it was something similar to that. It is in my statement, and anything that is not word for word now is as near as I can possibly remember it after two years' time.

The young lady had not been in the room from the time that I turned and saw her when she resumed the conversation with reference to the Pullman conductors with whom she and the other lady were acquainted—from the time I turned and saw her hand against the jamb of the door until I opened the door fully five minutes had not elapsed; at least I am going—that is a large estimate, I think, as near as my memory recalls—five minutes. I don't think—it was not more than five minutes anyhow. The moment I realized how things were, it was a rather embarrassing position; but I never did think for a second what it might culminate in at all. If I had I would have stood right there and demanded a further explanation at the time; but as it was it was a rather embarrassing position for both me and the young lady to be placed in. There were no other witnesses outside of the door; that is, the woman was alone out there. I went back into the observation car sort of bewildered; did not know just what to do. My work was still uncompleted, because I had left right in the middle of my work and I came back into the car, and when I came back into the car the young lady and the other lady were sitting in the section, and when I stepped up to them to speak to them she, the older woman, said she did not care to talk to me. And so after that I thought it all over during the night; the young lady went to bed, and she, the older woman, went through the train back and forth a good many times, and the young lady went to bed early and she, the other woman, retired, I should judge, around half past 10 or 11 o'clock. Well, in order to get a chance to talk to the woman and make further and better explanation of conditions in the morning I told the porter to allow them to continue on to Omaha, so I would have an opportunity after she slept it over that night—I thought probably she would not be so excited and probably would be able to give me a hearing and allow me to make an explanation. So I saw her in the morning. We carried them on to Omaha, and I asked her if she would not kindly listen to a little explanation. I can not recall, as I say, some of the things that appeared in my statement at the time, but the woman retallated with a remark that was anything but what should come from a lady, and I saw there was no use to talk the matter over, and let it go; and she got off at Omaha.

A good many of the passengers got off at Lincoln and some of the rest at Omaha, and there were a few of the passengers continued on to Chicago and we picked up more. When I got to Chicago that night I had my expectations—the woman said she was going to report me, and so I had my expectations of what were to happen. And when I got to Chicago that night I was told to report to the district superintendent in the morning. When I got down town in the morning I made out a statement of what had occurred, in the district superintendent's office, and he referred me to the general office. I went over there and saw Mr. Williams, Mr. J. A. Davis's assistant. I then made a statement of the facts as they were clear in my mind at that time, and, if I remember right, swore to it, or at least it was sworn to and was taken down in shorthand. From that time until three or four days later, when the papers preferring the charges came from Omaha, I heard nothing more. Mr. Waite kindly arranged to keep me working all the time. I was sent up in the fishing country, on a North Western Railroad train, and was kept out of town, and when I got to Chicago the first night, having in my mind, I repaired home that evening and told my wife and told my father and mother just what had happened—went through the whole thing with them and had nothing to hold back. I did not feel I was guilty—knew I was not guilty, and felt I had nothing to hold back from them.

They sent me up through the fishing country, up on the North Western, for a few days, and when I returned I went over to the office and the charges were read to me. Well, from the time the charges were read to me until I left the Pullman service, possibly three or four months after, I was practically a physical wreck, because the charges were preposterous. They were charges that if I was guilty of the charges, instead of being here I ought to be in jail. Under the conditions that I was placed at that time I want to show you where a man would be foolish, where I would be foolish, to take the deliberate chance of those charges being proclaimed, and if they are here I hope they will be read. It was just two weeks previous to that time that an order was posted in our bulletin book in Chicago—the Chicago western district office—asking for applicants for the position of instructor. That would be a position off the road. That was something that I wanted. I applied and turned in my application to Mr. Waite, and he sent it over to the general office. I was called in a few days afterwards to the general office and was told that they were sorry that they could not give me the position; that my record merited it, but another man from the Illinois Central office had a little better record on account of being longer in the service, and he was awarded the position; but that they would hold my application on file and at the first opportunity give me a position more desirable than what I had at that time. Along with that fact I am only six months married and had then coming what I have at home right now—a little fellow 17 months old. That fact—those two facts together—with the fact that the woman tried to ride short of paying for her full fare, and again a girl with a woman at least 35 or 40 years old whom I did not know, but was the girl's own mother, that I would go to work after almost five years of service and good record and take this girl into a room not 15 feet from where her mother (as I supposed she was) was sitting and detain her as the charges claim for 45 minutes against her will and mistreat her, but at the same time the woman said she was positively sure that I did not abuse the girl's honor because I was not with her long enough. Now, those charges were made and were read to me. I was not given the charges to read. I never inquired for the passengers' names and addresses until the matter was given plenty of time and due consideration by the Pullman Co.

The last time that I went to the Pullman Co. for a further answer and for the names and addresses of the parties making the charges I went to Mr. Williams's office, where I had gone previous to that, and he seemed to be taking care of the matter. They were all very nice to me—very pleasant and cordial at all times. He then told me to see Mr. C. A. Davis—Mr. Charley Davis, head of the legal department, was handling the correspondence, and, in fact, handling the whole matter. I repaired to Mr. Charley Davis's office, was received very cordially, and was told to sit down and asked what my pleasure was. I am getting a little ahead of my story. I was held off my regular run for two months and ran all around different places and was kept working all the time, and, as I say, they treated me very nicely in that respect. I was out on runs very near every night, got very little relief, but I was on short runs and satisfied to be working, giving them all the opportunity and plenty of time possible, and finally, when I was placed back on my run after making a special trip to Yellowstone Park with the Chicago Athletic Association, being gone 11 days, I returned and was placed back on my run, and I made five trips on my run.

Then I felt I was due to find out something about who the parties were, what the result of the investigations was—not for my own self—but for those dependent on me, my father, mother, and my wife, all respectable, and I had been raised respectably. I went to Mr. Charley Davis, and I asked Charley Davis for the names and addresses of the parties making the charges; told him that I had not inquired, was not interested enough to ask it until I knew what the outcome of the charges would be. He says, "Why, what is the matter with you. You have got your job back, ain't you?" "Yes; I have," I said. "Well, what business have you got to look after the Pullman business? Those matters are purely all Pullmans. You can't have anything at all to do with them, and you can not get the names and addresses. Anyhow, the files were all put away and the matter cleared up, and what good will it do you anyway." And I said, "Why, I am so nervous I can hardly work." I was in a nervous condition, so much so that I could not feel that I could do my work properly, and, of course, I told him all that and explained everything to him. I said, "I am nervous"; and he said, "For a man who has been in the Pullman service the length of time, five years, that you have your skin ought to be so thick now that a matter of that kind ought not to get under it." Well, that gave me a decision on what to do. I felt that if the Pullman official was to tell me that my skin, after five years' service, was so thick that a matter of that kind pertaining to my immorality could not get under it, I thought it was high time for me to get away from it. So I repaired over to the district office, and it was there I wrote out my resignation, and if it is your pleasure, gentlemen, I will read it to you—a copy of it which I hold.

Chairman WALSH. What is it, Mr. Bourke, you have to read?

Commissioner LENNON. His resignation.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead and read it.

Mr. BOURKE (reading): "Mr. W. H. Waite, district superintendent, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to tender my resignation as conductor in your district and for the Pullman Co. My reasons for doing so have arisen out of my recent trouble. The position taken by the company in taking me off my C., B. & Q. trains, Nos. 1 and 6, has caused considerable unfavorable remarks and comments regarding my character. And while as an employee it may be wrong for me to criticize the methods of the company in the matter, I can not but feel that in over two months' time, as I am unable to find out or get any information regarding the investigations, that there is a doubt as to my guilt or innocence. I feel that I am entitled to know the names and addresses of the parties who made these charges and I can not secure them. I confess that I can not do my work on the cars with my former spirit, and have the continual fear of something else going wrong. I am deeply grateful for the many kindnesses and good will shown me at all times by you and the office force in general. Your earnest endeavors in this particular matter, in my interest, can never be forgotten, and I trust I leave you with a good will for me."

That resignation was turned in after I had held my conference with Mr. Davis. They were short of men at the time at the Chicago western district, and I had secured a position with Mr. Morgan. If I was not able to get the situation that I wanted I had inquired of Mr. Hill, the station master of the North Western—assistant station master, rather, who had been acquainted with me for some time—if he would speak to Mr. Morgan and see what chance I had. As I came down that morning I fully felt the Pullman Co. would not give me the names and addresses, for the simple reason that I had not been given an opportunity to read the charges. They had read the charges to me instead of giving me an opportunity to read those reports and the charges myself. Anyhow, the position was arranged for me at the S. & N. W. Terminal. When I told Mr. Waite I was going to work for Mr. Morgan at the North Western Terminal, Mr. Waite asked if I would speak to Mr. Morgan and ask him if he would not hold the position another week for me so as to make another trip, on account of the Knights Templar convlave meetings in Denver, the Pullman Co., the Chicago western district, was short of men at that time. Mr. Morgan kindly consented to do so and held that position open for me. He received a good recommend from Mr. Waite for me. I returned off of that trip and I went to Mr. Waite and my resignation was turned in then after being written seven days.

Chairman WALSH. What was the date of your resignation?

Mr. BOURKE. The date of my resignation was August 7, 1913.

Chairman WALSH. I want to go back just a moment, Mr. Bourke. What did you pay for your uniform?

Mr. BOURKE. I do not recall. I think it was $22.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have a summer uniform and a winter uniform?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir; I just had the one uniform.

Chairman WALSH. One uniform; and you wore it both winter and summer?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How long did your uniforms last you?

Mr. BOURKE. Well, usually a year, if good care was taken of them.

Chairman WALSH. Did the company furnish sleeping accommodations for you at the terminals on any of the runs you ran on?

Mr. BOURKE. Well, at Rapids City—no, sir; I slept in the car at Rapids City. The car was cleaned and left in the yard, and I slept in the car there at Rapids City. In Minneapolis I slept in the car. I understand now, though, that there are sleeping quarters there; in fact, the last time I was in Minneapolis on a Pullman run I slept at the Nicolette Hotel—a room furnished for the conductors—furnished by the company.

Chairman WALSH. Did you observe the sleeping accommodations which were furnished at other points?

Mr. BOURKE. Well, at Denver—they had six or seven beds in Denver. That room is in a room adjacent to the cashier's room, or to the district office. Then, it is on a corridor and it is a very noisy place. I never slept there; only once one evening, and that was on account of the convention in Denver and I was not able to get my regular room at the hotel.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed any of the other places?

Mr. BOURKE. I have not been in any of the other places to speak of. I could not make an observation, Mr. Walsh.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Aishton would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner AISHTON. Just one question.

Mr. BOURKE. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. When the officers of the Pullman Co. declined to furnish you with the names of the parties to this occurrence that you have recited—

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON (continuing). Did you have any knowledge as to whether any suit had been brought against the Pullman people?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir; not at that time.

Commissioner AISHTON. You did not?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir; not at that time. I did not finish my story with reference to that at that time.

Commissioner AISHTON. You found out later that a suit had been brought, did you?

Mr. BOURKE. That a suit had been brought; yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. Was not that the reason—

Mr. BOURKE. Well, just a minute, please.

Commissioner AISHTON (continuing). For not giving those names?

Mr. BOURKE. Just a minute; beg pardon. The charges did call for a suit of $10,000; yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. And, in your opinion, knowing as you do now why they refused to give you those names, would you not feel they were justified in doing that?

Mr. BOURKE. I do not, Mr. Aishton, for this reason: They told me afterwards that when—I found that I could not get the names and addresses of the parties, and I felt that it was just as necessary for me to have their names and addresses, when I was innocent, as I feel I am, and know I am, and God knows I am, as it was for them to have my name. I applied for reinstatement afterwards to the Pullman service just before I was out a year, thinking I would get back and be able to get my nights back, if I could. My object in that, for that particular reason, was that when I found that I was unable to get the names and addresses from the Pullman Co., that if I was able to secure a run through Omaha, I would be able to secure the names and addresses from other parties that were probably acquainted, had seen the papers and charges; and when I reported to the company and asked to be reinstated, I inquired to see Mr. Davis, and I was shown in and saw Mr. Williams, and he cordially asked me to sit down. Then he asked me if I was prepared to pay the $500 that they paid this woman. When those charges were read to me the young lady's name was not read, but the charge was read as coming from the woman; and it was so explained to me, it was the woman who made this charge.

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Bourke, I understood you in the fore part of your testimony to say that you had worked four years, was it, for the Pullman Co.?

Mr. BOURKE. Four years and 10 months.

Commissioner AISHTON. Four years you had drawn a bonus on account of having a clear record?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir; four years.

Commissioner AISHTON. And that during that period there had been six or seven so-called spotters' reports made that either yourself or the porter were concerned in?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. On your ran?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. In either one of those cases was the charge—was the report read to you?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. And you were told what was in it?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. And you had an opportunity at that time and did make such explanation as was necessary?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes; I wrote a statement each time.

Commissioner AISHTON. Those explanations were satisfactory to the officers of the Pullman Co. and no discipline resulted?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. Am I to understand no discipline resulted?

Mr. BOURKE. Pardon me; yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. No discipline resulted?

Mr. BOURKE. I received no reprimand.

Commissioner AISHTON. Any reprimand or discipline?

Mr. BOURKE. The only reprimand that I had ever received in my four and a half years' service was when Mr. Davis, the last time I had occasion to talk to him, told me that I had gotten five days after about three weeks in the service. That was the result of a car that became frozen up at Rochester, Minn.

Commissioner AISHTON. That was not due, however, to any so-called spotter's report?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. And your experience in that direction is not different from that of other Pullman conductors, so far as you know, is it?

Mr. BOURKE. No, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. In other words, they have an opportunity to explain complaints that are made against them?

Mr. BOURKE. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is all; thank you.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you, Mr. Bourke.

Mr. Crenshaw.

TESTIMONY OF MR. THOMAS A. CRENSHAW.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Thomas A. Crenshaw.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you live?

Mr. CRENSHAW. St. Louis, Mo.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you lived in St. Louis?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Twenty-three years.

Chairman WALSH. Are you working for the Pullman Co.?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I am.

Chairman WALSH. In what capacity?

Mr. CRENSHAW. As a porter.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you been working for the Pullman Co.?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Twenty-three years the 27th day of this month.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you come from before you came to St. Louis?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Athens, Ala.

Chairman WALSH. Were you employed in St. Louis or in the South?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I was employed in St. Louis.

Chairman WALSH. In St. Louis?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Had you been engaged in any other occupation before you came to St. Louis?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I was in the private employment of Maj. F. C. Gordon.

Chairman WALSH. Maj. Gordon?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. In what capacity?

Mr. CRENSHAW. As a porter.

Chairman WALSH. For his house or dwelling?

Mr. CRENSHAW. At his dwelling.

Chairman WALSH. At his dwelling?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I suppose you have had many runs for the Pullman Co. during those years, have you?

Mr. CRENSHAW. No; I have not had a great many.

Chairman WALSH. Give me all the runs you have had. I thought maybe on account of the extent of your service, it being so long, that it might be difficult for you to tell; but if you can, begin at the beginning and tell the runs that you have had.

Mr. CRENSHAW. Well, I ran about possibly 18 months or maybe a little bit longer on the Frisco out of St. Louis.

Chairman WALSH. Was that when you started?

Mr. CRENSHAW. That is when I first started. And from that time until now I am on the run now that they put me on when I got off the Frisco. I have been on that run very near 20 years.

Chairman WALSH. What run is that?

Mr. CRENSHAW. From St. Louis to Savanna, Ill.

Chairman WALSH. What is the distance?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Three hundred and twenty-three miles.

Chairman WALSH. What road is it on?

Mr. CRENSHAW. The C., B. & Q.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would describe the way you run, what time your train leaves—you have heard it described here by these other witnesses—what time your train leaves, what time you would go to the station to get your train ready, how much sleep you have, how much leisure, and all about it?

Mr. CRENSHAW. The train leaves at 8.10 at night. I am required to be down there an hour before the train leaves, but I usually go earlier than that, but that is of my own accord. Of course sometimes a car will be too hot, and I want to get it cooled off—that kind of thing comes in. And I go down there just possibly an hour and a half before I am due out. A man can go down there and arrange his car in 30 minutes if he knows how to do it and just what they want to do. I am there in time and get the car ready for reception of passengers, which is 7.30, and I leave there at 8.10; make the car down ordinarily by 9.30, and when I have gotten the car made down I can go to bed just as soon as I want to after my car is made down. Sometimes it differs on account of the passengers, sometimes they do not go to bed as early as at others; but usually I get to bed around 10 o'clock.

Chairman WALSH. Around 10 o'clock?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir. And sometimes earlier, but usually around 10 o'clock. The car gets to Rock Island at 7.30 in the morning—Rock Island, Ill. There you will discharge about all the passengers you get, and it lays there from 7.30 until 11.30, so that you usually, there I get two and a half or three hours sleep. It then goes on to Savanna, Ill. We get there at 1.20 and leave there at 4.45 and come on back to St. Louis with the same amount of sleep. I get 36 hours in St. Louis every trip.

Chairman WALSH. And you have run on that road how long now?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I have been on there since the World's Fair, closed in Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. What salary do you receive now?

Mr. CRENSHAW. The salary I receive now is $42 a month.

Chairman WALSH. Just state what salaries you have received from time to time, what you received first, and when it was raised.

Mr. CRENSHAW. Those dates I could not give you; I do not know them.

Chairman WALSH. Just approximate it; say the first couple of years you made so much and the first five?

Mr. CRENSHAW. When I first began to run I think the salary was $25. Later—

Chairman WALSH. How is that?

Mr. CRENSHAW. When I first began to run I think the salary was $25. Later they raised it. When they raised it, I don't know, because I have kept no accurate account of that and it has been several years ago.

And the car that I am on gets up to Savanna at 1.20, doubles out, so that I get all my leisure in St. Louis. I do not get much time on the road and prefer to have it all in St. Louis where I live. I get 36 hours there every trip, and I am gone 36 hours.

Chairman WALSH. I would like to get about your salary first, if I could. Now, it has been testified here that the pay for a porter on a standard car, if I recall it, was $27.50 per month, and that there is an increase of 10 per cent in case a man runs for 15 years, and that would make it $28.25 a month. Now, have you had more than one increase.

Mr. CRENSHAW. No—

Chairman WALSH. You started at $25?

Mr. CRENSHAW. You possibly got the gist of the matter wrong. That 15-year proposition is this: Every man that is 15 years in the service gets 5 per cent of his salary, whatever that salary is, he gets 5 per cent of it every year.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, every year?

Mr. CRENSHAW. If he is in the service 15 years, whatever his salary is, he gets 5 per cent of it.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, each year?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Each year 5 per cent of his annual salary.

Chairman WALSH. I see. Now, then, you have had such additions made to yours that you now get how much a month?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I get $42 a month.

Chairman WALSH. Forty-two dollars?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would tell us, on the ordinary runs, what do you receive in the way of tips?

Mr. CRENSHAW. That depends very largely on the man that is on the car.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CRENSHAW. And in the manner and in the way he gives service and in the manner he renders it. One man who would go on my run possible would starve to death. That depends very largely on the man that is on the car.

Chairman WALSH. Upon what does that depend, the service?

Mr. CRENSHAW. It depends upon service absolutely.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, we will take your individual case since you are here; tell us what you make?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I make $75 a month.

Chairman WALSH. Do you? And the tips?

Mr. CRENSHAW. In tips.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, in tips?

Mr. CRENSHAW. In tips.

Chairman WALSH. And you get $42 salary?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you make $100 a month?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I make that on an average.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a married man?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Any family?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I have got a wife and four children at home; two married.

Chairman WALSH. You have raised your children?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How old is the youngest child?

Mr. CRENSHAW. The youngest child is 6 years old.

Chairman WALSH. Have you some property?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I have no property; no—not in St. Louis.

Chairman WALSH. It has taken what you have earned to maintain yourself and family?

Mr. CRENSHAW. To maintain myself and family and educate my children.

Chairman WALSH. And educate your children?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You have fared that way in tips along pretty well during the time?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I have had tips enough to take care of me and my family ever since I began to work.

Chairman WALSH. Have you made something over $100 a month ever since you started?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Oh, not ever since I started I didn't do that, but since they found out who I was I have been making that.

Chairman WALSH. So, for how many years have you made $100 a month?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I have made $100 a month for 18 years.

Chairman WALSH. Have you lived frugally?

Mr. CRENSHAW. No; I have not. I have taken good care of my family and my mother.

Chairman WALSH. Have you had your mother with you?

Mr. CRENSHAW. No; she does not live with me, but I take care of her.

Chairman WALSH. You say you have two children married?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I have two children married.

Chairman WALSH. How old are the other two?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I have got a boy 17 in high school, one 15 in high school, a girl 11 years old in grammar school, and the baby boy at home.

Chairman WALSH. Have you had one conductor to run with you usually?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I have had one conductor for more than 11 years.

Chairman WALSH. Does he make each trip with you?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What hours does he have for his rest?

Mr. CRENSHAW. On the run that he is on now he is on duty all night.

Chairman WALSH. Is he a married man?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. With a family?

Mr. CRENSHAW. He has got a wife; he has not got children.

Chairman WALSH. Where does he live?

Mr. CRENSHAW. In St. Louis.

Chairman WALSH. What salary does he get?

Mr. CRENSHAW. He gets $95 a month.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead. I interrupted you. You were talking about the time he took for his rest.

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes; he is on duty all night, and he relieves us both ways. He is on that run from choice; he prefers that run.

Chairman WALSH. Did they want him to have some other run?

Mr. CRENSHAW. They have offered to give him a run to Denver. I do not know what the choice is. I could not tell you that.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any other porter that runs opposite to you on that run?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And how long has he been with the company?

Mr. CRENSHAW. He has been with the company longer than I have. I don't know how long.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you stated that the amount of your compensation, the amount of the compensation depended a great deal on the man that performed the service; on the porter himself.

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir; that is the fact.

Chairman WALSH. Now, is the porter that runs opposite to you an old man also—

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). On the run.

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know anything as to what he earns?

Mr. CRENSHAW. He is here himself.

Chairman WALSH. He is here himself.

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner BALLARD. You say you have no property in St. Louis.

Mr. CRENSHAW. No, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. Have you property anywhere else?

Mr. CRENSHAW. I have some in Birmingham, Ala.

Commissioner BALLARD. That you have saved up your money and bought since you have been with the Pullman Co.?

Mr. CRENSHAW. No, I did not. I have not bought any property since I have been with the Pullman Co.

Commissioner BALLARD. But you have some property in Birmingham, Ala.?

Mr. CRENSHAW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AUSTON. Mr. Crenshaw, this run that you are on is not counted as a particularly good run with you only so far as the lay-over is concerned.

Mr. CRENSHAW. The run is not unusually good, except the lay-over. It is a fairly good run on the whole, and the class of wealthy people, they are sons and daughters of lumbermen who have made their money along the river there, and if you get acquainted with those people, treat them right, handle them right, wait on them right, why, they don't forget you.

Commissioner BALLARD. The principal advantage in that long run is, as runs go, the 36-hour lay-over at St. Louis and the short lay-over at the other end.

Mr. CRENSHAW. The short lay-over at the other end; that is it.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson asks me to ask whether that is a straight sleeper or buffet?

Mr. CRENSHAW. That is a straight sleeper.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you. You may be excused.

Mr. Sylvester.

TESTIMONY OF MR. G. H. SYLVESTER.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name?

Mr. SYLVESTER. G. H. Sylvester.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. SYLVESTER. New York City.

Chairman WALSH. And you are employed by the Pullman Co.?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. In what capacity?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Pullman porter.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you been a porter?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Twenty years.

Chairman WALSH. For the Pullman Co.

Mr. SYLVESTER. Twenty years.

Chairman WALSH. What road are you running on at the present time?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Lake Shore & Michigan Southern.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you been running on that road?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Eighteen years.

Chairman WALSH. And prior to that time where did you run?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I was running all over, as all extra porters do.

Chairman WALSH. Well, you have been running on this same road, on this same run, for the past 18 years?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I ran on the road for 18 years on the Twentieth Century. It will be 18 years the 15th of this June coming, ever since the train has been on.

Chairman WALSH. What is your salary?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents a month.

Chairman WALSH. I would just like to get an understanding, if I can; you have been running for 20 years?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How does it happen your pay has not been increased?

Mr. SYLVESTER. It depends upon the run some. If you run in charge you get more money; if you run in charge. For instance, we have a conductor with us all the way. If I was running in charge at any distance I would get $42.

Chairman WALSH. You heard the explanation that the last witness made about it, didn't you?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Or could you hear from where you were?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I could hear him distinctly; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That is a fact, that they start a porter at $25 a month, and after he has been in service 15 years they increase 5 per cent per year?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir; I beg pardon.

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed. That was all I was going to say.

Mr. SYLVESTER. I started at $20. I started with the Wagner Co., and then after about five years the Pullman taken us over, and then we remained at $20 a month for a long time, and then was raised $5, and then we got 10 per cent raise, which made $27.50, and when you are in the company 15 years you get 5 per cent of your actual earnings.

Chairman WALSH. Added to the—

Mr. SYLVESTER. Added to your—

Chairman WALSH (continuing). Salary each year?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And when do you get that; monthly?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Oh, no; you do not get it monthly. It is given to you in a check at the end of the year.

Chairman WALSH. Your salary at the present time is $27.50?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents from the Pullman.

Chairman WALSH. And what is the check at the end of the year?

Mr. SYLVESTER. That is a bonus, the 5 per cent check.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.
 Mr. SYLVESTER. And my 5 per cent this year was $15.75.
 Chairman WALSH. Fifteen dollars and seventy-five cents?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. Fifteen dollars and seventy-five cents.
 Chairman WALSH. What do you receive through the source of tips, would you say, per month?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. Seventy-five or eighty dollars.
 Chairman WALSH. Seventy-five or eighty dollars?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. Ye.
 Chairman WALSH. Added to $27.50?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. And $15.75.
 Chairman WALSH. And the bonus of about?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. Twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents.
 Chairman WALSH. About $125 a month?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. Any other compensation?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. Sick benefits. If I am sick I get $6.33 a week from the Pullman Co.
 Chairman WALSH. How much?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. From the Pullman Co., $6.33; get my full wages; if I am sick I get paid.
 Chairman WALSH. Do you pay anything for the sick benefit?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. No, sir; it is given to me by the Pullman Co.
 Chairman WALSH. Approximately what would you earn per month?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. One hundred and twenty dollars.
 Chairman WALSH. Oh, $120 a month?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.
 Chairman WALSH. Are you a married man?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. A family?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. No, sir; no family.
 Chairman WALSH. Where do you live?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. That is, my location in New York?
 Chairman WALSH. You live in New York?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes; I live in New York.
 Chairman WALSH. In the city?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. In the city; yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. Do you own property?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. No; I do not; not in the city. I own some down in Jersey, where I was born.
 Chairman WALSH. Did you purchase that property?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. Since I came with the Pullman Co.? No, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. Have you any accumulation from your salary and tips as a Pullman porter?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. Just a little; yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. That is, by way of saving?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. By way of saving.
 Chairman WALSH. Cash?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. If I haven't more, it is my fault, sir, because I have made more.
 Chairman WALSH. What rent do you pay in New York?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. I pay $20, steam-heated flat.
 Chairman WALSH. What does it cost to live while on the road?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. It costs me about $25 a month.
 Chairman WALSH. How are your meals charged for on the road, that you eat in the dining cars?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. I do not eat in the dining car coming out from New York, because we leave on the 2.45, and I get breakfast and have lunch with me, and we have the advantage; the dining-car people are very nice, and if I have a lunch with me I can take it in to them, and they will warm it up for me, and in that way I do not take the meal with me; but if we eat a meal from the dining car we get it for half price.
 Chairman WALSH. About what does the meal cost you at half price in the dining car?
 Mr. SYLVESTER. At half price in the dining car, from 40 to 45 cents, depending upon how hungry you are.

Chairman WALSH. How many meals do you take in the dining car?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Take one if we eat coming to Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. One what?

Mr. SYLVESTER. One meal coming this way; coffee in the morning before you get here, because you see it would be so long before we got breakfast; and then going back we get lunch on the dining car.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I wish you would describe your trip on this road; that is, what time you go to the station to get ready to leave, and what time you leave, and the amount of sleep you get, the lay-over at each end?

Mr. SYLVESTER. We report for this run in particular at 12 o'clock. We leave at 2.45—half past 12, and we arrive in Chicago the next morning at 9.45, with no sleep.

Chairman WALSH. With what?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No sleep. You ain't supposed to get any sleep.

Chairman WALSH. What time does the conductor have to sleep?

Mr. SYLVESTER. He changes off with the Boston man. I think he goes about at 3 o'clock and gets up at 7, and then, you see, we get in here at 9.45, and we do not report the next day until 10.30 on the trip back.

Chairman WALSH. Ten-thirty in the morning?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And then going back?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No sleep.

Chairman WALSH. What time do you report?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Here? Ten-thirty.

Chairman WALSH. Ten-thirty?

Mr. SYLVESTER. We leave at 12.40.

Chairman WALSH. What time do you arrive in New York?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Nine-forty.

Chairman WALSH. And how long do you lay over?

Mr. SYLVESTER. We lay over from 9.40 until the following day at 12.30.

Chairman WALSH. Approximately the same for each change?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes. We have the same time on.

Chairman WALSH. One night on the road you have, and then a day off?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That would be practically the same as a night watchman working the entire night and sleeping in the daytime?

Mr. SYLVESTER. They sleep in daytime. Don't let them tell you they don't sleep a little at night, too, either.

Chairman WALSH. They do sleep?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Oh, yes; they do. Indeed, if any porter or conductor tells you that they run a thousand miles and don't get any sleep, he is mixed, because he is telling you an untruth.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been reported for being asleep?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No, sir. There is another mistake that they make—getting caught. They know the truth.

Chairman WALSH. They know?

Mr. SYLVESTER. They know you sleep. Every superintendent here knows you sleep, but he don't want you to get caught.

Chairman WALSH. Does that apply to conductors, too?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Just the same; yes.

Chairman WALSH. So that, as a matter of fact, the rules provide a suspension for that—

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir; they do.

Chairman WALSH. But the general information is, among the employees, is that everybody does it, and if they don't get caught—it is only an offense when they are caught?

Mr. SYLVESTER. That is the only offense, getting caught.

Chairman WALSH. What is the custom with respect to inspecting the cars and the conduct of the men on the road?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Well, I have always, since I have been on the road, after I went in the service, found out what—expected every time I came out of a terminal, I believed that I had a spotter on and consequently I have never had any trouble. I am always figuring for him.

Chairman WALSH. Always what?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I am always figuring; I think he is on every time I take a car.

Chairman WALSH. When do you take these little naps you speak of?

Mr. SYLVESTER. He can't get to me then.

Chairman WALSH. How do you work that out?

Mr. SYLVESTER. He is in bed.

Chairman WALSH. When do you get that sleep?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Oh, nap off between stations.

Chairman WALSH. How is that?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Oh, nap off between stations, get naps or watching your car. You don't deliberately take a pillow and blanket and go to bed, or anything like that, but you are bound to be nodding a little, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you been up before the inspectors for any violations of the rules in the past years?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I have not, sir. I have not been—

Chairman WALSH. Have you for the past two or three years?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I have not been before the inspectors in 15 years for a violation of anything that amounted to anything.

Chairman WALSH. When you were charged with a violation of the rules, have you an opportunity to present your side of the case to the company and have they heard it?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I have; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And how did it result in your cases?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I generally was vindicated.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Sylvester.

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Supposing there was to be a law passed in various States through which the Twentieth Century Limited passed, between New York and Chicago, prohibiting the giving of tips so that your income would be cut down to $27.50 per month with the 5 per cent bonus that you get, would you still continue to be a Pullman porter?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I would not, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then you would continue to be a porter simply because of the contributions made to you by the public?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And your earnings are three times greater than that paid you by the company as a salary?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So that the public are really contributing to your living as a porter?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Well, they are in a way, and they fairly understand it that way, too, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If you were prohibited from taking tips, if your salary was $27.50 a month, you would not continue to be a porter?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I would not, for you couldn't live on it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What do you think would be necessary for the men if their salary was limited to $27.50 a month, and there was no other source of income than by voluntary contribution, or otherwise, what do you think would be necessary for them to do to improve their conditions?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Ask the Pullman Co. to give us living wages.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose they would not do it?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Then there would be no porters on the cars.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose there was a possibility of the men getting together and organizing and agreeing that they would stop work if the company did not give them a living wage?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No; I don't think it would be necessary for them to get together to make that agreement, because they would generally go on for themselves—what I mean, you wouldn't have to have an agreement, because a man could not live and keep a respectable home and be honest. It wouldn't be safe to get on a car with over $2 in your pocket if you had to work that way, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you ever been approached in the matter of joining an organization?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I have not. I was approached over in Chicago at the time it started.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you sign any?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I did not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You did not indicate your desire to join any organization?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You were satisfied because of the income you were securing from the public?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes. And the thing did not look just right to me. I did not seem to know the people that were in behind this, inaugurated it. I did not know anything about them. There was nobody that had taken it up in our district; that is, in the New York district there. It seemed to be all western men, and we were not acquainted with them, and did not thoroughly understand it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there some fraternal organization among the porters of the country?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Oh, yes; not pertaining to the Pullman Co. in particular.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am not speaking of the Pullman Co., but just any organization between the porters generally?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Where they contribute and pay benefits to each other?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What kind of an organization is that?

Mr. SYLVESTER. The organization of which I am a member is called the New York Association of Pullman Porters, the Pullman Athletic Association.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The New York Athletic Association of Porters?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Pullman Porters. They contribute $5 a week sick benefits.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And what do you pay into it?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Fifty cents a month.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does that reach outside of New York?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No; this is particularly in New York. Then there is an organization here of the Pullman porters, and I think you will find it in all large districts, organizations composed of porters.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there any national form of organization?

Mr. SYLVESTER. There is no national form.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They simply organize locally?

Mr. SYLVESTER. They simply organize locally.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And are they all organized on the same basis, pay the same benefits and the same dues?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Just about the same.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there any person among the porters who makes it his business to go around and organize these men into these organizations?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No; there is not. We get together mutually—agreeably.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Isn't there somebody that brings you together and suggests that you could do it?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir; we get together and talk the matter over and see it is necessary for us to have sick and death benefits.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is anyone in charge of the Pullman Co. that has suggested the getting together in that sort of an organization?

Mr. SYLVESTER. They have not suggested it exactly. They have been instrumental in helping us form, and they have helped us in a great many ways.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do they contribute in any way, financially or otherwise?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In what way do they contribute?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Well, in case of giving an entertainment, I think I am safe in saying that the Pullman officials here in Chicago got the hall for the Pullman porters' entertainment here and paid for it themselves and took two or three hundred dollars worth of tickets in the general office and disposed of them the best they could and turned the receipts over to the porters. And in New York we have one or two superintendents belonging to our organization to help us, give us courage.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Superintendent is a white man?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Oh, yes; they are all white superintendents.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They belong to your organization?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are they sort of managing it for you?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No; they just use their names; they pay their dues to encourage us.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do they attend your meetings?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No; they very rarely. They don't attend meetings, but they leave that to us; but they do it for encouragement.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Encouragement?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have they attended any meetings that you have had—any of those superintendents that were members?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No; I don't remember.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you know whether officials of the company—I don't mean anyone particularly now—but anyone that was looked upon as being an official of the company?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Advising or suggesting the advisability of you joining an organization of porters?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Organizing what might be called a labor organization?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I have never heard of them disapproving of it, because I have never been in touch with an organization, but we have never had any in the East, anything of that kind among the porters, so I don't hardly hear it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There are associations and institutions and colleges for the purpose of the higher teaching and learning of the colored people, as, for instance, Mr. Booker Washington's institution, Mr. Sylvester?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does he interest himself in any way in connection with the affairs of your organization of porters?

Mr. SYLVESTER. He does not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have there been, do you know, porters coming from that institution?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Has he ever addressed any of your meetings in any way?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Not directly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you ever receive circulars or letters from him?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What subjects would he address you on?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Well, what is called the Business Men's League, that he is president of.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The Business Men's League?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes; of colored men. Whenever he holds meetings we get that at our organization, and it is read over by the men coming in, and I would say, if I am permitted to do so, in regard to the men coming from the schools, that there was an order from the Pullman Co. that all colored boys coming from school are given preference over the new men to get employment during the summer in order to get their money to go back to school again; and they have educated hundreds of them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are there any colored men in New York who sought to give their time to going around among the men of these organizations—are there any particular colored men in New York who have been educated in college, and who get the colored men together for the purpose of keeping them from entangling alliances?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No, sir. We have several fraternal organizations there, the Odd Fellows, the Elks, and the Masons, but there is no effort on the part of any particular one. The officers as they are made, they solicit and get men if possible.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you ever heard of letters or circulars coming to your organization, or the officers of the organization composed of Pullman porters, advising them for or against the matter of entering into the organization?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In your opinion, if tips were to be stopped, would it be necessary for the porters themselves to organize to improve their condition of employment?

Mr. SYLVESTER. They would have to organize or quit. What I mean is, we would not organize into a body to try to force the Pullman Co. I don't think, but would organize into a body to go to them and state the conditions, which they could readily see, and ask them to give us more money and living wages.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you feel, as an individual man, that if you were discharged, and you felt unjustly so—felt that you had been done an injustice—that, as an individual man, going to a great organization or company like the Pullman Co., that you individually would be able to compel a just consideration of your grievance?

Mr. SYLVESTER. I don't think I would have to compel; I think I would get a hearing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You think you would get a hearing?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes; and a proper hearing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You think that you would get a proper and just hearing?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard has a question to ask.

Commissioner BALLARD. You, of course, have a large acquaintanceship in New York, and you know porters in hotels, and you know waiters in hotels, and you know men who work around; do almost all of those people get tips? Is it customary?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. It is universal in hotels and boarding houses and restaurants?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir; and among the Red Caps, and everyone.

Commissioner BALLARD. And you do not feel in receiving these tips that you have been disgraced or humiliated in any way?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No; the degradation would be if we did not get them.

Commissioner BALLARD. Just in order to clear up the situation with regard to the sleeping at night: It was testified, as I understood it yesterday, that the porter was supposed to take a stool that was there and sit at the end of the aisle toward the washroom and sit there and be on watch. As he sits there, is there any objection to his nodding and dozing along?

Mr. SYLVESTER. There may be an objection, but he nods just the same.

Commissioner BALLARD. Of course, he would not take a pillow and blanket and go into a berth and lie down, but he could sit in that chair?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. If he sits there and is nodding or dozing, is he in a position so that he can protect the car?

Mr. SYLVESTER. He can sit there and doze off, and the air from a person passing by him will wake him up.

Commissioner BALLARD. He can sit there and doze, then, and yet protect the car?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir. Suppose there was a thief in the car, and if he should get up in the night with the intention of robbing some passenger, and he sees you sitting there, he is not going to rob the car.

Commissioner BALLARD. You think the average porter on the long runs, sitting there on the stool, is able to get a little rest without endangering the passengers or the company?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes; he is. Now, as to sitting on camp stools—we have a meeting, and have every three months, a sort of get-together meeting between the officers and the porters; and they ask us to suggest anything for the betterment of our conditions and for the betterment of the service, and they get a chance to be heard there. And I remember at the last meeting here in Chicago, it was taken up to get—there was a great deal of complaint of the men sitting on camp stools in the steel cars, the new cars, some of the men claiming they caught cold, and the inspectors asked them to devise some means, or suggest some chair that you could sit in with a back that you would not come in contact with the steel of the car, and I think they are trying to provide such a chair now.

Commissioner AUGHTON. One question, Mr. Sylvester: As a volunteer organization, you elect your officers in those sick-benefit organizations; you elect your officers of colored men?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AUGHTON. How often are they elected?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Every year.

Commissioner AUGHTON. Yearly?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AUGHTON. And they are selected from your own ranks of porters?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir; we try to pick the best men.

Commissioner AUGHTON. And he does nothing else but look after the organization?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Oh, no; he carries it on.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is their work?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you. One moment, please, Mr. Garretson wants to ask you some questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How often do you hold these "get-together meetings"?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Every three months.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Between the officers of the company and just the porters, or other employees?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Just porters.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You are encouraged at those meetings to suggest things that will be for your own benefit?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. For the betterment of the porters?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are you ever encouraged to talk about more wages?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No; but it has been brought up.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What is the attitude of the company in answer to it?

Mr. SYLVESTER. That they will take the matter up and do the best they can.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has any increase been given to you?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How much?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Five per cent has come from it; your bonus has come from it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The bonus?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes, sir; 13 months' pay and 5 per cent has come from it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That has all come out of these get-together meetings?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes; talks of the desires of the porters.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then the porters have really gotten that benefit for the conductors on the cars?

Mr. SYLVESTER. The conductors have meetings the same way, but they are not joint meetings with the porters.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What run are you on now?

Mr. SYLVESTER. On the Century.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Where?

Mr. SYLVESTER. On the Twentieth Century.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are you on duty to-day?

Mr. SYLVESTER. No, sir; not directly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Indirectly?

Mr. SYLVESTER. Yes; indirectly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. You will be excused. Thank you.

Mr. Brewster.

TESTIMONY OF MR. W. H. BREWSTER.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. W. H. Brewster.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside, Mr. Brewster?

Mr. BREWSTER. St. Louis, Mo.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you resided in St. Louis?

Mr. BREWSTER. Forty years.

Chairman WALSH. Born there, Mr. Brewster?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You are a conductor for the Pullman Co., are you?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What line do you run on at the present time?

Mr. BREWSTER. The Illinois Central, Chicago to St. Louis and return. The line is operated out of the St. Louis district.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you been a Pullman conductor?

Mr. BREWSTER. About seven years; after a year and a half in the service I resigned. I was out a year and then applied for reinstatement, and it required about 10 days, and I was back and had a regular run.

Chairman WALSH. Then, do I understand you have been in the service the last time for five and one-half years?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I wish you would first tell us the salaries that you have received, Mr. Brewster.

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, when I started to work they paid me at the rate, I believe, of $70.

Chairman WALSH. And that continued for how long?

Mr. BREWSTER. For six months.

Chairman WALSH. And then?

Mr. BREWSTER. And after six months it was $75, and beginning the second year it was $80, and through the second year, and after the second year it was $85, and after five years it was $90.

Chairman WALSH. And you receive $90 per month now, do you?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And please state the runs you have had and upon which you have continued for some length of time.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir. Well, I would like to go back just a bit, please, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BREWSTER. To say that after I had been out—when I left the service I was earning $80, and when they reinstated me they allowed me that; that is, they started me in at $80.

Chairman WALSH. They allowed you the year and a half you were out—$80.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir. Work was a little short at St. Louis when I went to work, and in order to give me work I was transferred to Memphis, and I worked there a couple of months, and Mr. Leach—I was down there on a parlor car in order to give me work, and then I operated from St. Louis to Burrton, Kans., over the Frisco.

Chairman WALSH. To what?

Mr. BREWSTER. Over the Frisco.

Chairman WALSH. To Burrton?

Mr. BREWSTER. Burrton, Kans.; yes, sir; and we left St. Louis at 8.32, and I reported at the train at 7.30 and received passengers from 8 to 8.32; and I had three cars on that run. One car was Oklahoma City, and another Joplin, and a through car; the Burrton car, and went through. Now, the relife on that run, when I left St. Louis I divided watch with the through car—with the Burrton car. The porter went to bed about 10.30 and he got up at 2.50, and that allowed him until 3 o'clock, 10 minutes, to get his bed put away, so he would be on the job; and I retired, and on that run I got up at 6 o'clock in the morning, because I set out that Oklahoma City car at Monett, Mo. That was 6 o'clock, to get up and see that the car was set out properly, and the porters on the other two—

Chairman WALSH. How long did it take you to make the trip to Burrton?

Mr. BREWSTER. Until 4.32 that afternoon of the second day. The porters on the Oklahoma City car and the Joplin car were on watch all night, and arrived at Joplin at 8.30 in the morning, and the Joplin car was set out and we went on to Burrton, and arrived at Burrton at 4.32 that afternoon. Now, on that run we had breakfast and dinner on the diner—the porter and I. The service on there—they gave us meals for a quarter. That is, Fred Harvey service, the meals that the passengers got. It was no short meal, but go in and order whatever you wanted. Well, we had breakfast and dinner on that car—on the diner; and at Burrton we had—at 4.32 in the afternoon; that is, where we were off, and we would have supper at the restaurant.

Chairman WALSH. A Harvey restaurant?

Mr. BREWSTER. No, sir; it was just a Santa Fe eating house. We laid over there from 4.32 until 12 noon the next day; slept in the car, the porter and I. Then we arrived—that is a half-day run from Burrton to Joplin, and we arrived there about 9 that night and picked up the Joplin car, and we divided watch on the eastbound trip in the same way. I relieved the porter and he relieved me, and we also had two meals on the diner northbound for a quarter apiece. I arrived in St. Louis at 7.50 that morning, and took out the same night at 8.32; and on that run the mileage was, I think, 536 miles; that is, 1,072 for the round trip. And we doubled out of St. Louis on that trip, but they gave us 36 hours off at home three times a month.

Chairman WALSH. How long did you have that run?

Mr. BREWSTER. I had that run nine months, and it was not considered a preferred run on account of the doubling-out feature at home on a 1,072-mile run. The lay-over is really better on the other end, away from home, than at home. That is the reason it is not a very desirable run. Of course, I was new in the service and of course I could not expect too much.

Chairman WALSH. What was your next run?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, the next run, I made a few trips to Denver over the Burlington; left St. Louis at 2.30 in the afternoon and got to Denver—well, the season I ran was a busy season. We handled three cars on that run. There was extra heavy travel. It was the summer season in June.

Chairman WALSH. You ran from St. Louis to Denver?

Mr. BREWSTER. From St. Louis to Denver.

Chairman WALSH. What time did you leave? Just describe as briefly as you can what time you left and about the lay-over hours, and about the rest and these other details.

Mr. BREWSTER. At 2.30 in the afternoon, and got to Denver in the afternoon of the next day about 4.30; and I divided watch with the porter of one of the cars, and out of St. Joe we got a relief porter. We arrived at St. Joe, Mo., about midnight. The relief porter—swing porter, we called him—would relieve one of the other porters on the other car three hours, and relieve the other man; so that gave us relief, and we laid over from 4.30 in the afternoon of the second day until, as I recollect, about noon the next day. Well, our sleeping quarters at that time was in the conductor's room—that is, the room next to the conductor's room—and I slept there at night. I had a night off there.

Chairman WALSH. Well, just describe the sleeping quarters, Mr. Brewster.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes; there was six cots in there, and there was running water; no bath. And I slept all right. It was nighttime.

Chairman WALSH. Any noise?

Mr. BREWSTER. No; no annoyance at night; my porter slept in the car. But on that run we had three meals on the diner, supper the day leaving and breakfast the next morning and lunch the next noon, and the same way returning, and the mileage on that—well, I don't know exactly.

Chairman WALSH. What would you say it cost you to live on that run—your personal expenses?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, on that run they would give us a half rate, and the steward—I would eat with him and he would kind of ease over a little piece to me once in a while, and I had a good meal. It was good. It was a good run to run on for food.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I would like to get approximately how much it cost you if you really paid one-half, you know, of the regular charge.

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, 25 cents a meal—three meals.

Chairman WALSH. Well, on the dining car, where you paid half, why, you could get a meal for 25 cents?

Mr. BREWSTER. I did on that line; other lines I have run on that I couldn't get that.

Chairman WALSH. I ask you now to leave out any favor that might be shown you by the steward, and say what is the cost to you?

Mr. BREWSTER. The meal would cost me a quarter on that run; that is, each meal.

Chairman WALSH. Without any—

Mr. BREWSTER (interrupting). Without anything gratuitous, as I would order as much, for instance, order meat and potatoes, that is what they charged you for, and they would give you the coffee and bread and butter.

Chairman WALSH. That is, they gave that to anyone?

Mr. BREWSTER. That is, he would not put that on the check.

Chairman WALSH. Well, why would he not put that on the check?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, because it was not—they asked you not to put it on there.

Chairman WALSH. And that is extended to all the conductors?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, that applied to me—I don't know anything—I expect it was; I was only an extra man on there for a month, as I remember.

Chairman WALSH. Well, what would you say it cost you per day to live.

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, for the round trip on the road?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I had supper and breakfast.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever figure out how much a month it cost you while you were away from home on that run?

Mr. BREWSTER. I never figured it out; no, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. Well, can you approximate it now?
 Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. Well, about how much?
 Mr. BREWSTER. It costs me about $3.
 Chairman WALSH. Three dollars for what?
 Mr. BREWSTER. Three dollars for the round trip.
 Chairman WALSH. And how many round trips would you make per month.
 Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I did not run long enough on that for it to be a regular thing for me to memorize it. It was just a month I ran there.
 Chairman WALSH. You just worked there a month?
 Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. Do you know how many round trips you made in the month?
 Mr. BREWSTER. No; I could not say. The months did not end up even.
 Chairman WALSH. Well, now, give us some other run you were on.
 Mr. BREWSTER. Well, then I left the service.
 Chairman WALSH. Well, you came back?
 Mr. BREWSTER. Yes. Bear in mind I went down one night, and I told them I had a job, and if I wanted to take the job I would have to take it the next day; and I did not see the Pullman Co. for six weeks, and I had my pay coming. That was in July—the last of June or July. And the next July I had a vacation from the wholesale house I worked for, and I had been wanting to get back on the road, and I thought I would step in and see Mr. Cook, the superintendent. And I told him I would like to come back, and I told him I had a good job and did not want to work myself out of it. So he concluded to give me the job back that I had resigned from. So he told me to come in in a couple of days, and I came in and he said he could reinstate me, and I resigned my position.
 Chairman WALSH. What road were you put on then?
 Mr. BREWSTER. Then I ran on the Big Four to Cleveland. That lay-over on that run was all at St. Louis.
 Chairman WALSH. What time did you leave St. Louis?
 Mr. BREWSTER. I left St. Louis at 11.45—
 Chairman WALSH (interrupting). P. m.?
 Mr. BREWSTER (continuing). P. m. Received passengers at 9.30—
 Chairman WALSH. And arrived—
 Mr. BREWSTER (interrupting). And arrived at Cleveland the next night at 10.15; and I went to bed on that run and relieved the porter—only one car.
 Chairman WALSH. How long did you run on that road?
 Mr. BREWSTER. A year and a half.
 Chairman WALSH. A year and a half. Now, what did it cost you to live while you were on that road? What road was that, please—St. Louis to Cleveland?
 Mr. BREWSTER. That was the Big Four.
 Chairman WALSH. The Big Four?
 Mr. BREWSTER. Yes. It cost me $1.50 a trip.
 Chairman WALSH. Round trip?
 Mr. BREWSTER. Round trip, yes, sir; for my meals.
 Chairman WALSH. How many meals did you take on that?
 Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I had two meals each day. I would get to Cleveland at 10.15 the second night, and laid over there until 3 o'clock the next morning.
 Chairman WALSH. Now, what did it cost you to live, per month, while you were on the road, running on the Big Four?
 Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I might say it cost me about eleven or twelve dollars a month.
 Chairman WALSH. Eleven or twelve dollars a month?
 Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. Now, where did you sleep in Cleveland?
 Mr. BREWSTER. Slept in the hotel.
 Chairman WALSH. Well, did you have to pay anything—
 Mr. BREWSTER (interrupting). Yes.
 Chairman WALSH. Or was it free? What did you have to pay?
 Mr. BREWSTER. It cost me 25 cents a night. The dining-car conductor slept in there—two beds. There was always a crew there every night. He made us a rate. It was a second-class hotel, but it was clean, and it answered our purpose—clean and close to the depot.

Chairman WALSH. How many nights per month were you there?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I expect about eight.

Chairman WALSH. And you were there for a year and a half?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now what was your salary while you were running there?

Mr. BREWSTER. Eighty-five dollars.

Chairman WALSH. Do I understand you to say you are a married man?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, not at that time?

Chairman WALSH. Are you a married man now?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Any family?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes; I have a boy 4 years old.

Chairman WALSH. But you live in St. Louis, I believe you stated?

Mr. BREWSTER. Live in St. Louis.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you heard what was said here as to the cost of living, and I would like you to make the same estimate, if you will, as the gentleman that I examined here this afternoon, Mr. Bourke, I believe.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what house rent do you pay?

Mr. BREWSTER. I pay $13 a month.

Chairman WALSH. And what has your living away from home cost you?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I have been on a one-night run for four years, and now my expenses up here when I leave home—I leave St. Louis in the evening, and I have got a thermos bottle and I like a midnight lunch. I am up all night. And I don't say I take my lunch for economy, but I can't get anything as good on the road; no place to eat but these lunch counters. I take a lunch and the thermos bottle and I get here to Chicago and I have a breakfast; at the Illinois Central Station, they give us a rate card, and they give you an item that costs 20 cents, give it to you for 15 cents, and something that costs a dime they will give it to you for a nickel. Well, my breakfast costs me sometimes—well, 15 cents—oatmeal and a glass of milk.

Chairman WALSH. Well, if you could put it all together and let me sketch it a little more rapidly, Mr. Brewster.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What would you say it costs you per month for you to live away from home?

Mr. BREWSTER. Ten dollars would cover it easily.

Chairman WALSH. And your rental is $13 per month?

Mr. BREWSTER. Thirteen dollars; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What is your grocery bill?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, my grocery bill per month would be about—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). That is, provisions for your family—groceries and meats.

Mr. BREWSTER. Would be about $18.

Chairman WALSH. Does the $13 rental include fuel and light.

Mr. BREWSTER. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What do you pay for fuel?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, my gas is about $1.50 a month—illuminating and fuel.

Chairman WALSH. You use gas for fuel, altogether, do you, Mr. Brewster?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. A dollar and a half a month?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, not altogether; no, sir; I will correct that. In the winter I use a stove.

Chairman WALSH. Coal stove?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And what does the coal cost you?

Mr. BREWSTER. Twelve dollars in the winter season. That would be about six months.

Chairman WALSH. You pay $1 a month for coal, then, spread over the whole year?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, yes; that would be $2 a month for the six months.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have any help at home?

Mr. BREWSTER. No help; no, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Any laundry expense?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, the only laundry I have is my collars. My wife launders my shirts and does the other laundry work.

Chairman WALSH. What would it amount to per month?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, it would amount to about 30 cents a month.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have any other items of expense outside of clothes? Are you insured?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes; I am insured.

Chairman WALSH. For how much?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I am insured—I carry a cumulative policy; it amounts to about $6,000 and costs me $18 per year.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the total cost to you of insurance, $18 per year?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you pay dues into any religious organization, or anything of that kind?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, no more than the contributions.

Chairman WALSH. I mean church contributions?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How much would that amount to per month?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I might say a quarter a month.

Chairman WALSH. A quarter a month?

Mr. BREWSTER. Twenty-five cents.

Chairman WALSH. Do you belong to any fraternal organization?

Mr. BREWSTER. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think of any other—oh, your uniform. What do you pay for your uniform and cap?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I think the last I paid was $19.75.

Chairman WALSH. And do you have two uniforms—winter and summer?

Mr. BREWSTER. No; I wear a uniform a year—I wear a medium weight.

Chairman WALSH. And that costs you $19.50 a year?

Mr. BREWSTER. Nineteen dollars and seventy-five cents.

Chairman WALSH. Nineteen dollars and seventy-five cents?

Mr. BREWSTER. And $1.50 for a cap.

Chairman WALSH. A dollar and a half a month stretched over a year. Now, do you recall any other items of expense you have other than clothing?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes; what you might call miscellaneous—might call that clothing—

Mr. WALSH (interrupting). Well, leaving out the clothing for the present.

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, miscellaneous we will say.

Chairman WALSH. Do you smoke?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Cigars?

Mr. BREWSTER. Pipe; that is all I buy.

Chairman WALSH. What does that cost you a month?

Mr. BREWSTER. It costs me about 30 cents a month.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what other incidentals do you have in mind—medical attention—

Mr. BREWSTER (interrupting). Yes; I have had quite a good bit.

Chairman WALSH. About how much would that cost extend over the year?

Mr. BREWSTER. About $20 a year.

Chairman WALSH. A year; that would be approximately something under $2 a month—say $1.75.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does that include dental services, too?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I am having a little of that expense right now. I might make an addition there right now, but that does not occur every year.

Chairman WALSH. Well, would $2 a month cover the dental services, too?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you have to purchase toilet articles and things of that kind?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you include those in the incidentals? About how much a month would that be?

Mr. BREWSTER. Be about 50 cents.

Chairman WALSH. You furnish your own house, of course?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How many rooms do you have?

Mr. BREWSTER. I have four.

Chairman WALSH. And where do you live in St. Louis?

Mr. BREWSTER. I live on North Market Street, out in the suburbs. I live in a cottage 5709 North Market Street.

Chairman WALSH. You have car fare to pay?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Street car fare?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That would amount to about how much, would you say; that is, for yourself and family?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I might say $1.50 a month.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a drinking man?

Mr. BREWSTER. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Teetotaler?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, is there any other fixed item of expense you can recall?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, you have got the clothing down there, have you?

Chairman WALSH. No; I have not got the clothing down.

Mr. BREWSTER. You have not come to that yet.

Chairman WALSH. No.

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I might say amusement.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; amusements.

Mr. BREWSTER. About $2 a month.

Chairman WALSH. Now, if you can not think of any other fixed charge, what would you say that your expense for clothing would be for yourself and family?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I would say $50 a year.

Chairman WALSH. Fifty dollars a year?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That would be $4 a month—a little over $4 a month?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That $50 a year—that would be including clothing for yourself, your wife, and two children?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you own any property?

Mr. BREWSTER. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. No property?

Commissioner LENNON. One child, I think he said.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, one child?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes; a boy.

Chairman WALSH. Have you accumulated anything since you have been in the service?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You saved some money?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How much per month would you say that you saved?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, sometimes more than others, because the expense is distributed out—sometimes have more—

Chairman WALSH. For instance, illness, doctor bills, and so forth; I can see.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Well, how much would you say, take it year in and year out, say for three years you have been running steadily?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, I could give you the savings in a year—would average about $300 a year.

Chairman WALSH. About $300 a year?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will now stand adjourned.

Commissioner BALLARD. May I ask just a question?

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard has one question.

Commissioner BALLARD. Just one question. That was, just after you left the Pullman service, you went to work for a private firm, and then you went back to the Pullman service?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. Now, do you find the conditions and wages and salary you got from the Pullman Co. about the same as in ordinary business—your friends, for instance, in business—do they make more than you do or about the same?

Mr. BREWSTER. About the same.

Commissioner BALLARD. The conditions, then, and the pay are about the same or as good as that of your friends and of yourself when you worked in other business?

Mr. BREWSTER. Well, pardon me; this job I left—I had been working on the job 18 years, and they were paying me more than when I came back; and that was put up to me by the superintendent. He wanted to know why I wanted to come back and work for the Pullman Co. when I had a job I was giving up that was paying me more money.

Commissioner BALLARD. Why did you?

Mr. BREWSTER. Because it was more desirable; I thought it more pleasant, and I came in contact with nice people, and there was something I liked.

Chairman WALSH. We will stand adjourned until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

(Thereupon, at 4.40 p. m., Tuesday, April 6, 1915, an adjournment was had until 10 o'clock the following morning, Wednesday, April 7, 1915.)

TESTIMONY OF F. B. DANIELS.

CHICAGO, ILL., Wednesday, April 7, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh; Commissioners Lennon, Aishton, O'Connell, Ballard, and Garretson.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Robert T. Lincoln. Is Mr. Lincoln present?

Mr. F. B. DANIELS. I should like to present a communication from him.

Chairman WALSH. Very well. Are you Mr. Daniels?

Mr. DANIELS. There is an inclosure in that. I am Mr. Daniels; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I will say, Mr. Daniels, that we have a telegram from President Runnells, saying he is also ill. So the commission will take this up as a whole and notify you later what action will be taken. I will simply say this, that some arrangement will have to be made for taking the testimony of either Mr. Runnells or Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. DANIELS. I wish to say to your honor that I understood from Mr. West that you had—that the chairman had—accepted Mr. Runnell's request in this matter, and he would not be required here now.

Chairman WALSH. That was done, but that was at the time a subpoena was served upon Mr. Lincoln; and we were notified by the vice president here that Mr. Lincoln would be here on Saturday. Now, I will say this, that the commission has concluded to put over the further hearing of the Pullman matter on account of the intervention of the Illinois Central matter until next Saturday morning at 10 o'clock; and I will call the commission together, and they will take some action on this matter before that time. So that the further hearing upon the Pullman matter will be postponed until next Saturday morning at 10 o'clock. All the witnesses now in attendance will please report here at 10 o'clock Saturday morning without further notice on subpoena.

(The hearing of this matter was thereupon continued until Saturday, April 10, 1915, at 10 a. m.)

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Daniels, I have another suggestion to make, and probably I had better make it to you.

We have received a communication from a committee of conductors, who claim that they are all running, and they undertake to present their own objections to their conditions, and it is done apparently in a very orderly way, and I thought it might be proper and fair to submit a copy of this to you, so that you might check it up, and upon next Saturday morning you might have whomsoever you may select reply to that; and you may obtain a copy of that from Mr. Brown, the secretary, after it is copied. It seems to epitomize that very, briefly.

(See p. 9681 for Statement of Pullman Conductors.)

CHICAGO, ILL., Friday, April 16, 1915—2 p. m.

Acting Chairman LENNON. We will now resume. Is Mr. Daniels, of the Pullman Co., here?

Mr. DANIELS. Yes.

Acting Chairman LENNON. I understand you want to file a document in reply to something that was submitted here before?

Mr. DANIELS. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Just hand it to the stenographer.

Mr. DANIELS. It is in response to a request of the chairman. I have a witness here to answer certain statements in a paper of which the chairman furnished us a copy, but I have been informed by Mr. West, of the commission, this morning that the hearing was over, and that we would have no chance to submit further testimony except that of Mr. Lincoln, and Mr. Hungerford has gotten this up and signed it, and I wish it to be made a part of the record.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Very well; it will be done.
 (Said communication so referred to and submitted in evidence by witness appears at the end of this subject under the title "Reply of Mr. Hungerford to complaints of Pullman conductors." See p. 9689.)

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
Tuesday, May 4, 1915—2 p. m.

Chairman WALSH. Now, Mr. Lincoln, will you kindly take the chair?

TESTIMONY OF MR. ROBERT T. LINCOLN.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your name?

Mr. LINCOLN. Robert T. Lincoln.

Chairman WALSH. And where do you reside, Mr. Lincoln?

Mr. LINCOLN. Washington City.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you resided in Washington City?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, I should say—I should call it four years.

Chairman WALSH. And what is your present official position with the Pullman Co.?

Mr. LINCOLN. I am a member of the board of directors of the Pullman Co. and chairman of the board of directors.

Chairman WALSH. Have you occupied any other official positions in that company; and if so, please detail them?

Mr. LINCOLN. I was president of the Pullman Co. from the time—shortly after the death of Mr. Pullman, in October, 1897, until, I think, May 11, 1911, when I retired on account of ill health.

Chairman WALSH. Had you occupied any position prior to being president of the company?

Mr. LINCOLN. Not officially; but I was a member of a firm of lawyers in Chicago who were special counsel to the Pullman Co., and I was perhaps a very special counsel, say, in 1894, being so much so as to have an office in the Pullman Building.

Chairman WALSH. But you had no official connection; you were not on the board of directors at that time?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What is the present capital stock of the Pullman Co.?

Mr. LINCOLN. One hundred and twenty millions of dollars.

Chairman WALSH. And how much of that capital stock is still in the possession of the company?

Mr. LINCOLN. I am sorry to say that I can not answer that. We have quite a large block of stock which has been bought in in the course of our 50 years—nearly 50 years—existence. It amounts—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I have a memorandum which might refresh your memory.

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes; perhaps I could tell—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). The memorandum shows $3,400,000—

Mr. LINCOLN. That would be 30,000 shares.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LINCOLN. I think probably that would be about right.

Chairman WALSH. What is the bonded indebtedness of the Pullman Co.?

Mr. LINCOLN. There is none.

Chairman WALSH. What dividends have been paid upon the stock during recent years, we will say from 1900 to date?

Mr. LINCOLN. The rate, sir?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINCOLN. Eight per cent per annum.

Chairman WALSH. And that has been paid on all outstanding stock, including the stock that is in your possession?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir. It is perhaps a trivial thing—there are a few scrip pieces outstanding for which stock has not yet been issued that result from persons having what is called fractional scrip that has not been united together to form stock. I think that the dividends on those amount to—would amount to, if they were coagulated—to $100 a year, or something like that; very trivial.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall when the last issue of stock for cash was made, Mr. Lincoln?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir. But let me think a moment. Oh, yes, sir; yes, sir. Well, would you call cash when we purchased the Wagner Co. property—the Wagner Co. property—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I would rather have you explain it, because I probably could not draw a proper conclusion myself.

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, would you allow me—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Yes. I believe, first, Mr. Lincoln, I would not call that cash, but—

Mr. LINCOLN (interrupting). All right, sir.

Chairman WALSH. But you may make that statement, if you will, sir, in your explanation.

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, I am sorry to say that I have not the basis to give you the dates of the last issue of stock for cash; but at the time of the purchase of the property and assets of the Wagner Co., which was in December, 1899, and fixed as of January 1, 1900, the capital stock of the Pullman Co. was $36,000,000, or, before that, I beg pardon, it had been $36,000,000, which had been made up of $32,308,000, in round numbers, of cash and $2,000,000 issued in exchange for outstanding bonds—the company at one time had bonds—and the purchase of about $1,135,000 of cars in 1868 to 1870 from various railroad companies—the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, the Chicago & North Western, the Hannibal & St. Joe, J. J. Smith, and then some property from the Central Transportation Co., and then from the Pullman's Southern Car Co. That was in 1870. It stood in that way up to 1899. Now, that $36,000,000 was made up of those items which are given you, and the addition—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). That is $32,700,000 cash?

Mr. LINCOLN. Six hundred thousand dollars.

Chairman WALSH. Six hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And, pardon me, what was the other five thousand—

Mr. LINCOLN. Then, there was a little more than $2,000,000 issued in exchange for bonds of the company which had been issued, and then a little over $1,100,000 for cars—excuse me, sir, I will get a piece of paper which will enable me to congregate that—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). May I give you a scratch pad—

Mr. LINCOLN (continuing). No; I have those data down here, if I can get at them. The cost of those, the cost of that stock which I have now given you, amounted to something very near $36,000,000, which, in the course of the transaction—there were some book entries of stock which had been sold for more than par, and one or two or three or four other items, the exact details of which I don't know; and those were all balanced into the stock account and surplus account, leaving the stock account $36,000,000, so that that was then regarded as the stock issue of the company.

Chairman WALSH. That was in eighteen—

Mr. LINCOLN (interrupting). Well, it was before 1898. That is the way it stood in 1898.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LINCOLN. Then, in 1898, we increased the capital stock. Then, in 1899, we issued $20,000,000 for the property and assets or stock for the property and assets of the Wagner Palace Car Co.—the Wagner Co. Then there was—before that, in 1898, the capital stock, there being $36,000,000, there was a stock dividend made out of the accumulated surplus of the company of $18,000,000.

Chairman WALSH. That was in 1898?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That was a 50 per cent dividend, approximately?

Mr. LINCOLN. That was a 50 per cent dividend in 1898.

Chairman WALSH. And that was a cash dividend?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir; a stock dividend.

Chairman WALSH. I see; yes, sir.

Mr. LINCOLN. There was a cash dividend also.

Chairman WALSH. What was it?

Mr. LINCOLN. Twenty per cent—$7,200,000.

Chairman WALSH. So, in August, 1898, an extra dividend of cash was declared, amounting to—

Mr. LINCOLN. Seven million two hundred thousand dollars.

Chairman WALSH. And in the same year a dividend in stock distributed amounting to $18,000,000?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir; it increased the capital stock to $54,000,000. Then came—in 1899 came the purchase of the Wagner property, $20,000,000; that increased the stock to $74,000,000, and in November, 1900, there was a stock dividend out of surplus of $26,000,000, which increased the capital stock to $100,000,000. Then, in March, 1910, there was a stock dividend out of surplus of $20,000,000 that increased the stock to $120,000,000, as it now stands.

Chairman WALSH. What was the purpose of these stock dividends, Mr. Lincoln?

Mr. LINCOLN. It was to capitalize the surplus, the surplus of the company which had been earned but which was invested in cars and property of the company.

Chairman WALSH. And then, after the dividends, you have been paying dividends on that increased stock ever since?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And have been paying 8 per cent since 1900, I believe you stated?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, during the whole life of the Pullman Co., will you please give us the minimum and maximum dividends that were paid?

Mr. LINCOLN. I could not go back to the very beginning and tell you, Mr. Chairman, when the dividends began to be paid, but I think the dividends were always 8 per cent, except for a short period before the purchase of the Wagner property, when the dividend was reduced for one or two quarters—I am not sure which—to 6 per cent.

Chairman WALSH. And that would only apply for that length of time, probably?

Mr. LINCOLN. I think I am right about it.

Chairman WALSH. What is the present surplus of the Pullman Co.?

Mr. LINCOLN. Of course I have to give it to you, sir, as it was at the end of the last fiscal year. The present surplus is $5,671,335.92.

Chairman WALSH. What is your reserve and adjustment accounts?

Mr. LINCOLN. The amounts of them?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir; first, what are they; what do they consist of?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, consist of property of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Consist of property of the company?

Mr. LINCOLN. And, of course, securities and cash in the bank and mainly in property of the company, such as cars.

Chairman WALSH. Why do you call it a reserve and adjustment account?

Mr. LINCOLN. I don't know the use of the special word "adjustment," but the use of "reserve" is, our cars are depreciating in value, and at some time they will be wiped out.

Chairman WALSH. At the close of your last fiscal year what amount was in the reserve and adjustment accounts?

Mr. LINCOLN. I have not the figures here to give you that, sir. Oh, in amount; I beg your pardon, sir. The prices in this printed financial statement of the company, the reserve for depreciation at that time, was $32,520,549.50.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what action is taken with reference to setting those accounts aside and making the difference between the surplus account and reserve and adjustment accounts? What account is taken by your company and by whom?

Mr. LINCOLN. It is taken by the board of directors; the accounts are made up, approved by the board of directors at the end of the year. The amount to be set off out of profits of the year to depreciation account. It is to take care, Mr. Commissioner, of the cars that are in use—our sleeping cars going out of service.

Chairman WALSH. What would you say as to the amount—$32,000,000—being enough or more than enough to provide for future necessities?

Mr. LINCOLN. I don't think it is enough. I can not tell you. It is not enough; that I am sure. I could not say how much it is short, but it is certainly not enough, in my opinion; that is necessarily an estimate, owing to the conditions of things like this: We have now about 7,000 cars, of which 3,300 are wooden standard cars—I am talking in round numbers now—2,500 of the new steel cars, all of which were built in the last few years, and about 1,000 of the steel reinforced cars; that is steel underframes, steel vestibules, and steel outsides, but the inside is not steel, and the question as to what is the value of these wooden cars, of which there are still 3,500, which are going out of service and becoming useless to us as assets to the company, which we can hardly tell.

Chairman WALSH. Has computation ever been made as to the total amount of dividends that have been paid to stockholders of the Pullman Co. since the institution of the company?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. Please give me the amount?
 Mr. LINCOLN. One hundred and fifty-nine million one hundred and sixteen thousand seven hundred and seventy-five dollars and eighty-two cents.
 Chairman WALSH. Does that include that extra cash dividend of $7,200,000?
 Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. Does it include the stock dividends?
 Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. What is the first amount of cash dividends?
 Mr. LINCOLN. Of the total cash dividends?
 Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.
 Mr. LINCOLN. I hope I have added this correctly—$159,116,775.82.
 Chairman WALSH. And you say that that includes the dividend of $7,200,000?
 Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. Well, we will have that checked back. Mr. Lincoln, with the investigators of our commission, who have this in charge and have that included, there may be some error.
 Mr. LINCOLN. I have included it in my addition. I might say that that is not entirely from sleeping-car operations.
 Chairman WALSH. From your manufacturing operations also?
 Mr. LINCOLN. I beg your pardon, sir. Well, I will put it this way, rather. Don't take down what I first said. That we have a sleeping-car business and a manufacturing business.
 Chairman WALSH. And this includes all of it, does it?
 Mr. LINCOLN. That includes all the dividends that have been paid, leaving out the question of where the dividends came from, and it includes the amount of dividends paid by the company from all sources.
 Chairman WALSH. Now, the stock dividend amounted to how much in the same time?
 Mr. LINCOLN. That amounts to $64,000,000.
 Chairman WALSH. That would make approximately $223,000,000 in dividends?
 Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. Now, what were the total assets of the Pullman Co. behind this stock issue at the end of your last fiscal year?
 Mr. LINCOLN. The estimated assets, Mr. Chairman, it requires, of course, a segregation of things. Here is a complete printed statement of it.
 (The statement referred to by witness, issued by the Pullman Co. for the fiscal year ending July 31, 1914, was submitted in printed form.)
 Chairman WALSH. What is the total of the assets?
 Mr. LINCOLN. The total of the assets is $133,917,261.86.
 Chairman WALSH. That covers how many years, Mr. Lincoln?
 Mr. LINCOLN. Since 1867; 48 years.
 Chairman WALSH. Now, let me see; for instance, there was $36,000,000 in cash paid for stock?
 Mr. LINCOLN. With that little explanation I made; one or two or three hundred thousand dollars balances of accounts and part of which is surplus and part stock, as I stated.
 Chairman WALSH. Now, there was $20,000,000 added to that, I believe you stated, when the Wagner Co. was added?
 Mr. LINCOLN. There was $78,000,000 added before that, and then the Wagner purchase added after that.
 Chairman WALSH. What did the Wagner purchase amount to?
 Mr. LINCOLN. Twenty million dollars.
 Chairman WALSH. And that amount was paid out in stock for the Wagner property?
 Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. During your incumbency as the president of this company, Mr. Lincoln, were you in close touch with the detail of operations in the car-service department?
 Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, no, sir.
 Chairman WALSH. What did you have to do with that?
 Mr. LINCOLN. Well, we think we have a pretty good staff, you know; and I naturally depend upon the staff for it. Mr. Garcelon, I think, was general superintendent at that time. He has now retired from the service. I saw Mr. Garcelon every day in my office.
 Chairman WALSH. You both had offices in the Pullman Building?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. State your duties as chairman of the board of directors at the present time?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, they are largely advisory, sir; I retired on account of ill health, when it became impossible for me to perform the duties of president; I could not do it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you meet with the board of directors from time to time?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And preside over them?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Who is the president of the company at the present time?

Mr. LINCOLN. John S. Runnells.

Chairman WALSH. Please state to the commission the salaries paid to conductors and porters when you first became an officer of the company.

Mr. LINCOLN. I think I can do that. [Witness examines papers.] I can only tell you, sir, indirectly, because I have not here a memorandum showing what they were when I became president, which was in 1897. In 1902 there was a raise made to them which, I think, was about $5 a month in each schedule; for instance, $65 to $70; $70 to $75. In 1902 for the first six months' service the rate was made $70 per month, and I think that was increased from $65; as to the others, I am not quite sure. I have no data here to give the exact figures at the time I became president.

Chairman WALSH. As the chairman of the board of directors, and as a director, do these conditions of employment and the salaries of porters and conductors engage your attention?

Mr. LINCOLN. You mean, do I think of them?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; and do you take them up for determination?

Mr. LINCOLN. I do not know as I have discussed them in the board for a long time. I have had some thought of conductors and porters as well, and I may as well say frankly that I think there ought to be some raise in the salaries of conductors, but I do not think it ought to be a great deal. It is a very easy duty, and we have a great many applicants for the places, far more than we have vacancies. Does that answer your question?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; it does very fully. What is the history of your company, as it came under your observation, with reference to the attempts of the men working for you to organize to improve their conditions, or to endeavor to?

Mr. LINCOLN. I never heard anything of it until this investigation.

Chairman WALSH. You never heard there was any attempt to organize?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir; not in all my time; not the slightest.

Chairman WALSH. What changes have there been in salaries paid to your car-service employees, say, in the last 10 years?

Mr. LINCOLN. The exact details of that were, I think, given; there was, I know, an increase made by which our conductors on our special trains get $100 a month. There was one change made, of which I have not the details here, of a month's salary at the end of the year for good service, that Mr. Hungerford testified to as to the details of that. I do not find any memorandum of other changes, except I know, as a fact, that the conductor's salary, for instance, on such a train as the Broadway Limited and the Twentieth Century Limited was made $100 a month in 1895.

Chairman WALSH. What is the value of your capital stock at the present time? I believe I omitted to ask you that question when we were on that topic.

Mr. LINCOLN. In the stock market?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; what is it listed at now?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, I think 160, or something like that, I suppose; it fluctuates.

Chairman WALSH. It is around $150 and $160?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes. You can drop it 10 points by selling 500 shares.

Chairman WALSH. We may assume, I suppose, that there has never been a time in the history of this company when there was any financial reason why a comfortable living wage should not be paid to its employees?

Mr. LINCOLN. I hope not, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider $27.50 a month sufficient to enable a negro porter to maintain himself and family in comfort and decency?

Mr. LINCOLN. Absolutely not. I want to say that situation annoys me very much indeed. I might say here that I took over the administration of the company in 1897, after it had been running for 30 years, and I took it as I found it, without any troubles or complaints as to the service, and I have no doubt, as to the arrangement as to those particular salaries—I have no doubt Mr. Pullman settled that when he took it over and commenced the service, not in succession, but while a part of the sleeping cars were in service. There was the Central Transportation Co.; there was a sleeping-car service on the Erie; there was probably, but I am not sure, a sleeping-car service on the New York, New Haven & Hartford; I know there was a sleeping-car service back in 1860; I know that was a fact. I have no doubt the wages fixed by Mr. Pullman at that time were based on the wages paid at that time; but they were considerably less than the wages paid recently, and probably were then $15 a month.

Chairman WALSH. When you assumed the presidency of this company, was this tipping habit as widespread in the United States as it is at the present time?

Mr. LINCOLN. I think it has always been widespread, not only in the United States, but everywhere.

Chairman WALSH. You think it was as widespread when you went into the office of the presidency as it is at the present time?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir; there is no doubt about it; I do not know the facts, but I have no doubt about it.

Chairman WALSH. Is your company opposed to the organization among its employees of unions?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not think any administration likes to deal with unions; they would prefer to deal with their employees as we deal with ours in the Pullman Co. We have never opposed, so far as I know, the formation of a union among our employees, but our company insists on its right to hire and discharge its employees.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of the fact, if it be a fact, that your company has employed persons to go among its employees as spotters or spies to ascertain whether or not they desire to form themselves into unions; and upon ascertaining that fact, your company discharges the men?

Mr. LINCOLN. I never heard of such a thing.

Chairman WALSH. Would you consider the policy of the corporation in discharging men who attempted to organize lawfully to better their conditions, and requiring of them absolute loyalty to the company, of course, as being a proper policy?

Mr. LINCOLN. If that was all there was in it; no, sir; I would not think it was; I should think that would depend upon the character and acts of the man who was doing it, and the way in which he did it.

Chairman WALSH. If his desire was to organize all of the men in the car service of the Pullman Co., to address you collectively—the officers—to act collectively with reference to the fixing of their wages and conditions, would you have any objection to that?

Mr. LINCOLN. Not if he did it in what I would call a decent way.

Chairman WALSH. So that if an offer of that kind was made to your company, and you deemed it proper and the executive officer of the company denied that right, it would be without your knowledge and without the knowledge of the board of directors?

Mr. LINCOLN. That has not occurred to my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. What would be, if you were to discover that such a thing was occurring—what would be the action of the board of directors?

Mr. LINCOLN. I do not know what the action of the board of directors would be. I want to say this, that I fully recognize, Mr. Chairman, the right of the employees to organize.

Chairman WALSH. I want to ask you some general questions, Mr. Lincoln, with respect to the way this matter is managed so far as your porters are concerned: They get $27.50 a month, I think, so far as I understand it?

Mr. LINCOLN. That is the minimum.

Chairman WALSH. And they are supposed to supplement that in order to obtain enough to support their families on from tips given by the general public?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, Mr. Chairman, might I put it this way? We know they do get it, of course.

Chairman WALSH. What would you say as to the effect upon the morals and self-respect of employees of a system by which they are forced to accept gratuities from strangers in order to earn a living wage?

Mr. LINCOLN. I do not think it affects the morals of the porters at all; they would get the tips whatever their wages were, in my opinion, because, in my opinion, tips are given by passengers on Pullman cars to these porters for services which are not in the course of the Pullman porter's employment at all.

The colored race, as we know, were subject to great limitations in the past to obtain employment in this country, and I believe as a matter of fact that outside of what you might call the learned professions that they got into, such as the clerical profession and teaching, and to some extent in the legal profession, not to mention others, that the one large element which has done more to uplift them is the service in the Pullman Co.; that is my belief about it.

Chairman WALSH. You think their service in the Pullman Co. on the wage they have received and being required to supplement it by gratuities has done much to elevate them?

Mr. LINCOLN. If there had been no tips, of course, their wages would have to be paid undoubtedly; but the tips are paid without regard to the amount of their wages. My feeling about it is, if you increase their wages without in some way stopping their tips, you simply make a larger income for them, and the question is whether that is desirable to do.

Chairman WALSH. They might earn too much?

Mr. LINCOLN. I do not say that; but I conceive you might easily soon have them earning more than skilled labor.

Chairman WALSH. Does that enter into your consideration as a member of the board of directors in keeping their pay at $27.50 a month?

Mr. LINCOLN. No; I do not think the thing has ever been discussed or much thought given it.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever considered this particular question of pauperizing human beings by giving them gratuities?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you not think it pauperizes a man to give him something, for instance, that he does not earn, or that you are not required to give him?

Mr. LINCOLN. On that, Mr. Chairman, my idea is that most of the tips given to the porters on Pullman cars are considered by the passengers as having been earned by them for extra and special services to the passenger; that is my belief about it.

Chairman WALSH. Does the company make it a part of the duties of the porters to shine the passengers' shoes?

Mr. LINCOLN. I think not.

Chairman WALSH. What would be done with a porter who consistently refused to shine my shoes coming here, if I called your attention to it?

Mr. LINCOLN. I believe that question was asked of Mr. Hungerford, and he said it never had arisen; I do not know what would happen.

Chairman WALSH. They are expected to shine the shoes of every passenger in the car at a certain hour at night?

Mr. LINCOLN. I do not know that the company has any thought about it; I expect mine to be shined and everybody else does, and we tip them for it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider $70 a month as a sufficient salary to enable a conductor on the road, for the length of time they are on the road, to maintain himself and family in comfort?

Mr. LINCOLN. That salary lasts for so short a time that it is really a trial salary.

Chairman WALSH. How about $75 a month?

Mr. LINCOLN. That, of course, is not a large salary, but that does not last long.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the budgets that were put into the record in Chicago, or was your attention called to it, of conductors that claimed to have made certain expenditures, necessary expenditures, out of their salary, and where they lived there? One of these, as I recall it, figuring out a surplus, and the other falling to do so. Did you read that record?

Mr. LINCOLN. That was that long document?

Chairman WALSH. There were two budgets placed in the record by former conductors of your company undertaking to give what it cost them to live.

Mr. LINCOLN. I don't believe I saw them.

Chairman WALSH. Taking the territory radiating from Chicago and the lines of your company from which you are familiar, I will ask you what you think would be a comfortable living salary for conductors to wear the uniform and be on the railroad as your conductors do?

Mr. LINCOLN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be excused from answering that question as you put it, because I have no hesitancy in saying to you that I think the salaries of conductors should be increased. I think it is a matter that probably will be taken up by our board of directors at once, and I would like to hold my views until after a discussion in our meeting.

Chairman WALSH. When was your attention called to the fact that the salaries of these men were too low?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, I have been thinking of it for several years, as a matter of fact, that the salaries were hardly big enough.

Chairman WALSH. How would these men act to get that redress? How would you expect them to act with you so that you could take definite action and give them more, if you have been thinking that yourself?

Mr. LINCOLN. If they would come to see an officer of the company, I would say that was the easiest way to do.

Chairman WALSH. Have the petitions that were said to have been signed from time to time from these conductors, asking for an increase in pay and calling your attention to other grievances, reached your hands or the board of directors?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir; not my hands, and I don't believe the board of directors; no; not the board of directors.

Chairman WALSH. Does it require action of the board of directors to fix the new salary schedule?

Mr. LINCOLN. I would think it would.

Chairman WALSH. And in view of the fact that you don't care to answer the question at this time as to what is a living wage, may I ask you when it is contemplated to take up this matter of the adopting of a new wage schedule?

Mr. LINCOLN. I have no idea on that.

Chairman WALSH. Would it be the next week or month or the next year?

Mr. LINCOLN. I expect to attend a meeting of the executive committee on the 12th instant.

Chairman WALSH. Is that a matter they would take up necessarily?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, yes; primarily at least.

Chairman WALSH. How many members of the executive committee?

Mr. LINCOLN. There would be six; there has been; there was a death two months ago—that leaves five.

Chairman WALSH. Would you have any objection as a director of this company to have a committee selected by your employees, say one from each division, or representation which they might think best, meeting with this commission and presenting their views as to what their wage should be, and the facts upon which you might base the wage—in case there was an increase—that they ought to be paid?

Mr. LINCOLN. Why, of course not, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That is, waiting upon this committee that actually fixes the wages?

Mr. LINCOLN. I thought you said this commission?

Chairman WALSH. No, sir; on your executive committee.

Mr. LINCOLN. Was I wrong?

Chairman WALSH. I may have called it a commission—I meant your executive committee.

Mr. LINCOLN. To have a delegation meet the committee?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir; representing the men, so that they might state to you what it costs them to live in their various localities, the rent they have to pay, and so forth?

Mr. LINCOLN. I don't see; why, I have no objection to it; it is rather an awkward way of doing it, still I suppose it can be done.

Chairman WALSH. What would you suggest as being the least awkward way of getting men before you?

Mr. LINCOLN. To have any committee they wish to meet some one or more officials of the company and let them make a memoranda and present it to the committee. I will say first to you, Mr. Chairman, that the company is more closely in touch with conductors and porters than perhaps has been known to you. We have, of course, Mr. Hungerford, who is general manager; he has an assistant under him who is called assistant general superintendent, because he was general superintendent; and we have, then, four—I am not sure but what there are five, but four certainly—superintendents, so-called; and I think we have 45 district superintendents who are located at different parts of the country to perform the business of the company. And all of the porters and conductors report directly and are personally known to these district superintendents. The district superintendents themselves have, 90 per cent of them, been in the service of the company as conductors, I believe. Then the general manager assembles all of our district superintendents at Chicago four times a year and confers with them about the relations of the company as exhibited in their office. We assume that from that they gather first unto the district superintendent a great deal of information as to the feelings of the men, and from the district superintendents, who I hope and believe are in great sympathy with the men, because they all come from the same class—I am talking about conductors, of course—and these men come and talk freely with the general manager. I mention that merely to show the touch we try to keep in with the service.

Chairman WALSH. Now, this general statement has been reiterated time and time again before our commission during the past year: That is, that the executive officers of large companies, such as the Pullman Co., are primarily interested in securing dividends; that their interests are in seeing not that men have a living wage, for instance; seeing that your conductors, as applied to your company, have a sufficient wage, is contrary and antagonistic in a manner to the other duty that they have, of returning large dividends on the investment, where so much goes into labor cost. So now, then, we get a case such as yours, where the evidence tends to show that men have attempted to form unions and formulate their demands, and have been discharged therefor. We are not passing on whether that is true or not, but it is conceded that they passed petitions around the country calling attention to what they claim was their price, that they should get more wages, and objecting to their conditions, and that they were turned into the company, and now it seems that these petitions have never reached the board of directors, who had the final word of fixing their salaries; if those are facts, taking that question as a hypothetical question, do you not believe that it would be better for the persons that had the actual say and responsibility over these men to meet them and not depend entirely upon the executive officers?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, I would like to think about it. It is pretty hard to get a board of directors together for such a meeting.

Chairman WALSH. Why, don't they like to meet for that purpose?

Mr. LINCOLN. I don't mean to say that, but I know I would find it very hard to get a meeting of the board of directors to listen to—I think I would, as a question merely of convenience of the board.

Chairman WALSH. How many conductors have you?

Mr. LINCOLN. Between 2,000 and 2,500.

Chairman WALSH. And how many porters; 6,500, I believe?

Mr. LINCOLN. Between 6,000 and 6,500.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that you have probably 1,500 or 2,000 men going into the service each year? That is, that it takes 8,000 men or a great many over 8,000 men per year to keep up your complement of 6,500 men? Did you know that?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, not quite, sir, I think.

Chairman WALSH. I am just summoning it out of my recollection.

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes; I had; Mr. Hungerford was asked how many porters and how many conductors there were, or conductors and porters were appointed in the year 1913 and the year 1914, and he replied as to the year 1913 that 713 conductors were appointed. That would, without explanation, seem to me that was done because it was necessary to keep up the 6,500, if we call it so, of conductors—

Chairman WALSH (Interrupting). Pardon me, Mr. Lincoln, my mind got on something I had here, and I did not catch your first figure.

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, the first figure was that in the year 1913 there were 713 conductors appointed, and the implication would be at first that that number was required to keep the number of conductors up to 6,500, or whatever is the figure; of course, 6,500 is not an exact figure at all, but it is the approximate number.

Commissioner LENNON. That is porters; we were speaking of conductors.

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes; 2,500. Now, as a matter of fact, in 1913, in which 713 conductors were appointed, at the end of the year 1913 there were 2,100 of our conductors who had been in the service of the company for one year or more. So those 713 were not appointed, of course, to keep up the stock of conductors to the average rate. And as to the porters in the year 1913, there were 2,325 appointed. At the end of that year there were 5,883 porters who had been in the service of the company a year or more. So those men were not appointed to keep up the stock of porters—that is, not wholly.

Chairman WALSH. Why were they appointed, Mr. Lincoln?

Mr. LINCOLN. They were appointed for extra service of all sorts. They were—there are conventions, and all over the United States there are many things going on for which extra cars are put on, as, for instance, for the inauguration ceremonies. I should say there would be a great many cars—300 or 400 extra cars—put on and a great many extra porters hired. It is that sort of thing that makes the great mass of appointments among those men. There are a great many being put on right now for the California travel. That does not indicate that there was that number dropped in the service, of porters and conductors.

Chairman WALSH. Going back for a moment to this compensation for the porters, do you say that the self-respect of the man is not degraded in any way by the receiving of tips, because he performs a service to somebody else for that?

Mr. LINCOLN. I think so; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; now, then, the wage you pay is $27.50, and take the case of a porter who testified in connection with the Pennsylvania, that you may have noticed; he says he supplements his salary so that it brings it up to about $115 per month.

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. He is on the Pennsylvania Limited?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. So he performs all the work as exacted by your company in his employment for $27.50 a month and he gets $87.50 for other services that he performs for the outside public, growing out of his service?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. For the Pullman Co.?

Mr. LINCOLN. If those are the figures, he is given that much, yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, Mr. Lincoln, would you or any executive officer of the company make any such arrangement as that with the Pullman Co.—that is, that you would take a diminished amount and then depend on an indefinite amount to be given you by outsiders?

Mr. LINCOLN. I confess to you, Mr. Chairman, I do not think this arrangement is ideal at all.

Chairman WALSH. Of course, its executive officers would not think of it. It is done because the man is on what might be called a low social scale, and also due to the fact that he is of the negro race?

Mr. LINCOLN. And, well, it is an old custom.

Chairman WALSH. And an old custom?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have the directors or the officials of this company ever attempted to abolish the tipping system?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that if you paid these men $60 per month out of the earnings of this company, and posted notices in the cars that you had done that, and that it was the wish of this company that these men should not be given those tips, that this custom would still continue?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, I can hardly say. I think you would have great trouble with the porters.

Chairman WALSH. You think what?

Mr. LINCOLN. I think the porters would be very much troubled.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think the porters would still insist on their getting the money?

Mr. LINCOLN. I think so. Oh, I can't say, sir. It would be a mere guess.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention ever been called to the fact, if it be a fact, that there is a widespread criticism of the Pullman Co. on account of this tipping system—that the public thinks these men would starve if they did not give the men the money?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, I never heard any such suggestion as that.

Chairman WALSH. You never heard any?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. In considering the salaries of your car-service employees, has the company ever taken into consideration its profits as having any bearing on what should be paid to the men?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, I think not, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You never had to take that into consideration—

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, I think not, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know what the hours are that are permitted for sleep of the men running in the Pullman Co.'s service?

Mr. LINCOLN. That is one of the details of operation which I learned, more than in any other way, from Mr. Hungerford's testimony. You refer to the car-service employees?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; the car-service employees.

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, I have no doubt the rules of the company are not exactly, if I understand correctly Mr. Hungerford's testimony, and strictly adhered to with the employees, you know.

Chairman WALSH. Do you mean that as efficient services can be expected from men who are given from one to four hours' sleep for one or more nights in succession—

Mr. LINCOLN. If that was literally complied with, I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Well, has it to be literally complied with or place the men in a position where they may lose their position if they go to sleep on duty?

Mr. LINCOLN. No; I don't think so, as to sleeping on duty. I don't think the rules laid down in the book are raked over the employees nearly so much as it would appear from the book. I don't think it is a fact. That would be shown to a great extent by the number of men that go through the year's service and get their bonus at the end of the year. It amounted last year to three-fourths of all the porters, for instance.

Chairman WALSH. Has an appeal ever been made to you, either as president or chairman of the board of directors, on the part of the car-service men who have been discharged for attempting to organize?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. For the alleged purpose of bettering their condition?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Has an appeal ever come to you as president of the company or to the board of directors, in your knowledge, from any discharged employee claiming unfairness on the part of the executive officials?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, I have had letters—not, I don't think, from porters—but I have had letters from discharged conductors wishing to be returned to service on the ground that they happened to have been dismissed.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that it is fair to deduct from the salaries of the porters amounts for lost linen on the cars?

Mr. LINCOLN. To a certain extent I do so, because I think otherwise the loss of linen would be very severe.

Chairman WALSH. Approximately, how much is collected from the porters per year for lost linen?

Mr. LINCOLN. I don't remember; I think it was given by Mr. Hungerford in his testimony.

Chairman WALSH. Well, if it was I have overlooked it.

Mr. LINCOLN. My impression was that it was $60,000 or $70,000, but that it did not begin to come up to the amount of the loss of linen. I would like to be very careful about it—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Somewhere about $60,000 or $70,000?

Mr. LINCOLN (continuing). But it is in Mr. Hungerford's testimony, Mr. Chairman—the amount.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I would not have asked you, but I did not recall it.

Commissioner AUSTON. If it is not in there it can be supplied.

Mr. LINCOLN. If it is not in Mr. Hungerford's testimony I wish you would make note of that, Mr. Daniels.

Mr. DANIELS. Yes.

Mr. LINCOLN. And have furnished the total amount for lost linen charged to the porters.

Mr. DANIELS. Certainly. I am quite sure, however, that it is in Mr. Hungerford's evidence.

Commissioner AUSTON. My recollection is that it is $35,000, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Now, who makes the contract for the uniforms for the men?

Mr. LINCOLN. The purchasing agent.

Chairman WALSH. And who is the purchasing agent?

Mr. LINCOLN. Mr. Bowen, isn't it, Mr. Daniels?

Mr. DANIELS. Yes.

Mr. LINCOLN. Director of purchases, we call it—Mr. Bowen.

Chairman WALSH. Are the porters and conductors required to pay the amount fixed in your contract price with Marshall Field & Co. in Chicago?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How long have they been buying their uniforms, or have you been requiring the men to buy their uniforms, from Marshall Field & Co.?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, I don't know; it has been for a number of years.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know how many years?

Mr. LINCOLN. No; I don't know. It is a good many years, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Is the Marshall Field estate a large owner of stock in the Pullman Co.?

Mr. LINCOLN. I don't suppose it owns any; I don't know anything—the Marshall Field estate?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh! Well, I don't know as to that. You know that the Marshall Field estate and Marshall Field & Co. are quite different affairs, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. LINCOLN. I think likely, to answer that question, I think very likely the Marshall Field estate owns stock in the Pullman Co., because Mr. Marshall Field did own stock in the Pullman Co.

Chairman WALSH. And Mr. Chauncey Keep is connected with the Marshall Field estate as a trustee?

Mr. LINCOLN. He is a trustee of the estate; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Is he connected with Marshall Field & Co.?

Mr. LINCOLN. With that corporation, I think not.

Chairman WALSH. And he is a director in the Pullman Co. also, I believe.

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Has he been a director in the Pullman Co. during all the time the men have purchased their uniforms from Marshall Field & Co.?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, no, sir; Mr. Keep, he is one of our newest directors. Do you remember, Mr. Daniels?

Mr. DANIELS. I can not give you the date; no, sir.

Mr. LINCOLN. Mr. Keep is one of the newest directors, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Who did he succeed, if you can recall the board of directors?

Mr. LINCOLN. I would have to think back. Well, he came along after the death of Mr. Field, for instance.

Chairman WALSH. Was Mr. Field in the Pullman Co. at the time this contract was made with Marshall Field & Co.?

Mr. LINCOLN. I could not answer that question, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was he a director in the Pullman Co. up to the time of his death?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock has a few questions he would like to ask you, Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let me ask you what opportunity, if any, is there for advancement? What opportunity, for example, of a negro porter who shows very high efficiency? Is there any provision—

Mr. LINCOLN (interrupting). There is no provision in our service, sir. We have no place to put him. A few of them, perhaps half a dozen, are made porters in the offices of district superintendents; I asked that question, and they said they had about a half dozen around somewhere here. That is all I know of.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So it is sort of what is known as a "blind alley" job?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, taking the officials of the company, the district superintendents and the superintendents, where are they recruited from?

Mr. LINCOLN. They are from the conductors, as a rule; also their assistants.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. About how many are there of such officials in the company?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, I have no data about that. We have 45 district superintendences and, according to the size of the office, they have more or less assistants. Their offices are open day and night, and a large office will have more of them. I could not tell, sir; I have not a list of that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, could you tell offhand, Mr. Lincoln, if any of those have come up from the ranks, and how many have been appointed from the outside—

Mr. LINCOLN. Mr. Hungerford testified that there were 90 per cent of them came up from the rank of conductors—had been appointed from the ranks of conductors.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So there is some possibility of promotion?

Mr. LINCOLN. Among the conductors?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. LINCOLN. Certainly, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The chairman was discussing the question of tips and asking whether, in your opinion, if the wage of the porter was raised to a living basis, you thought the tips would still be paid; and, if I remember rightly, you said you thought tips would be paid, no matter what wages were given?

Mr. LINCOLN. Some tips would be paid—some at least. That is a mere matter of guess on my part, but I do not believe you can stop a great many of the traveling public from rewarding a porter who does them some little service, such as brushing his coat and some little service like going on errands into other cars and getting a dinner sent in the diner and getting him anything, or buying a newspaper from the outside—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are acquainted with the custom in most of the clubs, if not all private clubs of the country, where tips are forbidden?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes. And we also have cards sent upon the approach of the holidays asking us for a contribution to a fund for tips at the end of the year.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; that is true. I suppose that would offset your extra month's pay that the company would allow at the end of the year for good service?

Mr. LINCOLN. The point is this, that all the clubs—I won't say all clubs, but I believe I belong to half a dozen large clubs, and I think I get a formal notice from the club every holiday season with a blank card requesting my subscription for what is called the Christmas fund for the employees.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; that is correct. I happen to know that is the custom; but to offset that your company allows, as I gather from the statement, it allows at the end of the year one month's extra pay to those who have made a good record?

Mr. LINCOLN. I don't think it was done on that basis, Mr. Commissioner. I think it was done as an incentive, as you please, to good service.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Just as I suppose the Christmas gift at the end of the year to the club employee is likewise offered as a recognition of good service.

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, I was told the other day that, for instance, at the Chicago Club, which is very near, as everybody here knows, to the Auditorium Hotel, that we have considerable difficulty in the Chicago Club in getting the waiters because of the tips at the hotel, which come in, and none come in in the club; and that we have considerable difficulty in doing so. There is that very thing shown right there on that street, within the confines of one block. Whether that is done by the clubs as a tip, or whether it is to keep the service of the waiters, I don't know, sir. When I say "the waiters" I mean the attendants in the club, because it goes to everybody.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I ask, Mr. Lincoln, what happens to a Pullman employee in the Pullman service if he is accidentally injured?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, that was gone into quite elaborately by Mr. Hungerford; but he is taken care of; oh, he is taken care of.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He gets compensation?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, the exact form which it takes I would not like to attempt to describe, because I have not gone into detail with it. I think Mr. Hungerford went into it quite carefully, but it is a very elaborate system. It is hospital service and it is payment of his wages during his disability, and so on.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And includes sick benefits?

Mr. LINCOLN. And sick benefits. I think there has never been any complaint by anybody on that subject, Mr. Commissioner.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And in the event of his being killed while in the service, what compensation, if any, goes to his family?

Mr. LINCOLN. There is none. There is no compensation goes to his family by any direction of the company, except this, it is the conductors, I think, who have formed an association among themselves—I believe it amounts to about 1,500 men—in which upon the death in any way of one of their members each of the members of the association, if you please to call it such, pays in $1 and the Pullman Co. adds 5 per cent to it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that goes to the family?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, yes. As to compensation under the State laws, I am not familiar with that, and I don't know.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. As you know, of course, Mr. Lincoln, there are some 24 or 25 States in the Union now that have come under what is known as the workmen's compensation act. I don't believe there is a Federal law except for Federal employees. Am I right, Mr. Lennon?

Commissioner LENNON. That is my understanding of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Just for Federal employees?

Mr. LINCOLN. Interstate-commerce employees.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. One for Federal employees and one for interstate-commerce employees?

Commissioner LENNON. Oh, that is workmen's compensation?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Not workmen's compensation, but liability.

Commissioner LENNON. Oh, he can get no compensation without bringing suit at common law?

Commissioner GARRETSON. None unless he makes settlement by compounding.

There is no Federal workmen's compensation law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see. So that your employees are thrown upon the generosity of their fellow workers and of the company?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, sir, I can not answer that question. I am entirely ignorant on it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, what would be your opinion, Mr. Lincoln? This commission, of course, as you know, is endeavoring to get the best judgment of workers and employers all over the country on proposed legislation that will tend to bring about a more harmonious feeling between the worker on the one hand and the employer on the other. We have discovered in our investigations that one of the underlying causes for industrial unrest is industrial accidents; and that it has further been forced upon our attention in our hearings all over the country that the workmen's compensation law that has been enacted in 24 or 25 States tends to minimize this industrial unrest and remove one of the causes of irritation, one of the causes of friction, and at the same time prevent or minimize the number that fall below the poverty line because of accidents; and to that degree the workmen's compensation act, wherever it has been adopted and carried out intelligently, has been an advantage to the injured worker and an advantage to the employer and an advantage to the State generally. What would be your judgment about a Federal workmen's compensation that would apply to interstate-commerce employees and that would insure them and their dependents compensation in the event of temporary or permanent injury or death on the part of the worker?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, that, Mr. Commissioner, is a subject I had not considered. I should start out feeling in a very friendly way toward it, but I do not know what are the arguments for or against it. I have never studied it or considered it. We have in our own company so seldom any accidents in our cars—that is a fact, very curious fact, but true—that that has never been very much of a practical question with us as a corporation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. LINCOLN. I should rather dislike to answer that question without hearing the arguments pro and con. My attitude toward it would be friendly, to start with.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The only arguments that have been offered against it, Mr. Lincoln, from the employers' side is that it puts an added burden upon the industry. That has been offset by the fact that it relieves the employer of serious burdens, and relieves him of annoyances, and relieves him of loss in the event of suits at law.

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So, that, take it in California, for example. A year ago there were 98 per cent of the employers who were opposed to the workmen's compensation act, but to-day there are 98 per cent in favor of it after seeing how it operates.

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, sir, that is very strong argument. I should say that the judgment of 98 per cent would overturn my view if I did not start out with them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, in your present frame of mind, Mr. Lincoln, you see no objections to a Federal workmen's compensation act?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir; not in my present frame of mind, Mr. Commissioner. Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would rather look upon it in a friendly way? Mr. LINCOLN. I would start out to do so.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson wants to ask you a few questions. Commissioner GARRETSON. I will have to go back to the Clover Club. In fixing the wages of the servants in your clubs do you know of any instances where the wages of these men is lowered on account of this Christmas fund or kept down?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, no.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It is not a wage factor in your club?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, not at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The fact is that the house committee in arranging that, in providing for a rule that there will be no tipping in the club, takes into consideration the fact what it will have to pay as wages if it desires to keep desirable employees, they will take that into consideration—the fact that they get no tips?

Mr. LINCOLN. The entertainment of the club, as far as I know—and I think I know a little about it, because I have been on committees in clubs as to comparative wages of waiters—

Commissioner GARRETSON. And they have to take into consideration the fact that they at other places get tips and they bar them there, and they will have to equalize wages that they get other places to a certain extent?

Mr. LINCOLN. They invite men to come as waiters upon a certain—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). And they don't come unless that wage will equalize what they will get at other places by a similar wages and tips accompanying, is that true as a general proposition?

Mr. LINCOLN. I don't know how it is, sir; I suppose they want to make a certain amount of money, no doubt.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In testifying to the wages of these porters, you used the phrase, that whatever the wage might be, tips to a greater or less extent might be given anyway?

Mr. LINCOLN. I feel so; I have no personal doubt about it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You also testified that if tips were abolished the company would have to raise its wages to keep its men?

Mr. LINCOLN. Undoubtedly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If that is the case and you are now paying $27.50 per month, sliding, say to a man 23 years in your service—one testified before us in Chicago, produced by your own company, by the way, that he was getting $28.40 after that many years' service—if that man was getting $30 a month, and you were compelled to pay him $60 a month if the tips were abolished, are not the stockholders of the Pullman Co. the real tip takers?

Mr. LINCOLN. As a mathematical proposition, that would be so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You really are capitalizing the tipping system on your road by keeping the wages low?

Mr. LINCOLN. That is not necessarily so; the tips would be paid, anyhow.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And if they are accepted you believe in the corporation getting them in place of the coon?

Mr. LINCOLN. I don't say that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am only taking that as it works out. Have you ever figured up what would be the difference in the amount of money that it takes to pay that 6,500 porters $30 a month, which is about your present rate, $60 a month?

Mr. LINCOLN. That is a matter of paper and pencil.

Commissioner GARRETSON. A couple of million dollars a year?

Mr. LINCOLN. It would be $30 a month.

Commissioner GARRETSON. For 6,500 men?

Mr. LINCOLN. Would be $360 a year for 6,500 men.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Two million three hundred and forty thousand dollars?

Mr. LINCOLN. Something like that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It would make a very material difference in the surplus or dividend rate?

Mr. LINCOLN. Undoubtedly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then the question really resolves itself into economics pure and simple?

Mr. LINCOLN. It would be approximately that, of course.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is the reason underlying?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir; but it was not started on that basis, Mr. Commissioner, of course. It is a situation which we found, you know, and I might say it is a situation on which the rates to the public on Pullman car service was based.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not probable that it had its foundation in a condition that existed before the 60's when certain railroad companies owned their brakemen, I mean in fee; they had bills of sale for their brakemen, I know two railroads that did that?

Mr. LINCOLN. I see. [Laughs.]

Commissioner GARRETSON. This is something of a parallel, only the employer is less responsible than the owner is. [Witness laughs.] In the total that you gave of dividends that were paid by this company, you did not include the stock dividends?

Mr. LINCOLN. I mentioned them as stock dividends.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But in the total of dividends paid, you did not include the amount of the stock dividends which were issued as new capital? I understand your reply that you did not?

Mr. LINCOLN. I mentioned the figures of $159,000,000, which was cash dividends.

Chairman WALSH. He gave them both.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I overlooked the fact that you included that, because they are really another form of dividend?

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, certainly. But that was not made entirely out of the sleeping-car company service.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I suppose there was a stage when it was made out of land profits?

Mr. LINCOLN. Not much.

Commissioner GARRETSON. When you owned the town?

Mr. LINCOLN. I would like to have you pay us what we lost in that town.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am perfectly competent to pay it; I am getting a good wage on this commission.

Mr. LINCOLN. I would say, Mr. Commissioner, on that, that as a matter of fact during the period which ended on July 31, 1915, the amount of profits of the company which have gone into stock, into this stock surplus and dividends, was $161,000,000, which differs from my reply of $159,000,000, which results from some difference in figures.

Chairman WALSH. I have $161,000,000.

Mr. LINCOLN. Very well, sir; and at the same time the manufacturing and miscellaneous earnings were $68,000,000, so that manufacturing produced about 30 per cent of the total.

Commissioner GARRETSON. My question was based on the fact that surplus and dividends come from practically the same source, but called by a different name, and distributed in different forms when represented by a stock dividend.

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir; certainly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Did your company increase its stock when it purchased the Mann Boudoir Car Co.?

Mr. LINCOLN. What?

Commissioner GARRETSON. The Mann Co.

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir. What we did in that case, years ago, we did not increase our stock; we paid that in cash.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, that company had no plant except its rolling stock and patents?

Mr. LINCOLN. No; some trivial things, not of any consequence. I don't know. Was that Ludlow? Did it belong to it? I think I may answer that they had no plant.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Their cars were built on contract?

Mr. LINCOLN. I suppose Barney & Smith did that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Did you utilize them in your own business or dispose of them elsewhere?

Mr. LINCOLN. That is before my time, but I think we used them a little and destroyed them.

Commissioner GARRETSON. They were not sold abroad?

Mr. LINCOLN. No, sir; but that was before my time.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You spoke of the fact that it makes for the good relations in the property that 90 per cent of your district superintendents and their assistants come from the ranks?

Mr. LINCOLN. I think so, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it a historical as well as an operating truth that the most merciless overseer is the one that comes out of the ranks of those he oversees?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, sir, I have no basis on which to discuss that subject; I don't think that is correct; I don't think it is correct in our company, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am not applying it on the historical or industrial basis of your company, but applying it in general.

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, I don't think that is so. It does not strike me as being a fact in my observation, if I may say it that way.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The average I am going somewhat on.

Mr. LINCOLN. You were thinking, for instance—I beg your pardon; I am not asking questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Sure; ask it.

Mr. LINCOLN. On the question, for instance, of appointing officers of the Army out of the noncommissioned rank; is that your idea?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Praise be, I have had no experience in that line. I am taken from the ranks of my own craft, where railroad officers are taken from the ranks of conductors. As a rule, until they get settled—that is, until they light—we have more difficulty with that class of officials than with almost any of the others. They know too much or require too much; I don't know which.

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Can you readily grasp that that might be the case?

Mr. LINCOLN. I can see an individual case where that might be so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Individual cases are what make up the whole.

Mr. LINCOLN. If there are enough of them.

Commissioner LENNON. What standard of education does the porter have to meet in order to be employed?

Mr. LINCOLN. I have never heard of it; but of course he must read and write.

Commissioner LENNON. And that you think is all? Do you require a physical examination?

Mr. LINCOLN. I don't know about that. As a fact, they are employed, Mr. Commissioner, by the district superintendents, and just how far they examine them I don't know; I can't answer that. I no doubt think he would want to see the negro that was healthy, and would not want him if he was not, and was cleanly, and could read and write, to the extent enough anyway to keep checks.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Lincoln, this commission has been authorized by Congress to ascertain, if possible, the cause of industrial unrest. You have to do with large financial affairs and the employment of a large number of people. What, in your opinion, are the underlying causes?

Mr. LINCOLN. That, of course, is a very large question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you any special opinion?

Mr. LINCOLN. I would rather be excused from answering that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You recognize that there is such a thing?

Mr. LINCOLN. There is undoubtedly unrest. So far as it comes to me, it is that employees want more pay, and I don't blame them for wanting more compensation.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose that an underlying cause would be that the employers did not meet with their working people and take them into their confidence and treat with them and argue with them as to their conditions of employment and wages and hours, and so forth?

Mr. LINCOLN. I would not think that would be so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you suppose that a cause of industrial unrest, when a large employer simply sits down with a board of directors, and he sits and fixes the wages or the hours of employment, and sets the standard for working people without them having anything to say in it, that that is not what causes that unrest?

Mr. LINCOLN. I have never heard it given as one, is all I can say. I have never studied it.

Commissioner AUSTON. I believe the question was asked as to whether there was any future for the negro porter. As a matter of fact, in the Pullman service is there not a constant advancement from an extra porter to a man on a regular run, and as his age and his service increases he keeps progressing to the better runs all of the time?

Mr. LINCOLN. I suppose that is so. I was thinking that the commission had in mind outside of the rank of porters. There is no service for him, except as a porter in the service. He gets the schedule that Mr. Hungerford gives. Of course, that brings up the question, no doubt, if the best porter gets on what they call the best run.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is where their layover is at home nights, and they are away from home a minimum time, and their compensation is greater than on some other run?

Mr. LINCOLN. There is no doubt about it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. When we had our hearing in Chicago, I asked one of your porters that appeared before our commission, who had been in the employ of your company for many, many years, on one of the good runs from New York to Chicago, one of their best runs. I asked him if laws were enacted to make it prohibitive and illegal to accept tips, what would have been the result, and I am quite sure the reply was, "There would be no porters to take the cars out." If that law was enacted, in your opinion what would be the result?

Mr. LINCOLN. You mean, Mr. Commissioner, if an effective law was enacted?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes, sir; effective interstate and otherwise?

Mr. LINCOLN. Of course, the porters would have to be paid a living wage, no doubt; there would be no two-minute case in that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You answered a question from the chairman, and you stated, in your opinion, there should be a certain increase in the wages of conductors?

Mr. LINCOLN. Some increase.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I used the word certain in an uncertain sense.

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And you failed to answer the other question that went in that, do you believe that there should be an increase in the wages of the porters, also?

Mr. LINCOLN. I think there ought to be a change in our system.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In that direction?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, questions were asked you on the compensations to employees injured. Is it not a fact that your company takes the invariable position that your employees injured in train accidents must look to the railway company for recovery?

Mr. LINCOLN. I can not answer that question. If you will let me consult our general solicitor, I might answer it; but I can not answer it without consultation with our legal department.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Daniels might answer it, if he wishes.

Mr. DANIELS. As a matter of fact, the liability in every case is the liability of the railroad company. They always have an action against the railroad company, and one recovered against the Reading the other day for $14,000.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And you are not assuming their liability?

Mr. DANIELS. Unfortunately, we do in some cases. We paid the Reading judgment. That voucher went out on the day I started for here.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Unfortunately for the company. I would not be uncharitable enough to say, Start again.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If the railway company assumes the liability, why would your company be called upon to reimburse the railroad company?

Mr. DANIELS. That is a matter that has to do with the making of our contract. When I first consulted Mr. Pullman, in 1895, about being employed with his company he said: "We are a large company, but with the railroads of the country we are the tail that the dog wags. The strong railroads require indemnities from us and others do not. The impracticability all over the country in these compensation laws is what they make us pay when of necessity the railroad has the accident that we do not produce."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In your judgment and opinion, would it be a good thing from the standpoint of both the company and the workers if there was a Federal compensation law along the line of the existing State laws?

Mr. DANIELS. I think both the State and Federal laws are an injustice to the Pullman Co., because they compel us to pay for what another man does; that is, the railroad company. We in some instances had to indemnify the railroad companies, and in others it does not require us to do so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What would be your opinion as to the wisdom and equity of a Federal compensation law on interstate commerce?

Mr. DANIELS. That would be giving an opinion for or against the railroad companies. I say it is not just to the Pullman Co., and I don't want to speak for the railroad companies.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Speaking as a member of society and having the general public at heart?

Mr. DANIELS. The railroad companies would not think I was speaking that way. I don't want to offend the railroad companies with the tail that the dog wags.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, Mr. Lincoln; you may be excused permanently now.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT OF MR. JOHN T. BOURKE.

I will state that I omitted to tell that Mr. Williams told me that the settlement of $500 had been made because that owing to their experience of a somewhat like nature the company had found that it was almost impossible to find a judge or jury who would favor the corporations. I had asked them at the time the charges were made to take it into open court, and I felt that I would then get the vindication I seek.

STATEMENT OF PULLMAN CONDUCTORS.

(Page 1.)

CHICAGO, ILL.

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS:

DEAR SIR: In laying the following facts before you we are only making another of our many efforts to get a living wage, improve our working conditions, and get placed on a footing with our brother railroad men, where we can get fair treatment, better pay for work actually done, and relief from persecutions from petty officials.

Our scale of wages follows:

	Per month.
First 6 months.....	$70
Second 6 months.....	75
First year.....	80
Second to fifth year.....	85
Fifth to tenth year.....	90
Then indefinitely.....	95

A few runs pay $100 per month. One uniform, including cap, per year costs us $19.50. After 10 years of service one free uniform per year is furnished us. At the end of each year, if our record is perfect, we get the extra check. That means if our salary is $70, our extra check is $70; if our salary is $80, the check is $80, etc. If our record is assessed 5 days it can be erased by a 6 months' clear record; 10 days can be erased by a 9 (page 2) months' clear record; 15 days can not be worked out. So, if an employee has been penalized 15 days on the first day of the year, the most exemplary conduct and perfect service for the ensuing 12 months will fail to procure that coveted check.

A conductor is now required to take 10 days' schooling, for which he is allowed pay at the rate of $70 per month. During this period of 10 days he is taught the different forms of tickets; reports; passes; rates; heating, lighting, and ventilation of cars, of which there are from five to seven different kinds; how to "make down" beds and put them away. He is required to know the duties of the porter as well as his own. He is not taught nor shown one single thing about railroad tickets, although in 95 per cent of the runs he is required to take up railroad tickets and is held strictly responsible for them, as they are in his possession until taken up by last train conductor handling his car or returned to passenger upon reaching destination. He must see and know that every railroad ticket is properly routed over the roads his cars go, the same amount of care being exercised in taking up railroad passes. Many Pullman conductors have had the experience of picking up train conductors who were unable to properly get their portion (page 3) of the long coupon tickets, and the Pullman conductor has to go to their assistance, which he does willingly, feeling that his own company would require him to do this work which he is not supposed to do.

This company was recently called to task by the State of California for small wages paid its men in the train service, and the assertion made by one of our highest officials that we (the conductors) were classed as common laborers, is enough to make every man with a bit of pride left rise up and yell, "liar." We claim no man can intelligently perform the services required of conductors on Pullman sleeping cars without being educated in reading, writing, arithmetic, politeness, patience, diplomacy, and humility. The general patron of Pullman cars knows that the slightest complaint made to the general offices will bring a storm down on the head of the employee, not to speak of statement after statement he is compelled to write. We claim to have more complicated and a greater variety of reports than the train conductor. We have more complaints to adjust, which require politeness, patience, and diplomacy than the train conductor, and which no common laborer who is versatile enough to succeed as truck driver or street cleaner could accomplish. And woe to the conductor who is unable to pacify the passenger who has been peeved by a mistake made in selling him his ticket, defective car heating, faulty ventilation, etc. Every conductor has had the experience of (page 4) dealing with one passenger who complains of the heat and one who complains of the cold on the same car. Could the truck driver, the street cleaner, or even the man of good average intelligence, but inexperienced in handling all classes of travelers, pacify these peevish dispositions, have them in a sweet humor before alighting from car, and ready and willing to swear that the Pullman Co. is so absolutely perfect to the smallest of details that they must tell all their friends?

We have "better service," "better service" poured into us by the broadside in meetings, circular letters, order books. We all make a tremendous effort to keep down complaints by giving this better service. We are told it is our duty to make this method of travel popular, pleasant, and, last but not least, profitable to our employers. We are paid $70 and $80 for this service. We pay $19.50 for a uniform that must come from the Marshall Field Co., and which must be kept clean, pressed, and repaired, adding considerable to the above figure. We must pay, while away from our home district for meals on high-priced diners and equally high-priced railroad eating houses, the prices they ask. We generally find, if we satisfy a healthy appetite, we are indebted to the railroad company 50 cents, 75 cents, and $1. We must pay 75 cents and $1 for hotel accommodations, where a bed in a car is not available and (page 5) where company has no sleeping quarters. We are away from home a week, two weeks, or a month, and no small item is the laundry bill. Add to this the dependent family, or mother, father, or sister back home. We are receiving $70 and $80 per month from one of the richest corporations in the world and giving value received in intelligent, painstaking service. At the above salary we are able to live. Nothing more can be said. The strictest economy fails to leave us anything for the inevitable rainy day. Half of our salary to enable us to work and half to pay expenses back home. This conductor is the employee looked to to smooth the rough edges, to make it so pleasant and agreeable they will make their next trip on a Pullman car. It is a common laborer's wage but not his work.

Another illustration: The conductor on a run of from three to five days and nights of continuous service will average three to five hours' sleep each night. While awake, whether tired or sleepy, he must maintain that cheerful, smiling countenance at all times. While asleep he is held just as responsible for anything that may happen as if he were awake. This is certainly a great strain and wearing on the physical make-up of a man. Seventy, seventy-five, and eighty dollars per month is the compensation for being able to handle three to eight cars of this company on a three to five day and night trip. Naturally a man (page 6) being awake so many hours out of each 24 and having to travel the entire length of from three to eight long Pullman cars a great many times, has no trouble in carrying a healthy appetite. On a $70 to $80 salary how much do you suppose he can humor this appetite in high-priced diners and station lunch rooms? The prices mentioned, viz, 50 cents, 75 cents, and $1, representing amounts we pay for our meals en route, are characterized "rates"; that is, we are paying a little less than the passenger. We are, many times, forced to pay the full rate and then the conductor, this "perfectly satisfied" employee of a most generous corporation, feels that a small period of fasting and extremely light lunch will restore his overworked stomach to normal.

Our company requires each conductor to furnish a bond of $400 which they, the company, pay for themselves. Sleeping-car porters are not bonded, yet they are put in entire charge of cars from starting point to end of run, and to-day some of the most despicable runs north of the Mason and Dixon line are operated by porters. The porter running in charge of a sleeping car receives $42.50 per month, and when he is on a car handled regularly by a Pullman conductor he receives $27.50 per month. At the periodical meetings held wherein porters and conductors are lectured on "better service" and generally (page 7) presided over by district superintendents and higher officials, the porters are continually reminded that their nickels, dimes, and quarters received as tips from passengers depend on themselves. They are urged to greater activity to procure more and larger tips. Why? To keep down dissatisfaction on their part, and the public is asked to pay this additional toll. The company won't pay it. The public must. Without the public's assistance the porter could not exist. No passenger may expect, after buying a ticket for a Pullman car, to get much service from a porter on his second trip if he fails to bestow the tip on the first trip.

Your railroad tickets are in possession of these irresponsible, unbonded porters, whose only obligation to the company is to be careful enough to hold their jobs, whose only incentive to honesty is the fear of being discharged, as he knows that is the extreme punishment he can receive. This porter "running in charge" is in complete charge and authority on this car—is up and awake all night back and forth through this car where your mother, wife, or sister is alone occupying a berth. Let me repeat that the worst punishment meted out to him—and he knows it only too well—for an offense against the passengers or dishonest act is dismissal, and to judge from the expressions of many of them, it is to be expected and has been expected—they feel they have not lost much, as most any kind of work will pay a (page 8) better salary than this, where they are forced to pay for any and all losses that occur from equipment of cars. I would ask the Pullman traveler how many cases of return of articles lost on Pullman sleeping cars he has heard of? If one could afford the experiment, let him leave an article of value about the car—an article without marks of identification. He might recover possession of it and he might not. Suppose you were the loser, and knowing the working conditions of the employees on this car, would you not feel that the policy of this company in making this porter exert himself to the utmost to earn him enough to give him enough to live on places him in a position where he is not to blame? I doubt if the matter has ever been placed before the public in this light before, but wish to assure you these are the bare facts. One of the authors of this note was for a number of years in a position in one of our largest districts where he had occasion to handle considerable correspondence relative to losses on cars, and we speak from knowledge when we say the recovery of valuable articles is far outnumbered by their non-recovery. It is hard to make a comparison between the two following thoughts, but they come to mind: We read so much about the small salaries paid bank employees who handle large sums of money—the argument in favor of better pay being that with a satisfactory salary he will not yield to temptation. Human nature is the same the world over. Here is (page 9) the irresponsible, unbonded porter—salary $27.50 and $42.50 per month—amounts often being deducted for losses—in entire charge of a car where passengers are soundly sleeping—baggage, jewelry, money running into the thousands, in their charge. Nothing between him and sleeping passengers but two curtains buttoned together. During the long hours of the night no one enters this car except an occasional brakeman. Train conductor, having secured his portion of the railroad tickets from porter, returns them to him and never sees the inside of car on this trip unless called in. Lights are extinguished in body for better sleeping comfort of passengers, making it nearly dark. Here you have the situation. Does it suggest anything? Because of the company's attitude on this question, the porter feels at liberty to go to extremes to procure this levy the Pullman Co. requires of their passengers in order to take a trip on their cars in comfort. It is a common practice among porters to acquaint each other regarding a passenger's disposition to "come across," so the regular patrons of our cars may rest assured the service rendered him before he tips is commensurate with his record as a tipper. To get just the ordinary service rightfully due him when he purchased a Pullman ticket, he must pay extra. Any porter can tell you of experiences in handling different classes of travel. For instance, theatrical troupes, (page 10) baseball clubs, etc., are bad tippers, and a porter having a number of days continuous service with this class of travel is generally down to one meal a day and a cheap one at that. Their salary is too small to last from one pay day to the next, so where there are no tips there are no "po'k chops." one pay day to the next, so where there are no tips there are no "po'k chops."

On the other hand, porters on lines well patronized by traveling salesmen have been known to make $100 per month or more. We do not wish to convey the impressions that all Pullman porters are dishonest, although we heard one of the company's officials say: "The Pullman Co. has a system which is making more dishonest men than anything I know of." We believe many are able to withstand the miserable salary, bad treatment, etc., and still remain honest. But suppose he is still smarting under a recent 5, 10, 15 day penalization for some insignificant matter, or has been made to pay for losses on his car, and he finds himself with barely enough to purchase another day's meals. The opportunity presents itself. He accepts it. His strong denials are of no avail. He does not worry. It is merely a matter of another job. The bundle of correspondence between this employee, his superintendent, the suspicious loser, and the general offices grows and grows. Everybody who in any way could possibly be connected with this loss is given a chance to explain, but all to no purpose. Our company (page 11) intimates some place in this big bundle of correspondence to the passenger, that some fellow passenger is the culpable party. But that porter is looking for another job. You may have your suspicions, but you nor anyone else can prove them. It is a closed incident with this company, and it may as well be with you.

While on this subject of tipping, let me mention another incident of how the salary paid us is responsible for the conductor making a play for a tip. In mentioning this instance I believe I am safe in saying 98 per cent of the conductors could plead guilty if accused of it. We will suppose the conductor is in charge of three cars running between two important points. Travel is always heavy. The first comer gets choice lower berth in center of car. Within 10 minutes of leaving time, four men, arriving late, are informed by ticket agent, "No lowers left, plenty of uppers." Each buys ticket for upper. They enter car at different periods, and as each one hands Pullman conductor his ticket tells him he wants a lower if some one fails to show up. Conductor promises to remember each request. Now, to be absolutely fair, passenger first requesting a lower should be given preference if there is one to be had. We will now suppose that the fourth and last man to make the request for a lower berth quietly slips a coin into the conductor's palm, after this passenger No. 4 discovers there (page 12) is one lower berth and three candidates for it besides himself. It is so easy that it is laughable to say to and convince the other three that the fourth man gets the lower because he was first to make the request. Our company can not truthfully deny this happens continually. Many traveling men can vouch for its truth. It happens in cars in charge of conductors or porters. As an example of how this company acts when such things are made public, let us relate how the passenger buys a Pullman ticket for upper at ticket office after being informed by the ticket agent, "All lowers gone." Upon departure of train he finds that passenger for one lower fails to put in an appearance, so he purchases same from Pullman conductor. In addition to paying the difference of 20 per cent he tips Pullman conductor 50 cents. He later took the matter up with some railroad commission who got into communication with the Pullman Co. Here is the result. This Pullman conductor was forced to take a 30-day leave of absence and later discharged. Can't we get relief from these conditions? It is necessary to resort to every scheme outside of deliberate stealing to make ends meet. If we were paid sufficient wages, don't you believe we would think too much of the position, have more respect for ourselves and employers, make greater, more free-hearted, impartial efforts to please the traveling public than to do anything of this (page 13) nature?

Another feature of this service and one that any fair-minded man will admit is a monstrous piece of injustice is the work we do for which we receive no pay. For instance, a conductor is notified during the day he is to take charge of cars leaving at 2, 3, or 4 o'clock the next morning. He knows he must be on hand to commence receiving passengers generally at 9 p. m. and stay at his post until departure of train at 2, 3, or 4 next a. m., making five, six, or seven hours duty on the platform before his trip commences. In making out his time slip it will read, 2, 3, or 4 o'clock, as the case may be, which signifies to the company that he commenced work at this time. No mention is made on any records that he put in these five, six, or seven hours. We understand that our day commences at midnight, so we are supposedly paid from midnight on, but not a cent do we get for the time spent on the platform previous to 12 o'clock, and we have all had the experience of receiving passengers several hours in cold, raw, rainy, and snowy weather. We will suppose the railroad schedule gives his cars as due to arrive at their destination at 2 p. m.

that same day, but are five hours late, arriving at 7 p. m. His time slip will read arriving 2 p. m., although he is required to make all his reports read exact time of arrival, together with reason for late arrival. As he will not be allowed any time for these (page 14) extra five hours, it is of no consequence to him or the company whether his time slip reads arriving at 2 or 7 p. m. Can you imagine any railroad man in this country contributing five hours of his labor and time to his company without receiving pay for them? I could tell you of an instance where, a short time ago, one of our men was ordered to take charge of a car that made the round trip—getting him back to his home district in five hours—for which he received nothing. He was informed it would be useless to issue a time slip covering this period as the company would refuse to honor it.

Here is still another illustration of the greediness of our company: We have been assured time and time again that we are paid for time away from our home district, whether we worked or not. Now suppose the conductor is assigned to a car or cars due to leave his station at 1 p. m.—one hour after noon, January 1. He reaches his destination at 9 p. m. the same night. He is reassigned to cars that will bring him back to his district at 9 a. m., January 2. As our time is computed from midnight on, he receives pay from midnight. He would get no more if it took him until 12 o'clock to get back home. For the time he has put in from 1 p. m. until midnight, January 1, he receives nothing, notwithstanding the fact that he has purchased something to eat two or three times. Might not one appropriately say we have to pay to work for the Pullman Co.?

Again, suppose (page 15) conductor is in St. Paul, Minn., and his home district is St. Louis. He starts from St. Paul at 8 p. m. on car destined Chicago, at which place he arrives at 11 a. m. next day. Fifteen hours on the road. Surely a day's work. If he would go no farther than Chicago he would be entitled to one day's pay for 15 hours' work, but as he must get to his own district, which is St. Louis, he is put in charge of car going to this point and we will say arriving there 9 p. m. By getting in before midnight he gets nothing for this extra six or eight hours' work. Is this kind of treatment calculated to bring out that honest, sincere effort; that fair, impartial treatment of passengers?

Make the acquaintance of any Pullman conductor, and after he is convinced you are not a spotter or special agent of the company he will shortly convince you that conditions are at times almost unbearable; of the many unfair tactics of petty officials; of the man with the pull getting the cream; of the rough, abusive, and, many times, profane language he is forced to endure; and if he hasn't had the experience himself, he knows of or has heard of the many conductors who have been abused and ordered from the office when only in quest of information on something they do not understand. If you remind him of what a huge piece of beneficence that extra check is he will agree with all of his brother conductors in saying the men that get that check certainly earn it, and also (page 16) tell you of how during the last two or three months of the year the company saves thousands of dollars by greatly increasing the number of spotters, who well repay the company by turning in reports and complaints on the men sufficient to get them a five days' penalization, which kills all chances of getting the check, as five days can not be erased from his record short of six months' perfect record. He will tell you of service inspectors hiding behind posts or corners watching him while he receives passengers, or boarding rear of last car and come sneaking up through train, and if he finds a cigar or cigarette stub in a cuspidor or a ventilator not opened or not closed or a used towel not put away, or dust on the platform or window sill or passageway, or berth curtain not properly hooked, or his uniform soiled, not brushed, or not pressed, or his cap shiny around edges, or if temperature in car is cool enough for comfort of passengers asleep and conductor is on watch until 3 a. m., and if caught using a blanket while sitting up in seat to keep warm, etc., he is promptly bawled out, whether passengers are present or not; and, not content with this, a full written report goes to the chief service inspector, who promptly hands you the inevitable 5, 10, or 15 days. You ask if he likes his work, and he will invariably tell you he does; but if he has thought the matter over he will tell you the job has no future. After 10 years' (page 17) service he is drawing $95 per month. He will continue to draw that amount after 20, 30, and 35 years' service. The only promotion he can look forward to is to some time "bump" some conductor off a run that is easier than his. He will tell you that the position he holds is not the attractive job it is generally supposed to be. In addition to having to endure the bulldozing and abuse of his own company officials, he dare not defend himself against the same treatment of railroad employees, as he knows and has seen it demonstrated times without number his own company will not accord him their support. He will tell you he is the buffer knocked back and forth between the traveling public, the train crews, the railroad officials, and his own company.

Our high official spoke only too true when he said we were classified as common laborers. He spoke literally. We are both classed and treated as such. There is a long record of minor abuses, insults, broken promises, etc., that no body of organized men would endure, because they don't have to. These more fortunate men can remember when they had the same things to contend with; but now, standing shoulder to shoulder, they represent the highest class of men on the face of the earth belonging to the laboring class as regards intelligence, sincere efforts, and honesty of purpose. Our many efforts to get together for the purpose of asking an improvement and relief from present conditions, and having (page 18) met defeat each and every time in some mysterious way—no one seems to know how it is accomplished—gives ample ground for believing report that our company has an immense reserve fund set aside for the purpose of fighting any and all attempts on our part to improve our conditions or even to get a hearing. We read almost daily of legislation against corporations, or combinations run in restraint of trade, for the sole purpose of improving the condition of the laboring man, etc.; but who has heard of any attempt to investigate the working conditions and wages paid by this mammoth corporation, which pays an average salary of about equal to that of the lowest branch of the railroad service. We occasionally read in daily papers a short 15 or 20 line account regarding this company which can be classed as a criticism. The interested reader need not look on another page nor invest in any future editions of this same paper expecting to get more information, because this one little gasp is the last. This publication evidently can not find the smallest reason for offering further criticism, which gives rise to another suspicion, viz., that there is much truth in the reports often whispered among the employees that our wide awake company has an extremely capable man overlooking everything of an interesting nature at our Nation's Capital City—has an extremely capable man in Chicago whose (page 19) sole duty is to see that no newspaper gets any other idea than that the service rendered by this company, the example it sets to other organizations, is above par. That famous and patriotic exclamation, "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute!" comes to mind with but a slight variation. We can suggest to our worthy company, as their motto, its adoption with the following reconstruction: "Millions for suppression, but not one cent to improve our employees' welfare!"

Now, for an absolutely true incident that will convince the most skeptical, narrow-minded, "company's man" of the truth of these statements. During the winter of 1913 and 1914 one of the conductors, bound for Chicago from a western district, became so ill that he was unable to attend to his duties into Chicago, having to give up and lie down before finishing his run. Upon arrival at Chicago he was immediately taken to the conductors' quarters, a place capable of housing from 20 to 25 men, and maintained by the company, free of charge, for the conductors. Between one and two weeks this sick man was sheltered in this same house and same room with his brother conductors before it was discovered he had smallpox. He arose the morning of the last day he was there so deathly sick that a physician was at once summoned. He had been spotted for over a week but on this morning in question, large red, sore-looking bumps broke out over his face (page 20), back of his ears, and hands. He was hurriedly taken to the pesthouse, our company and city physicians and company officials notified, from 8 to 12 conductors who were in the house over night vaccinated, everybody instructed to report for work as usual, and that same afternoon and night every one of those conductors who were exposed to this terrible malady went out on their runs as if nothing had happened. The ~~for~~ ^{conductors} who had been coming and going all the time this contagious disease was in the house were rounded up when they would happen to reach Chicago and vaccinated. A 3-inch item in a secluded portion of one of the daily papers told of the patient being removed to the pesthouse. This closed the incident. Our wide-awake specialty man, he of the chair of suppression, had the chance of a lifetime to display his power and influence, and no one can dispute the fact that he made an artistic success of it. Were it not so much a question with us of right and wrong treatment, abuses, their suppressing, grinding down tactics, we, their humble employees, who so many times have to pay for the privilege of working for this despotic organization, would feel like rising up and proclaiming our deep and lasting admiration for this wonderful brainy system that bends publications, railroad commissioners, lawmakers, and State officials to their will, an influence reaching from coast to coast, from Canada to the Gulf. (Page 21.) What wonderful brains must be behind this company, which is richer than the most prosperous railroad system or group of railroads. No competition. No opposition. Their perfect system of suppressing the newspapers, their immense fighting reserve fund, a powerful influence which can be made felt from the lowest to the highest in authority. No curbing tactics attempted from laws, lawyers, or commissions. On the other hand there is continual legislation against any company organization after their first suspicious move. Only recently a Chicago paper in an interview with their mayor published his suggestions for an increase in pay for the street railway employees. With their every night and an average of two meals at home each day they are drawing a better salary than the Pullman conductors. Nevertheless Mayor Harrison says, "Street car men are notoriously underpaid. The suggestion has been made that the city could well afford to set aside a certain percentage of its receipts from the surface lines, blood money which is first of all extracted from the public by means of inferior service and secondly from the traction employees who work an excessive number of hours for an insufficient hourly wage." This is only another of the many thousand efforts being made to help the victim of a big corporation.

These written pages are not the expressions of one (page 22) dissatisfied employee. Could you listen to a discussion of any length by two or more conductors, you will find this subject invariably turns to wages, conditions, treatment, etc., and if you get an expression from every conductor in this group or any other group in any district of this company you will not fail to detect the discouraged, dissatisfied tone and general air of dejection, and if you catch his words you will no longer be in doubt as to the extreme bitterness of feeling toward his company.

Another great cause for dissatisfaction is the way this extra or bonus check is handled. We are promised this extra money at end of year in return for perfect records. To illustrate a point in mind we will take two conductors of 12 years' service—$95 per month. Both have regular runs. One conductor has an easy one-car run which takes him one night to make trip and one night to return. He never makes a mistake in his reports because there is nothing complicated to handle. He is an easy-going fellow; never exerts himself, because he doesn't have to. His highest ambition is to "get by" without trouble, without extra work, and, everything being so perfectly easy, he never fails to get the bonus. Conductor No. 2 handles four and five cars, is two days and two nights on road, has complicated rates to look up, heavy travel, compelled to work fast, supervises service on four or five cars, and (page 23) at end of year has 12 mistakes recorded against him—1 per month. Conductor No. 2 is hard working, ambitious, anxious to please, etc., and has been mentioned in a highly complimentary way by passengers a number of times. These letters of commendation always find their way into the hands of the chief service inspector, and we are told our record is decorated with "credits" as a result. Now, conductors Nos. 1 and 2 are absolutely honest. We will suppose that their reputation for honesty is so well established that their worst enemy would not accuse them of taking anything that did not belong to them. The end of the year finds conductor No. 2 without his bonus. His honesty, his extra efforts to please patrons of his cars, his "credits," go for naught. Conductor No. 1 has received his bonus. He did not make any mistake on his reports, did not receive a single credit, but is $95 richer than his honest, harder working, unfortunate brother conductor. Truly a great system! What wonderful inducements to remain honest, to exert yourself to do more than is required by the book of rules. We can mention two different cases where conductors situated as conductor No. 2—on runs requiring hard work, the highest class of service—fail to receive this bonus because of mistakes in their reports. One of these conductors had been on this run for several years. It was considered a very difficult run to handle. (Page 24) His honesty was unquestioned. He failed to receive the bonus check on account of a number of incidentals. According to his own words, he lost faith in the company, in his employers, lost interest in his work, and brooded over the injustice of the act until he decided to get that money, regardless of the consequences. Of course, he was detected, and when brought before the officials had the courage to admit it, and gave them as his reason that he felt he was unjustly dealt with and determined to get what he felt was rightfully his. He was told to go back to work and redeem himself. By sending him back to work the company virtually admitted the conductor was right. Isn't there some way to prevent a corporation employing thousands and thousands from continually holding before their employees' eyes an extra whole month's salary, reminding them week after week and month after month that it is within reach, causing them to look forward and plan and strain every nerve and then at the last moment, without previous notice, inform you, "You will not participate on account of such and such an incident happening on such and such a date." When a man builds hopes for one whole year on a certain pleasant event taking place, feeling confident and sure of himself, and then, without warning, have his hopes shattered, he feels like leaving behind all the good there is in him. We (page 25) claim this company's method of handling this bonus check is making more dishonest employees, causing more dissatisfaction, on top of the many other complaints we have, and adding to the intense feeling burning in the breasts of so many employees, and would ask its discontinuance. We don't want it. Give us a straight salary. We want to know what we are earning. We don't want anything pertaining to money we rightfully earn and deserve left to the warped judgment of a few officials who never leave their office and depend on reports from those hired character assassins—the service inspector and spotter, whose popular pastime during the last two or three months of the year is to manufacture something against an employee's record and save for his company the amount equal to one month's salary.

To explain the meaning of the phrase, "suppressing, grinding-down tactics" of this company, will invite you to make a close study of our four, five, and six stripe men—20, 25, and 30 years of service. Converse with them, question them, watch them closely—you will get no information because they are suspicious of every stranger. That suspicious glance to the right or left—that look of half fear, of abject humility; that lack of spirit, a senile, empty expression of countenance, and before you are through he has excused himself and gone. His many years' service with the company have taught him to be very (page 26) careful and not impart to the public any information of a private nature, any complaint as to conditions he is working under, because the listener might be a paid spy of the Pullman Co. He knows it means instant dismissal for an employee to express his honest sentiments, to complain of unbearable conditions. In this type of human being you have the company's ideal employee. They have made more mollicoddles by robbing them of their spirit and independence and manhood, by their systematic spy system, by the green-carpet interviews where he is backed up against the wall and bulldozed, threatened, reduced to extra list, or put on station duty at half pay until he reaches the stage where he is so broken in spirit that no "third degree" would have any terrors for him. Is this "ideal employee," this relic, this remnant of a man, going to complain, say a word other than that which he knows the company would want him to say, or make the slightest effort to rise above this state of slavery where he is only able to exist? Hardly. At the age of 50, 60, or 70 he knows nothing but blind obedience to every unreasonable demand, to jump in fear at the command of some subordinate—nothing but blind obedience to his czar. He is now thoroughly tamed. He hangs on long after his vigor, mental activity, and usefulness are gone. He is kept in the service in preference to a young, bright man (page 27) with pleasant countenance and smile because it is not always easy to break and mold some dispositions as the Pullman Co. has learned, so the taming and breaking-in process is postponed as long as possible. We do not wish to convey the impression that this class of employees is satisfied with the present conditions, but do claim that their 20, 25, and 30 years' training has reduced them to fear and trembling in the presence of an official, and realizing they are unfit for other labor, they, like the dumb animal which has been beaten into submission, have simply lain down and given up. Too many instances are on record in the past of these same fear-breeding, spirit-robbing tactics by unscrupulous organizations, those methods and acts of his employers that keeps a continual fear in his breast, of something, he knows not what, going to happen. Strong, indeed, is the human who is able to emerge from a lifetime of such service and retain his self-respect or manhood.

We firmly believe we do not exaggerate in the slightest when we say that 98 per cent of employers, from the smallest to the greatest corporation, have greatly improved the conditions of their employees within the last 20 years. The Pullman Co. has made no progress in this respect.

(Page 28) The authors of this note have seen many years' service with this company and will give them credit for making a number of changes, apparently to benefit the employees, but without any additional cost to themselves.

In closing this epistle we ask that you overlook the harsh, sarcastic statements. Our constant effort is to be amiable, cheerful, and with a welcome for every one, because we realize fully people do not have to ride in sleeping cars, but sometimes it gives us the feeling that something is going to crack when we smile and at the same time feel ready to burst. I am almost compelled to say the most hypocritical smile in evidence to-day is worn by the Pullman conductor.

We ask for relief from our present conditions. We make this appeal with feelings of respect for law and order, at the same time as intense and earnest as ever tore the breast of the most radical. A chance to explain, which is ever denied us—arbitration, adjustment, anything that will put us on an equal footing with men who are not our superiors in any respect.

We ask of you—investigate!

On thought has been uppermost in writing this note—to avoid exaggeration. Investigation will verify every statement herein made and will undoubtedly bring to light many more that (page 29) will cause reformers to sit up and take notice. It will reveal the strangle hold this company has on every one from its lowest employee to the highest Government official.

The writers of this note do not care to jeopardize their present positions by adding any signatures, and we believe you will agree with us after reading the foregoing.

PULLMAN CONDUCTORS.

REPLY OF MR. HUNGERFORD TO COMPLAINTS OF PULLMAN CONDUCTORS.

To the honorable United States Commission on Industrial Relations:

On April 7, 1915, your chairman announced that a communication had been made to the commission by certain conductors, of which a copy would be furnished the Pullman Co., so that it might check up the items and furnish a witness competent to testify regarding such, if any, of them as might be disputed. On April 8 the copy was furnished by your secretary.

It is largely composed of statements in the nature of argument, or of contentions, rather than of statements of fact for a witness. Most of its statements of fact have been covered by my testimony heretofore given. Of those which I may not have covered fully in my testimony already in, I desire to speak.

Referring to the pages of the copy furnished:

Page 1. Attention is called to my testimony that two free uniforms per year are furnished, instead of one as stated in the communication. Two free caps are also furnished.

Page 2. Statement that conductor is required to take up railroad tickets in 95 per cent of the runs and is held responsible, etc., is not true. Facts are as follows: On approximately 10 per cent of the railroads operating Pullman cars, Pullman employees handle railroad tickets, although in a majority of those cases they are handled only at night and train conductor or train auditor handles them during the day. On approximately 90 per cent of the railroads the train conductors or train auditors handle the tickets, with the exception that on cars leaving late at night Pullman employees lift transportation from passengers, but it is turned over to train conductor when he takes charge of the train. It is usual on most railroads where passengers board the train en route at a late hour, for Pullman employees to lift their railroad tickets when checking them to berths, which, however, are turned over to train conductor shortly after, this being done in order not to delay passengers who may desire to retire immediately. Pullman employees are not responsible for railroad tickets handled by them for the railroad company, nor is the Pullman Co. In answer to a question of Commissioner Garretson, Witness Bell said, in substance, that Pullman conductors were penalized or given suspensions for mistakes in handling railroad tickets. This is not true.

As to seeing that railroad tickets are properly routed, the fact is that people selling Pullman tickets are required to see that these Pullman tickets correspond with the railroad tickets, and conductor selling Pullman space en route is expected to see that it corresponds with railroad ticket. See page 30, printed book of instructions, heretofore handed commission.

At end of page 2 and top of page 3, about Pullman conductors assisting train conductors: Not true so far as any requirement of the Pullman Co. is concerned.

Page 3. Statement as to testimony in California that conductors were classed as "common laborers" is untrue. It is understood that the commission has a copy of this testimony, to which reference is respectfully made.

Page 4. Uniform, expenses on road, etc., I think fully covered by my previous testimony.

Page 7. About porters being urged to greater activity to procure more and larger tips. Not true. There is not so much as an intimation about tips.

Page 8. About porters being compelled to pay for losses. They are not required to pay for lost equipment. Linen losses have been fully explained in my testimony. Treatment of passenger losses or articles left in cars, I have already testified about.

Page 10. Further statement with respect to an employee smarting under a recent 5, 10, or 15 day penalization for some insignificant matter or made to pay for losses on his car. The employees are not penalized for insignificant matters, and when the record of an employee is assessed with a penalty it is for some infraction of the rules for which a penalty is properly imposed as a matter of necessary discipline for the good of the service and the ultimate good of the employee himself, who, by this method, does not get what might in some cases be the extreme penalty of a discharge, but instead retains his employment whenever it is thought that justice to the traveling public warrants giving him a further chance. Employees are not called upon to pay or to make good the losses sustained or claimed to have been sustained by passengers. It is stated that strong denials of employees are of no avail. Any employee of this company can get a hearing upon any complaint made against him, or anything for which he is penalized, and often their denials do avail to relieve them.

Page 11. A statement which I believe does the conductors a great injustice. It states that 98 per cent of the conductors could plead guilty if accused of favoring a passenger who gives them a gratuity over another passenger who has spoken for a lower berth ahead of the one giving the gratuity. Our investigations lead to the belief that such things are not at all common in our service, but we have had some complaints of this nature made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which have received thorough investigation, and in most instances it has been found that the lower berths given to passengers, after a statement has been made that there were no lower berths, grow out of uncalled-for reservations either at the terminal or at intermediate stations. In the whole service of the company within my recollection there has never been but one man discharged for this cause, and that after repeated offenses and strong complaints by passengers. Other complaints have been investigated and found untrue, and the conductors exonerated.

Page 13. The statement that conductors put in time and service for which they are not paid is not true. A man going on duty at 9 p. m. to receive passengers for a run starting after midnight is not paid on the basis of his time slip showing departure at 2 or 3 or 4 o'clock the following morning. The time slip conforms to the car movement, but the man receives a full day's pay for his night's work.

Page 14. In the instance spoken of, where a man made a round trip, getting him back to his home district in 5 hours for which he received nothing; under the rules the man would be entitled to pay for that service, and if not paid in the instance recited it was a mistake which should have been corrected.

Pages 14 and 15. The supposed case of a conductor leaving St. Paul for Chicago, and then soon after arrival at Chicago, being sent out to St. Louis is probably an imaginary case which could hardly happen. The St. Louis district men performing service between St. Paul and Chicago would probably be sent to St. Louis on the night of the day on which he arrived in Chicago, reaching St. Louis the following morning, receiving two days' pay for the trip from St. Paul to St. Louis instead of one, as stated on page 15. I don't believe such a thing ever happened, and if it did, I should be glad to know it, and the date, so that if it was wrong it could be corrected.

Page 16. With respect to conductors using blankets for warmth at night when sitting up on watch; they should not be penalized or reprimanded for this, and I don't think they are.

Pages 18, 19, and 21. The Pullman Co. purchasing newspaper service. There is no truth whatever in this statement. The newspapers have frequently and freely had articles with respect to the Pullman Co. that they certainly would not have had if influenced by that company, and during my entire connection with the company I have never known of a man being employed to procure favorable notices from newspapers or suppression of unfavorable things, nor anything in the nature of a press agent or press bureau. An examination of the newspapers during the nearly 30 years of my connection with the company will demonstrate that they have been free from influence of the Pullman Co.

Pages 19 and 20. Smallpox incident. There was such a case. It was handled by the health officers of the city of Chicago with Dr. Crowder, our superintendent of sanitation, cooperating under their direction and in accordance with the most modern methods. The patient quickly recovered. No other person contracted the disease, and until this communication no complaint from anyone was ever known. Statement of Dr. Crowder submitted.

That there was no article with display headlines about this in the newspapers is not unusual, and I think it is not at all usual for such things to be prominent in the newspapers locally in any town or city.

Page 22. With respect to the difference between the reports of the conductors—one handling one car, and another a number of cars, and the bearing that the errors made has upon the bonus check: Each case with respect to such errors is taken up upon its merits, and if by reason of heavy work the error is a natural one, it is not usual to penalize the conductor. He might, at most, be cautioned to exercise greater care.

It was understood from the chairman that the communication was signed by a number of persons who, upon checking their names, were ascertained to be in the service of the Pullman Co. The language of the last sentence of the communication, according to the copy furnished, recites that it is not signed at all. I would like to suggest to the commission that if any names were furnished the commission of persons purporting to present this communication, from which any check could be made with respect to whether they were or were not in the service, the commission may have been misled in that matter, and that the communication was not in fact presented by persons in the service of the company. It is not believed by me that many, if any, of the conductors in service would in fact agree with the statements of the communication. This is plainly indicated to my satisfaction by the fact that since the reports of statements made here before the commission by former employees have been published in the newspapers our conductors are coming voluntarily to our district superintendents and saying that they do not agree with the statements of the former employees and repudiating and protesting against such statements.

Respectfully submitted.

MEMORANDUM TO MR. HUNGERFORD.

Subject: Illness of Conductor H. J. Fallon.

Conductor H. J. Fallon arrived in Chicago on the Burlington train No. 6, February 6, 1914. He was feeling unwell, and went immediately to the conductors' house at No. 3138 Lake Park Avenue. He was still feeling unwell the next day, and sent his reports to the district office without going in person. That day he called on Dr. Arthur W. K. Downes, at Thirty-first Street and Cottage Grove Avenue who continued to take care of him up to February 11 without recognizing the nature of his disease. Dr. Downes was communicated with over the telephone by Mr. Giltzow on February 10 and said that Conductor Fallon was afflicted with a bad case of la grippe. On the morning of February 11 Conductor Fallon's skin showed a rash, and this was recognized by Dr. Downes as smallpox. He immediately notified our district office and the city board of health, and arranged to have the board of health take charge of the case. I was notified of the situation by Mr. Patterson, and immediately went to the house, where I met a representative of the health department. While I was there Conductor Fallon was removed in an ambulance, sent by the health department, to the isolation hospital.

After the nature of the case was recognized no one was allowed to leave the house until the health department representative and myself had seen them. Everyone who was there on the morning of February 11 was vaccinated, regardless of how recently this had been previously done, and was then allowed to go on about his duties with the instruction that he should immediately report any illness, however trifling, that might occur within the next two weeks. I believe it was entirely proper, in view of the precaution of immediate revaccination, that these men should take up their runs and continue in service, rather than that they should be held in quarantine until after the period of incubation of smallpox had passed. This procedure is in line with the general practice of most public-health authorities, only those persons being held in quarantine who refuse vaccination.

From the house register was taken a list of the names of those conductors who had been there while Conductor Fallon was ill, namely, between the evening of February 6 and the morning of February 11. Such of these men as were not still in the house were located at the earliest possible moment and were called to my office for vaccination, or in case they had gone out of reach of my office, they were asked to report to our local physicians for revaccination, and these precautions were fully complied with.

The porters and conductors who had taken charge of the cars in the train on which Conductor Fallon arrived in Chicago on February 6 were also located and were immediately called in for revaccination. Similar action was taken with the porters who arrived in Chicago with Conductor Fallon on February 6.

The house at 3138 Lake Park Avenue was vacated and given into the charge of the Chicago Health Department, under whose direction fumigation was carried out, and, after a proper interval, the house reoccupied.

The health department was also notified of the cars on which Conductor Fallon had last operated, and sent a representative to the Burlington yards, where these cars were then located; under his direction these cars were fumigated and released.

I believe that every possible precaution was taken in the handling of this case. Inasmuch as the health department of the city of Chicago was fully informed and was in immediate control so soon as the diagnosis was made, it appears that there could have been no attempt at concealment of the facts or deception as to the conditions. No subsequent cases of smallpox developed as the result of exposure of other persons to Conductor Fallon, or to the house and cars which he occupied, and no cases of smallpox have since been in the house at 3138 Lake Park Avenue.

T. R. CROWDER,
Superintendent of Sanitation.

FEDERATION OF PULLMAN CONDUCTORS OF AMERICA,

CHICAGO, April 17, 1915.

UNITED STATES INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION,

Transportation Building, Chicago.

GENTLEMEN: Complying with your command to furnish comparative information in regard to time put in on duty by train and Pullman conductors, I take from the Illinois Central conductors the following:

Day train to St. Louis, 8 hours per day, 20 trips per month, 160 hours.

Night train to St. Louis, 10 hours per night, 20 trips per month, 200 hours.

Through trains on the main line to Centralia, 6 hours per day, 24 times per month, 144 hours.

On the local trains the conductor works on I. C., 173.10 hours.

The above statement compares favorably with time put in on most roads by train conductors for the hours worked per month. The St. Louis runs given above are the same as the Alton, Wabash, and the C. & E. I. R. Rs.

FOR THE PULLMAN CONDUCTOR.

On the Illinois Central to St. Louis must report at 9 p. m. for the night trains; usually goes to work at 10 or 10.30 p. m. and gets in St. Louis about 8 in the morning, making approximately 10 hours actual train work at 26 nights per month, 260 hours, with 1 hour added for each night in St. Louis.

This applies to Wabash, Alton, C. & E. I. as well.

On the same road to New Orleans, round trip, 51 hours 20 minutes, 7½ trips per month; 351½ hours, less 8 hours sleep, 319½ hours.

On No. 3 and No. 2 on the Burlington to Denver, 66 hours for the trip, less 16 hours sleep; 50 hours, 7½ times per month, 375 hours.

On the long or coast runs the conductor and porter are on a 60-hour trip, 120 ~~no~~ for the round trip, with from 8 to 12 hours off for sleep, according to run, making approximately 110 actual duty, 3 times per month, 330 hours.

These extensions are very nearly exactly correct; as near as they could be without figuring out every little exception, and will apply to the short, medium long, and the long runs all over the country.

MEALS PURCHASED AWAY FROM HOME.

On a short run meals away from home would average about 3 per trip, making 3 times 13, or 39, at an average of 40 cents, $15.60.

A medium long run, 8 meals, 7½ times, 60 meals, at 40 cents, $24.

A long run, 20 meals, 3 times per month, 60 meals, at 40 cents, $24.

I have put the price at 40 cents per, which is as low as a person can get by with and less than almost all of them do get by for. My personal expenses on a medium long run were usually about $30, and on a short one about $22. This was including meals, car fare, and all things covering necessary expenses.

Thanking you for consideration shown me, and trusting I have made myself clear in the above statement, I am,

Yours, very respectfully,

R. W. BELL,
12051 Parnell Avenue.

EXTRACT FROM TESTIMONY OF L. S. HUNGERFORD BEFORE THE UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS ON APRIL 5, 1915.

This extract is not from the official report, which is not available to me, but is taken from the report of Samuel M. Morgan, court reporter, in Chicago, who was employed by the Pullman Co. at the hearing. The extract is at page 99 of the Morgan report.

"A. The linen situation is one that has been pretty embarrassing all around. The linen is turned over to the porter, and it is part of his duty to handle that linen. I feel that if he will exercise the proper care and count his linen he will have no trouble. The fact of the matter is that they don't count their linen. Our shortage last year—what we call car shortage; porters' shortage line account—amounted to $178,000. That is in addition to our condemnation and shortage by theft, which would run it up to $300,000. Out of that $178,000 there was about 17 per cent collected from the porters, more in the line of discipline for failure on their part to comply with instructions to count the linen and exercise due care. We have had that matter under consideration for some time and the company is now doing away with these porters' collections."

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

CHICAGO, ILL., April 7, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners Lennon, Aishton, O'Connell, Ballard, and Garretson.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Markham.

TESTIMONY OF MR. CHARLES H. MARKHAM.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Mr. MARKHAM. Charles H. Markham.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. MARKHAM. Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. MARKHAM. I am president of the Illinois Central Railroad and the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you occupied that position?

Mr. MARKHAM. A little over four years.

Chairman WALSH. What was your position with the company at the time the trouble arose with the shop employees in 1911?

Mr. MARKHAM. I was president, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What other railroad positions have you occupied, please, Mr. Markham, going back from this time?

Mr. MARKHAM. Going back from the present?

Chairman WALSH. Going back; yes.

Mr. MARKHAM. For the immediate 6 years preceding my employment by the Illinois Central I was in the oil business; for some 23 years preceding that time I was in the employ of the Southern Pacific Co. in various capacities, as station service, as general officer; and when I left the service I was vice president and general manager of the Southern Pacific.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. West has notified us that you desire to make a statement before any questions are propounded to you, which you have prepared. If you do, you may proceed now.

Mr. MARKHAM. Thank you. The subject is a very important one to us, Mr. Chairman. And I should like to go into it in some detail. Shall I proceed, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed, Mr. Markham.

Mr. MARKHAM. Before beginning the account of the causes of these difficulties, I wish to make the following statement [reads]:

"My name is Charles H. Markham. I am president of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. and of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Co., and have served continuously as president of these companies since January, 1911. Practically all of my adult life I have been engaged in railroad work, except about six years spent in the oil business, and have been connected with railroads in the West in various capacities as an officer of the traffic and operating departments. I think, therefore, that I am fairly familiar with the history of the relations between railroads in western territory and their employees, extending over a quarter of a century.

"Before beginning an account of the causes that brought about the strike of 1911 on the Illinois Central, and my account of its incidents, I wish to say, with all possible emphasis, that I am sure there has never been a strike in the United States which had as little foundation and for which there was so little an excuse. It was as ill advised and as inopportune as it was unexpected. It grew out of no real or substantial grievance. On the part of the men it was advertised as a strike for a principle, but in fact no principle which was vital to the existence and growth of organized labor was involved. It disturbed the relations between a great railroad company and nearly 9,000 of its employees. It, for a time, disorganized the commerce of that part of the country dependent upon the Illinois Central system for service. It involved this company in an extraordinary and unnecessary expense. It disturbed the peace of communities in certain parts of the country. It gave anxiety to the officers of the railroad, the officers of the unions, and the officers of the law. It was a striking example of hasty, ill-advised action not on the part of the rank and file of the men, but on the part of certain ambitious would-be leaders, moved partly, no doubt, by selfish ambition and partly by a mistaken idea of the welfare of their fellow employees.

"That many of the men and their families suffered privations and hardships as a result of this strike, I have no doubt. If, as has been intimated, the burden of the unfortunate affair fell upon innocent women and helpless children, no one can deplore this fact more than myself. And yet, I feel, as a trustee of an important property upon whose continued prosperity depend the incomes of widows and orphans, that we were without power to prevent the suicidal course which the men in this case chose to adopt, except by surrendering our functions as managers and directors of the property to the ultimate destruction of its power both to earn money for the stockholders and to serve the public as a common carrier.

"The Illinois Central Railroad Co. since its beginning has never assumed an attitude of antagonism to union labor. It has, for practically all of its history, maintained the most friendly relations with its employees. I am sure no corporation has a more consistent record in this respect than the Illinois Central. Its recognition of the right of its employees to organize has always been full and complete. For many years it has pursued the policy of making contracts with such unions of which its employees are members as customarily have contracts with railroads. These contracts have related to wages, the conditions of labor, and other matters which are usually included in contracts of this nature. Throughout this narrative I use the word 'contract' because such is the popular designation of the written statement of the wages and conditions of labor which are usually settled between a railroad company and its employees. I do not mean to be understood as implying that these statements have all the legal incidents of a contract. It is therefore to be understood that, when I use the word 'contract' in this statement, it is to be taken as subject to the limitations just indicated. I make that reservation because of conditions arising with respect to continuous employment.

"The Illinois Central has always met its employees more than half way in entering into this class of contracts and, as a result, the feeling between the management of the railroad and the employees has been of the most cordial nature. As an evidence of this fact, it is sufficient to mention that, while its rates are upon a comparatively low basis, due to the fact that it has considerable mileage in the Central Freight Association territory and to the further fact that it must meet the competition of the Mississippi River, yet wages and working conditions on this line are based upon those in effect in the western group of railroads. In other words, its rate basis is that of the East and its wage basis is that of the West. It therefore, while carrying a low scale of rates, pays wages upon a higher basis.

"Among other contracts in effect upon the Illinois Central prior to the autumn of 1911 were contracts with the various unions of shopmen employed by this company. With these crafts, seven in number, this company had contracts governing wages, hours of employment, and working conditions. These contracts were made between the company and the employees as a result of conferences freely entered into and amicably conducted. They were revised from time to time as a result of such conferences, and so successfully had this method operated that, prior to the strike now under investigation, there had never been any strike on the Illinois Central based upon the refusal of the company to meet the committees of the employees and to conform to their wishes wherever the interests of the company would permit. This was the condition of affairs on the line of the Illinois Central up to June, 1911.

"About the middle of June, 1911, a communication was received by the Illinois Central, dated June 10, 1911, reading as follows:

"FEDERATION OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES,

"I. C. SYSTEM AND ALLIED LINES,

"Paducah, Ky., June 10, 1911.

"Mr. T. J. FOLEY,

"Asst. Gen. Mgr. Illinois Central Railroad, Chicago, Ill.

"DEAR SIR: The following organizations, International Ass'n of Machinists, I. A. of Steam Fitters, B. It. O. of A., I. A. of S. M. Works, B. R. Clerks, B. of

B. S. & H., Painters & Decorators, B. of B. M. & I. S. B. of A., and Federal Labor Union, representing employees of the Illinois Central Railroad and allied lines, have formed a federation of railway employees of the I. C. Railroad and allied lines and have, through the executive board representing all of the above organizations, formulated rules and special agreements covering working conditions and wage scale, and we desire to inform you that these rules and agreements are now in the hands of the printers and will be ready within a week and will be submitted to you. It is the desire of the executive board representing the federation that an audience be granted them at the earliest possible opportunity for the purpose of discussing and adopting these agreements and to notify the undersigned of date set for conference, allowing time to arrange for transportation to reach Chicago on date assigned by you.

"Yours, truly,

"J. F. McCREERY, President.

"W. E. BOWEN, Secretary.

"Mr. McCreery, whose name was signed to this communication, was a car repairer, and the Mr. Bowen, who signed his name, as secretary, was a railway clerk. As will be seen, it was stated that these persons represented the following unions: Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, Brotherhood of Railway Car Men, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths, Boilermakers and Iron Shipbuilders' International Union, International Association of Machinists, Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' Alliance, International Association of Steamfitters, Painters, Decorators, and Paper Hangers' International Union, and several Federal labor unions, composed of helpers and laborers.

"When this communication was received, purporting to come from the officials of the so-called System Federation, an organization which had never been dealt with by the Illinois Central and which had only lately come into existence, it was found that with seven of the nine organizations named the Illinois Central had valid and existing contracts covering wages, hours of service, and conditions of labor, all of which contained a requirement that when any change was necessary or desired by either party, 30 days' written notice should be given of the desire of either party to make a change before any consideration should be given to the desired changes. In the absence of this 30 days' notice, the contract should continue indefinitely. Two of the unions mentioned in this communication, to wit, the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks and the Federal Labor Unions, had no such contracts. Since the communication purported to speak for the seven organizations with which the company had existing contracts, the management, naturally, declined to meet this committee, since there had been no objections to any of the contracts made by the crafts themselves and no notice had been given of any desire to negotiate for a change in the contracts, all of which were then in existence. The officers of the System Federation were therefore advised that since these contracts with the several labor unions were unchanged and since no notice had been given of a desire to have them changed, the company did not feel that it could recognize the right of the System Federation to speak for these unions or to negotiate in their behalf. Upon receipt of this reply the officers of the System Federation took a strike vote. Ordinarily a preliminary strike vote means no more than that the officers of the union are thereby provided with a force whereby the officials of the company can be compelled to accede to the desires of the men. The vote was not taken, however, in conformity with the laws of the unions, particularly in that the rules of the various unions provided that the vote should be by secret ballot, and this requirement was not complied with. The employees, however, were officially recorded as having voted for a strike, although, as stated, the result was reached by irregular methods. On August 9, 1911, certain representatives of the individual unions addressed to the general manager of the Illinois Central a communication asking that they be granted an audience for the purpose of talking over the matter of granting a conference to the System Federation committee.

"It will be noted that this was not a request for a conference between the management and the officers of the several unions for the purpose of considering new contracts or changes in existing contracts or for the purpose of discussing any of the conditions of labor prevailing among the several crafts, but the conference was requested for the purpose of seeking to induce the management to meet the committee of the System Federation. On the same day formal demand was made upon the company by the same officers of the unions to the effect that the management should meet the committee of the System Federation for the purpose of discussing matters conceived to be of interest to the officers of the Federation. In neither of these communications was there any notice given to the company that existing contracts were unsatisfactory or that there was any desire on the part of the unions to have these contracts devised. The subject matter of both communications was a recognition of the right of the officers of the System Federation to be received and their right to discuss questions of interest to the employees. In other words, it was apparently the view of these officers that existing contracts should remain in effect in all respects unimpaired, but that without abrogating these contracts another and inconsistent arrangement of some sort should be entered into with the officers of the so-called System Federation. Some other and further negotiations were had, and as a result thereof the assistant general manager of this company, on August 29, notified Mr. Kramer, representing the blacksmiths, that the management would meet the accredited representatives of all organizations with which there were existing contracts to discuss matters connected therewith on August 30. Such a conference was had on August 30, at which there were present seven of the representatives of organized labor, representing the employees, and the vice president and general manager, the assistant general manager, and the general superintendent of motive power, representing the company. On August 31 I received in conference a committee of three officers of the union.

"At both these conferences it was stated by the management that the existing contracts had not been canceled, and that we did not feel free to discuss new agreements while such contracts were in existence; that we had received no notice from the various unions that they desired these contracts abrogated; that we had always lived up to our contracts; that nothing had come to our attention indicating that the contracts were unsatisfactory to the men or that they desired any change in the scale of wages, the hours of service, or other conditions of employment. We steadfastly declined to confer with the officers of the new System Federation while the contracts with the various crafts were still in effect. On September 1, after these conferences had been concluded, we received another communication from the officers of the crafts requesting us to meet the System Federation. In reply to this communication I wrote the following letter, which speaks for itself:

" SEPTEMBER 4, 1911.

"Mr. W. F. KRAMER,

"585 Monon Building, Chicago, Ill.

"DEAR SIR: This is to acknowledge receipt of communication signed by yourself and others and reading as follows:

"Owing to our inability to secure a satisfactory adjustment of the grievances existing between the various organizations we represent and the Illinois Central Railway Co., through you as president of said company, at the conference held yesterday afternoon between yourself and a subcommittee selected from this body, as per your request or suggestion, we again request that you or your accredited representatives grant an audience to the committee of your employees as represented by the System Federation, with a view to negotiating an agreement.

"Should you still persist in not granting this request by 10.30 Tuesday morning, September 5, 1911, we will take such action as we deem necessary for the protection of our organizations. Please address all communications to Mr. W. F. Kramer, 585 Monon Building, Chicago.

"Hoping to be favored with a prompt reply, we remain,

"Yours, very truly,

"A. Hinzeman, Boilermakers and Helpers; P. J. Conlon, Machinists; Wm. F. Kramer, Blacksmiths and Helpers; Thos. Redding, Sheet Metal Workers; John Fitzpatrick, Federal Labor Union; John J. Carrigan, Brotherhood of Railway Clerks; Wm. E. Rodriguez, Painters; J. H. Kinsella, Steamfitters; Frank Paquin, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen."

"As has been repeatedly stated to yourself and associates, present at meetings with Mr. Park and myself, there are in existence certain contracts between the Illinois Central Railroad and seven of the organizations represented in the foregoing communication. Never before in the history of our dealings with labor organizations have we been asked to change contracts, except in the usual manner provided therein, viz, that the 30 days' formal notice, which has always been regarded as an essential feature of same, be given. The required 30 days' notice not having been given in the manner provided in each of the different contracts, we regard them as still in effect and must again decline to enter into negotiations with other agencies for the purpose of making any changes therein.

"That there may be no possibility of a misunderstanding on the part of our employees, I also wish to say that, as a result of past experience with similar organizations, and after careful consideration of all questions involved, the management of the Illinois Central Railroad has reached the conclusion that its duty to the shipping and traveling public, dependent upon it for transportation facilities, its regard for the welfare of its employees and those dependent upon them, and also for the interests of its 10,000 stockholders, will not permit it to enter into negotiations with an organization in compliance with the initial demands of which would deprive the officers of the company of the power to manage its affairs.

"The paramount interest in this controversy is that of the shipping and traveling public, and, being convinced that it is the ultimate purpose of the federation to consolidate railroad service employees into one organization, the management does not feel that public opinion would sustain it in entering into an agreement which would place in the hands of one body the power to throttle the commerce of the country. Neither does it believe that the same public opinion will sustain any action which will result in a disruption of the harmonious relations that have heretofore existed between the Illinois Central Railroad and its employees.

"You will, of course, take whatever action you may consider necessary for the protection of your respective organizations, but, if you will permit me to say it, it is my opinion that you can take no action that will afford any better protection than to advise them to live up to their contracts with this company, just as it has always lived up to its contracts with them. If any other course is pursued and trouble results the responsibility is yours, not ours."

"It should be stated that, after the strike vote had been taken, certain of the international officers of the unions, notably President O'Connell, of the machinists; Vice President Conlon, of the same organization; and Vice President Hinzeman, of the boilermakers, refused to sanction a walkout until further efforts had been made to have all differences amicably adjusted. The international officials also investigated the methods pursued by the officials of the System Federation in taking the strike vote. The International Executive Board of the Machinists emphatically refused to sanction a strike, giving as its principal reason for this action that the contracts provided for 30 days' notice, and no such notice had been given. After considerable investigation, and the holding of numerous conferences, the international officials, to whom the matter had been referred by the System Federation, announced that the strike vote would not be recognized, but that, owing to various irregularities, another strike vote must be taken, which should be conducted in accordance with the laws of the respective unions. It was particularly insisted by the international officers that a secret ballot should be taken, as the laws of the order required. A letter was sent out to the various unions, signed by the officials of the nine unions involved in the federation, instructing that a vote be taken, to be returned not later than October 10. Since the machinists had definitely declined to sanction a strike, the letter just referred to contained this statement and the following questions on which the employees were required to vote:

"It has recently developed that several of our large organizations are not in position to pay strike benefits, and, while their international unions have sanctioned a strike, it is with their moral support only."

"Also, 'That the question has been raised by the company and by President O'Connell, international president of the machinists, as to the legality of the notice that was served on the company June 10 by the officers of the System Federation, and, not knowing at this time whether we would get the support of the machinists, we request each organization to immediately call a special meeting and proceed to take another vote according to your respective constitutions.'

"In taking the strike vote the members must have in mind the following points and vote upon each one separately:

"1. Will you vote to enforce recognition of the System Federation?"

"2. Will you strike if the Machinists' International refuses to sanction a strike?"

"3. Will you strike regardless of financial assistance?"

"4. Should the demand of the company that the 30 days' notice be served be complied with?"

"This letter calling for a vote was sent out on September 12. It would appear, however, that the machinists met in convention on September 18, and while it would appear that such action was vigorously opposed by the president and many other leaders of the machinists, the convention, by close vote, sanctioned a strike on the Harriman lines, so called, the Illinois Central and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The leaders protested against this action on the ground that they believed that the time was not ripe for a general strike; that there was no money in the treasury with which to pay strike benefits; and that defeat was almost certainly inevitable. Some of the leaders charged that the socialistic element was behind this movement, with the ulterior purpose of disrupting trade-unionism and of bringing its principles into disrepute. Apparently this action of the machinists' convention precipitated the strike, although there had been no legal vote taken on the proposition nor had the various unions replied in the proper way to the four questions submitted in the letter of September 12.

"It will thus be seen that considerable mystery surrounds the exact cause of the walkout. The officials of the railroad are at a loss to understand why the strike occurred when it did. The employees were preparing to vote as they had been instructed to do by the international officers. These employees had under consideration the situation in all of its phases and were giving due consideration to all the facts when the strike was ordered. There was no complaint in regard to wages or other conditions of employment. The only question at issue was as to whether the company would recognize the so-called System Federation, and that, too, at a time when the contracts with the several unions were still in force. No warning was given to the officials of the company of the purpose of the men to abandon their work. They had every reason to believe that the employees would abide the result of the vote which was not to be returned until October 10. They had no reason to anticipate that the machinists' convention had the authority to order a strike or would do so even if such authority was lodged in that body. Many, if not most, of the employees evidently were astounded when orders were issued requiring them to abandon work. It is not believed by the management that the rank and file of its shopmen were in favor of breaking existing contracts, and that, too, without warning or notice of any kind.

"It should be always remembered that the management of the Illinois Central stood on the 30 days' clause of the contracts with seven of these unions. This was not a mere technicality. The 30 days' clause had a substantial basis and represented a most valuable feature of the contract. It had been agreed to both by the unions and by the railroad, and unquestionably for the same reason, in order that each might be protected against hasty action taken in emergency by either party. If the notice had been given, as the contract required, opportunity would have been given to the management to explain to the representatives of the several unions its objection to this form of organization. It would have been explained to these officers that similar movements in the past had proved disastrous and reasons would have been adduced therefor. It would have been shown that the effect upon labor was demoralizing as well as upon the railroad and the general public. The management had reason to believe, and still believes, that the great body of the men did not understand what this System Federation really meant and had had no opportunity fully to realize just what such a federation would lead to. It would have been the privilege and the pleasure of the officers of the company, if the proper period of negotiations had been permitted, to explain to the employees just what this System Federation meant to them, so that the action of the union officials could have been taken calmly, deliberately, and intentionally and in the full light of a presentation of the railroad's side of the matter. It may be said, however, that this explanation could have been made to the officers of the System Federation and that no good reason existed for not meeting these officers and conferring with them; but the answer is that the railroad company would have been forced into a most inconsistent position if it had met these System Federation officers in conference. Such an action on the part of the railroad company would have been itself a recognition of the right of the men to form this federation and to demand that the railroad company should treat with it.

"It was the desire of the management to explain to the men its objections to any system federation. Would it be thought possible that arguments of this kind would have prevailed with the officers of the federation itself, the tenure of whose office depended upon the continued existence of the federation? If the company had consented to meet these officers, it could not be consistently argued that the federation should not be formed. It would be a recognition of the fact that it had already been formed, that it had been wisely and properly formed, and that the company had acquiesced in this method of handling the matter. Furthermore, these signed contracts had been made between the railroad and its employees, and in the absence of any notice of their abrogation both sides had a right to insist that they be respected. Our experience had taught us that the men had always insisted that both the letter and spirit of the contract should be observed. Would it not have been a gross breach of faith on the part of the company to have entered into new contracts with the System Federation in direct violation of existing contracts with the various unions? And if the new contracts had contained provisions which were at variance with those in effect with the various organizations, how could the company have justified its action in the premises?

"Before proceeding further with this statement, it may be as well to call attention to the fact that one of the unions involved in this matter included the clerks. It has never been the policy of the railroad company to recognize a labor union composed of clerks. These men sustain a more or less confidential relation to their employers. They manifestly stand in a class by themselves. By reason of the nature of their duties they are much closer to the railroad officials than are the workmen in the shops or the employees on the trains. It must be admitted by every fair-minded man that if these clerks join the unions and become associated with organized labor generally, their obligation to the union would be superior to the obligation to their employers, and that the interests of the company would thereby be seriously impaired. The opportunity which these clerks would necessarily have of knowing what goes on in the general offices of the company would lead to endless trouble and strife between the officers and the employees. Every trivial matter would be reported to the unions, and there would be no such thing as the company having any secrets whatever relating to competitive business, negotiations with labor unions, or the like, from its employees. It was therefore not considered advisable to recognize the right of the clerks to organize in this manner.

"Our judgment in declining to recognize a union of the clerks was amply vindicated by the course of events after the strike. I will a little later show that at Memphis, New Orleans, and elsewhere, the business of the company was greatly hindered by the action of the striking clerks in removing and concealing records, in removing cards from cars, and in exchanging cards on cars so that the utmost confusion resulted from their action. The mix up caused by changing the cards on the cars led to shipments going astray, to great delay in the delivery of freight, to unnecessary out-of-line hauls, and to the payment of heavy claims based on the failure to deliver goods promptly or, in some cases, to deliver perishable goods at all.

"Aside from the point, as to failure to give notice, candor forces me to say that the management of the Illinois Central is, upon principle, opposed to the System Federation idea. In this it is in accord with the best thought of leaders both of employers and employed. The leading labor officials of the United States are believed to be by no means enthusiastic in regard to the System Federation plan of making contracts. This same proposition was the basis upon which the Knights of Labor was built and the principal reason for its failure. Each trade has its own environment, its own problems, and its own method of solving them. The American Federation of Labor has for many years refused to adopt a universal trade-mark or union label for all trades to use. It is easy to see how a system federation, such as was proposed on the Illinois Central, would cause a trivial dispute in one department to result in involving all workmen in all other departments and lead to a general strike of all workmen on account of a grievance in which nine-tenths of them had no interest whatever.

"One of the best informed men in the United States upon the labor question is the Hon. Edgar E. Clark, formerly president of the Order of Railway Conductors, now a most distinguished member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In his testimony before the United States commission investigating the American Railway Union strike of 1894, Mr. Clark said:

"I believe the majority of the men engaged in any one trade or calling should have a right to fix the conditions under which the men in that trade should work. I think they should have that right uninfluenced by or without any dictation from any other organization or any other class of employees."

"Before that same commission, Mr. P. H. Morrissey, then president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, said:

"The American Railway Union came into existence with the declaration that the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen and kindred organizations were weak, ineffective, and, in a word, were playing nothing short of a confidence game on the men they assumed to represent. The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen for a long time has been representing certain classes of men in the train service, and presume to say they have done it as effectively as could be done under trades-union principles or as a labor organization.

"The American Railway Union came into the field saying we were weak and ridiculed every earnest, honest method used by our organization to achieve good for the men they represent. When we failed it was a subject for ridicule by the lecturers of the American Railway Union. That naturally produced bitterness."

"The history of labor disputes in the country tends to the same conclusion. The American Railway Union was formed upon pretty much the same principles as underlay the System Federation of shopmen. Their declaration of principles contains the statement:

"That the trades-union idea has ceased to be useful or adequate; that pride of organization, petty jealousies, and the conflict of views into which the men are trained in separate organizations under different leaders tend to defeat the common object of all and enable the railroad to use such organizations against each other in contentions over wages and working conditions; that the interests of each of the railroad employees of the United States as to wages, treatment, hours of labor, legislation, insurance, mutual aid, etc., are common to all, and hence all ought to belong to one organization that shall assert its united strength in the protection of the rights of every member."

"It is within the memory of everybody that the strike of 1894 was caused by the refusal of the members of the American Railway Union to work for any railroad using Pullman cars on its trains. This was not because there was any quarrel between the men and the railroads, but only on account of a difference of opinion between employees of the Pullman Co. and their employers. Yet, as a result of the principles of a system federation, the railroads were made the innocent sufferers, the commerce of the country was demoralized, and the peace of many communities greatly disturbed. I might refer to a comparatively recent labor disturbance in Ireland, which grew out of the same fact. In that case the railroads were made the victims of a strike because lumber was hauled for a company against which certain members of a union had a grievance.

"The Illinois Central Railroad Co. saw foreshadowed in the proposed System Federation a repetition of the American Railway Union trouble of 1894. When the first System Federation was formed four trades were involved; on the Harriman lines of the West there were five; on the Illinois Central there were nine. This System Federation, as proposed on the Illinois Central, had announced that 'all railroad organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor are eligible for membership.' The situation, therefore, upon the Illinois Central presented a very serious aspect. The System Federation idea was apparently gaining ground. New converts were every day being gained for the idea. The time was rapidly approaching when it could not be controlled. The difficulty in harmonizing the complex characters, nationalities, habits, employments, and requirements of the members had become a serious problem even to its organizers. The United States commission which investigated the American Railway Union situation, in referring to the strength of such forms of trade-unionism as had declined to become part of a large federation, said:

"The trade-unionists argue that their strength lies largely in their comparative freedom from these objections, and they insist that the basis of a successful labor organization must be substantial similarity in interests among the members."

"But if the System Federation once became established it would, as indicated in the testimony of Mr. Morrissey heretofore referred to, overshadow the international unions and deprive them of their power. If a system federation, composed of shopmen on the Illinois Central, succeeded, is it not clear that it would have extended so as to include all the employees on the Illinois Central? The next step would have been the organization of a national system federation, composed of all railroad employees in the United States, and this would have meant the realization of the dream of the old American Railway Union leaders. Although it would have had a membership of only one-sixth of the American Federation of Labor, it would have had many thousand times its power. The American Federation of Labor is a moral influence that seeks to aid all other organizations in its membership, but it has no power to call a strike. But the National System Federation could order strikes on one road or on every road in North America. The railroads would be at the mercy of such an organization. The policy of a railroad would be absolutely under the dictation of such a powerful body. There is no reason why this federation should not be extended further so as to include employees of manufacturing enterprises. If this should be accomplished both the railroad and its patrons would be in the hands of the same organization and the business of any industry could be absolutely destroyed by refusing to permit the railroads to haul the products of that industry. This is not an extreme or impossible view. It is the logical outcome of the plan of organization proposed. Not only would the railroads be at the mercy of this organization, but all forms of industry could be boycotted and their business destroyed if the wishes of the leaders were not met in all respects. In other words, wherever there should arise a difference of opinion between a single industry or a single line of railroad and one class of its employees, the whole machinery of the national federation could be directed toward redressing the real or supposed grievance, to the detriment of the trade and commerce of the country. No such supreme and unlimited power should be vested in any man or set of men under a democratic form of government. The executive committee of such a national federation would be more supreme than the most autocratic ruler in the world. The disastrous consequence of such an arrangement must be evident to every thoughtful and patriotic mind. The Illinois Central Railroad Co. felt that it owed a duty to its stockholders, to its patrons, and to the country to resist in every legitimate and proper way the beginning of such a monstrous system. It believed at the time that if it could have 30 days of calm and dispassionate counsel with the men its officers could demonstrate the folly of the proposed action of the unions in organizing this System Federation. It did not seek a strike; it deplored such a result. Moreover, its action in declining to recognize this federation has been indorsed by the press of the country, by many of the chief executives of the States through which it operates, by boards of trade and other commercial organizations in the principal cities which it serves, and by the vast majority of enlightened and public-spirited citizens everywhere.

"One important aspect of this controversy should be emphasized. There is a marked distinction between the mechanical employees of a railroad company and the men who operate the trains. A labor union composed of engineers, conductors, and trainmen is limited in its membership to railroad employees. The work of these men does not extend into the so-called industrial trades or occupations. The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Order of Railway Conductors, and the Order of Railway Trainmen have no ramifications whatever outside of the railroad service. But it should be remembered that the unions composed of machinists, boiler makers, steam fitters, and so forth, include men who work for all kinds of manufacturing enterprises as well as for the railroads. The same union will include shopmen laboring for the Illinois Central and for the Baldwin Locomotive Works, for instance, manufacturing the engines for use on the railroads. The union composed of carmen on the railroad will also include the carmen of the Pullman Co. or any other enterprise manufacturing cars. It will thus be seen that these workmen have a most peculiar relation to the railroad, the industries from which it makes the purchases, and the industries which furnish the tonnage by which the railroad is maintained.

"Assuming, therefore, that these shopmen are permitted to federate and to act as a unit in every controversy, there are necessarily affected not only the railroad but a vast number of industrial concerns which, necessarily, have more or less business with the railroads. This System Federation, therefore, becomes a weapon aimed not only at the heart of the railroad but at the heart of practically every manufacturing enterprise in the country, so that a grievance against the railroad becomes a grievance against every manufacturing concern that sells to the railroad or patronizes the railroad.

The precise effect of an organization of this character, which includes not only railroad employees but employees of industrial enterprises, is shown by the history of the strike in Ireland, to which I have already briefly referred. It is a matter of common knowledge that in that case a lumber firm in Dublin had trouble with its employees over some of the conditions of labor. These employees were members of an organization known as the Amalgamated Servants. This federation included the employees of the lumber firm and also another organization known as the Amalgamated Railway Servants. Now, there was no controversy between the railroad and its employees, but the members of the Amalgamated Railway Servants struck because the railroad company was hauling freight shipped by the lumber firm with which another branch of the order had its controversy. It was in that case shown that the Amalgamated Servants had frankly admitted that they had organized in the particular way in which they had for the reason that they could thereby control transportation facilities and absolutely ruin an industry and make it powerless in the event that any members of the union had a controversy with that industry. Now, it is evident that if this System Federation had grown in numbers, influence, and organization, if there should be a controversy between a sawmill, for instance, and its employees, those employees, who were members of the same federation with the railroad employees, would prevail upon the railroad employees to strike if any product of that mill was transported by the railroad. The disastrous consequence of an arrangement of this kind can readily be seen. A result of this kind would not so clearly follow in the case of an organization of men all of whom were limited to railway service. We think, therefore, that in resisting the organization of this federation we were not only conserving our own property, not only doing a valuable service to other railroads, but were acting as a buffer to protect every form of manufacturing industry from a menace which would, in a short time, have threatened the very existence of all forms of industry.

"The New York Tribune, in discussing the federation plan in its issue of September 7, 1911, uses this language:

"And the public has fully as much reason to regard with anxiety the proposal to concentrate into a single organization authority over the labor engaged in the indispensable public service performed by the railroads as it might have to fear plans for extensive railroad combinations, like that of the Northern Securities Co., which was condemned by the law. One of the railroad presidents speaks of the power which would be in the hands of a combination of all classes of railway employees, those in the shops as well as those engaged in actual operation of the roads, as a power to "throttle commerce." That is no exaggeration, so greatly would the relation of the railroads to their workmen be changed through the proposed labor combination. And it is to be remembered that the combination would be totally irresponsible. It would not be incorporated. It would not be governed by any of the public-service legislation of the country, which has gone far in making capital engaged in performing a public service recognize that it is "affected with a public interest," but which has totally failed to hold the labor combinations among public-service employees to a similar responsibility.

"Moreover, this proposed combination of labor unions lacks the justification which all fair-minded people concede to exist in the case of the unions themselves. Collective bargaining is necessary for the protection of labor. But the organization of each craft by itself and its separate recognition by the railroads has proved adequate to secure for the railroad employee fair treatment. Railroad workmen are well paid. Advances in wages have been made frequently, the latest advance occurring last year at a time when the railroads had not completely recovered from the effects of the panic and when their earnings were falling. Thus the public can see no reason why increased power in bargaining with the railroads is requisite to the welfare of the employees, and it can see abundant reasons for regarding with anxiety the placing of such power as is now proposed over an indispensable public service in the hands of an irresponsible and legally unregulated labor combination."

"The Chicago Record-Herald of October 1, 1911, stated that the business community generally regarded the strike as radical and unwise and that it occurred at a most inopportune time. It was stated in this article that several important commercial bodies had indorsed the attitude of the railroads.

"The Chicago Inter-Ocean, in its issue of October 3, 1911, stated that the strike was ill advised and that no more inopportune time could have been selected for that purpose. It was said that some of the demands of the strikers read as if they were formulated by socialistic theorists, totally ignorant of actual conditions of railroad work.

"The New Orleans Item, in its issue of September 10, 1911, uses this language:

"After a careful and impartial study of this controversy we can find nothing that would justify a strike at the present time. Judging from the expressions of all sorts of papers, representing all sorts of opinions, and from the talk of the people, we believe that the public would set this strike down, if it should occur now, as unjustifiable. If the public is not with the strikers, their strike is utterly doomed to failure in advance."

"The New Orleans Picayune, in its issue of October 11, uses this language:

"The statement that many thousands of railroad employees have struck, or are striking, in order to force their employees to acknowledge and accept the authority of an organization which is a federation of all the other labor unions announces the attempt to establish an additional and more powerful consolidation of the forces of the labor element in our population.

"The railroads employ among the members of their working forces persons skilled in almost every branch of mechanical labor. They embrace all the trades that are combined in the building and repairing of railroad locomotives, cars, and the various appliances that are used in the operation of railway transportation. The men engaged in these various occupations are organized in their specific trade-unions, the blacksmiths in one, the machinists in another, the carpenters in another, the painters in another, and the upholsterers in another, and so on.

"The employers have to deal with each of these trade-unions separately; but now it is proposed to federate the numerous unions into a single body, controlled by a management which speaks for all and whose command all must obey. Heretofore it has been possible when some controversy arose with the blacksmiths, only they had to be settled with, while all the other trades were not complaining and were apparently satisfied; but under the general federation proposition, if a blacksmith should complain of his relations with his employer, all the members of all the federated unions would be bound to take his part and, if ordered to do so, to strike in his behalf.

"Such a proposition not only vastly increases the domination of labor element over the employers, but it establishes an absolute despotism over every member in the great consolidated federation, since thousands of workers whose labor is necessary for the support of their families must leave their employment, abandon their livelihood, and subject themselves to conditions of complete dependence because a single individual in the entire federation is engaged in a controversy with an employer somewhere."

"Again, the same paper says:

"If this were a strike for better wages, for shorter hours of labor, and other burdens on the employees, the strikers would be sure of a large amount of popular sympathy. It is nothing of the sort, however, but only a movement to place a vast body of workpeople, their daily living and that of their families in the grip of a small group or oligarchy of managers or monarchs, which is a matter with which the general public can have no special concern."

"Many other similar quotations could be read into the record from newspapers of not such wide circulation published in many points along the line of the Illinois Central system. There will be further references to the actions of officers and commercial organizations in the further presentation of the facts of this strike.

"This was not a struggle between capital and labor. The Illinois Central was at all times willing to fulfill its contracts or, if these contracts were in any way unsatisfactory, to discuss with the men the making of new contracts. It never refused to meet the accredited officers of the labor unions with which it had these contracts. No question of or conditions of labor was involved. It was a life and death matter with the railroad, but not a life and death matter with the crafts. That the railroad is not opposed to union labor is shown by the fact that it has never refused to employ a shopman either before or since the strike on account of his connection with a labor union. It has refused employment to no man on account of his connection with a labor union, and it will not do so. It has never refused to reemploy any workman because he left the service in the strike, unless it appeared that he had violated the laws of the land or had been perniciously active in hindering or embarrassing the operation of the railroad.

"It is my purpose to go somewhat into detail in regard to the history of this strike, since, as I understand it, it is the desire of the commission to be informed of what measures were taken by the strikers to carry their point, and what defensive measures were taken by the railroad company to protect its property and continue the operation of the railroad and thereby discharge its duty to the public. I can not, of course, deal with every incident of a strike which was more or less acute for a period of about five months and which involved the operation of the railroad in 14 States. However, I will mention the more prominent events and particularly those which were called to the attention of the public, and which were typical and significant of the attitude of both parties to the controversy. I may say that I am perhaps as familiar with the transactions which I shall mention as any other person connected with the railroad, since I made it my business to keep in close touch with the matter throughout the continuance of the acute period.

"The strike of the clerks was confined to the southern lines of the Illinois Central Railroad and to the lines of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad. That is to say, with the exception of some points on the Ohio River, there was no general walkout of the clerks in northern territory.

"The strike of the clerks occurred on September 25, 1911, some days in advance of the strike of the mechanical employees. Six hundred and ninety-eight clerks quit the service on that day. These striking employees were distributed as follows: Two hundred and eighty-four at New Orleans; 130 at Memphis; 22 at Evansville; 4 at Princeton, Ky.; 18 at Paducah; 22 at Water Valley, Miss.; 9 at Louisville; 18 at Vicksburg; 47 at Mounds, Ill.; 23 at Jackson, Tenn.; 4 at Dyersburg, Tenn.; 2 at Ripley, Tenn.; 15 at Canton, Miss.; 57 at Jackson, Miss.; 7 at Brookhaven, Miss.; and 14 at McComb, Miss. The clerks at the smaller towns did not sever their connection with the company. I might mention that, in advance of the general shopmen's strike, at Memphis, there was a so-called sympathetic strike of a number of mechanical employees, which occurred on September 25, the same day when the clerks went out. Generally speaking, however, the strike in the mechanical department did not occur until September 30, 1911. On that date, or very soon thereafter, there occurred a strike of 860 boilermakers and helpers; 474 blacksmiths and helpers; 1,228 machinists; 212 tinners, coppersmiths, and sheet-metal workers; 151 pipefitters, steamfitters, and helpers; 271 painters and helpers, and more than 3,500 car men, these being for the most part employed at the Burnside shops in Chicago; Centralia, Ill.; East St. Louis, Ill.; Clinton, Ill.; Mattoon, Ill.; Freeport, Ill.; Waterloo, Iowa; Jackson, Tenn.; Paducah, Ky.; Fulton, Ky.; Memphis, Tenn.; McComb, Miss.; Water Valley, Miss.; and New Orleans, La.

"In addition to these members of the crafts a number of other employees, helpers, cinder-pit men, etc., struck, bringing the total in the locomotive and car departments up to 8,587. This strike was accompanied by the usual incidents with which this commission must be familiar. The strikers, at practically every point, formed picket lines around the company's property with the purpose to prevent the employment of men to take their places. More or less violence usually attends a strike of this character, and this was not absent in this case. The management of the railroad company felt it to be its imperative duty to supply the places of those who quit its service at the earliest possible moment, and therefore steps were taken to secure a supply of men to carry on the necessary work of the railroad. It was, of course, impossible in every case to obtain men on the ground, and the importation of some laborers from other States was therefore imperatively demanded. I may say that in the States of Alabama, Nebraska, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Indiana, Arkansas, and South Dakota we encountered very little trouble, and nothing occurred in these States which calls for special mention here. The mileage of the Illinois Central system in each of these States is comparatively small; nor are there situated in any of those States any very important repair shops. We did not find it necessary to take any extraordinary precautions in any of these States. We did have a commissioner at Birmingham for a time, but it was discontinued much sooner than at many other points. I will therefore confine my narrative to the States of Iowa, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana, where strike conditions were more acute and where the principal trouble was encountered.

"In a general way, I may say that at practically all of the important points where persons were employed in the mechanical trades, and where a large number of clerks struck, we found it necessary to establish commissaries and to provide sleeping quarters for the men who took the place of the striking employees. We found little or no difficulty in securing an abundance of men to do our work, and the problem before us was to furnish these men with sustenance and protection, so that the work of the railroad might go on. Our experience soon taught us that it would not be safe for these employees to leave the premises to secure meals and lodging, since they were constantly interfered with and, indeed, found it practically impossible to pass the picket line established by the strikers near the railroad premises. These commissaries were abolished gradually as conditions improved, and were entirely discontinued at the end of about six months from the time of the walkout. It was our settled policy to avoid conflicts and violence of every kind, wherever that was possible. As an evidence of this fact, I may mention that at no time were any of the persons employed by us to take the place of strikers permitted to carry weapons of any kind. When the assault was made upon our shop force at Water Valley, Miss., to which I will presently refer, not a man in our employ was armed. When the train carrying employees into and through McComb, Miss., was fired upon by a mob, not a man on the train had a weapon of any kind. Our effort was to comply strictly with all laws, State and Federal, and to handle the matter in such a way as to be free from criticism, in so far as provoking acts of violence was concerned. We did employ a number of special agents or watchmen to assist the Federal and State authorities in maintaining order, and particularly in protecting our property at the various places where violence was threatened. I confidently assert that no incident can be mentioned where the employees of the company were responsible for any outbreak or any act of violence, or, if such incidents did occur, they were isolated and exceptional.

"In order that the commission may understand precisely what happened, I will undertake to review the course of the strike in the several States.

"In the State of Iowa we had only one point—Waterloo—where any very considerable number of mechanical employees were located. At that point, on the 8th of October, a number of persons undertook to enter our shop, but this effort was defeated by the vigilance of the watchmen employed to protect the property there. Some of these watchmen were severely injured by missiles thrown by the mob into the grounds. There were isolated acts of violence at this point from time to time, but the situation was never desperate, and the local authorities felt that they were competent to take care of the matter, and it was therefore not necessary to appeal to the Federal authorities. No suit for injunction was filed in the State of Iowa, although we found it necessary to keep the shops under guard and to maintain a commissary at that point.

"In the State of Illinois we had but little trouble at our important Burnside shops, in the city of Chicago, where were employed the largest number of mechanical employees of any point on the system. The protection furnished by the city authorities was all that could be desired, and we encountered comparatively little trouble at this point. Upon several occasions rocks were thrown through the windows of our suburban trains at Chicago, and on October 2 one man was arrested for assaulting employees at Burnside, and fined $200 and placed under a peace bond. On October 7 another man was arrested for assaulting employees and placed under a peace bond. Upon one occasion a switch engine was turned loose at or near Burnside, and was wrecked by running into a freight train on the main line. Minor and occasional interferences were had with our suburban service, engines being sometimes disabled and other acts of lawlessness committed, but I hardly think they are worthy of detailed mention in this connection.

"We did, however, encounter a good deal of trouble at Centralia, some trouble at Carbondale, and not a little at Mounds and East St. Louis.

"At Centralia, on October 2, certain car repairers were forced to leave their work and a number of section laborers interfered with. There was a good deal of miscellaneous shooting at Carbondale on October 4, several windows in the roundhouse being shot out.

"At Clinton, Ill., on October 10, the engine of a passenger train was disabled by having a piece of iron placed in the guide. On October 18, at Centralia, three of our clerks were attacked by a mob, and several efforts were made to cut hose on passenger trains. On October 21, at Centralia, a watchman was assaulted and beaten. On October 23, at Centralia, a watchman was assaulted while mailing a letter, and on the same day another watchman was badly hurt.

"On the 1st of November, at Carbondale, the assistant train master was fired upon while calling train crews. On November 6, at Carbondale, a striking machinist was assaulted. On November 9, at Centralia, an assault was made upon one of our employees. On November 20, at Carbondale, 11 shots were fired at the roundhouse.

"On October 1, at Mounds, the clerks' carding cars were assaulted with stones and one clerk was injured. Assaults were also made upon the roundhouse foreman at that place and other acts of lawlessness committed. On October 21, at Mounds, Ill., three shots were fired into the office of the assistant train master. On October 25, at Mounds, 16 shots were fired into our office building situated in the railroad yard.

"On October 27 two yard clerks were assaulted at East St. Louis, and on October 28, at the same place, three watchmen and a clerk were assaulted. On the same date two watchmen were assaulted by persons who were presumably in sympathy with the strikers. On October 24 a roundsman at East St. Louis was fired upon, a bullet passing through his coat.

"These incidents are typical of the character of trouble which we encountered in Illinois, and as a result of such acts of violence and intimidation the railroad company found it necessary to apply to the United States circuit court for an injunction. A bill for an injunction was filed and a temporary injunction granted on October 3, 1911, the suit being brought in the eastern district of Illinois, at Cairo. The application for an injunction was vigorously resisted by the defendants, and on October 23, 1911, a motion to dissolve this injunction was heard before United States District Judge Wright, at which time affidavits were offered by both sides, and the case was argued elaborately. The affidavits submitted by the company showed a number of acts of violence at Mounds, Centralia, and Carbondale. After full argument the motion to dissolve the injunction was overruled and the same continued in force and effect. Quite a number of contempt proceedings were instituted to punish persons for violating the court's injunction. I will mention some of them:

"Jesse Hawkins was fined $100 and given a sentence of 30 days in jail by the United States court for making an assault on October 8 upon Eugene Coombes, a clerk at Cairo.

"George Sherwood and J. R. Yoden were fined $200 each and given a sentence of 60 days in jail for making an assault on October 18, 1911, upon William T. Burge, a clerk at Centralia.

"On October 29, 1911, Miles Burpo was assaulted by William McLaine and M. I. Williams at Carbondale. These men were cited for contempt, but the court felt that it had not been shown beyond a reasonable doubt that the assault grew out of any labor trouble, and the defendants were discharged.

"Ernest McClurg, on November 6, 1911, undertook to make an assault upon a machinist named Haffi, but was prevented from actually striking Haffi by the presence of a deputy marshal. McClurg was fined $100 and imprisoned for 30 days.

"On December 4, 1911, Barnard Harley and Henry Joby assaulted Ralph Dunn, employed as a clerk at Mounds. Harley was fined $200 and given a jail sentence of 60 days, and Joby was fined $100 and given a jail sentence of 30 days.

"On December 14, 1911, Omer V. Hudson, a striker, was arrested by United States deputy marshal for threatening a call boy. The case, however, was disposed of by Hudson's paying the costs.

"On October 16, 1911, contempt proceedings were instituted against Charles Linder, C. A. Anthony, and H. E. Maxy. These men were charged with assaulting two employees of the company at East St. Louis on October 6, 1911. The arrest of these men was ordered, but they were never found by the United States marshal.

"On October 19 contempt proceedings were filed against Thomas Woods and James Whitmore. Whitmore was tried first, was found guilty, and a fine of $100 and costs was imposed. Woods was arrested later and his case tried on November 21. He was found guilty, but judgment was suspended conditioned upon good behavior.

"On November 2 contempt proceedings were begun against Charles P. Denison. He was charged with having made an assault upon an employee of the company at East St. Louis. He was found guilty and sentenced to pay a fine of $200 and to a jail sentence of two months.

"In January, 1912, proceedings were begun against James T. McCloskey, James Mengher, and Fred Irwin, for violations of the injunction, alleged to have been committed at Clinton. The case was heard by the Federal judge and the parties dismissed with a warning.

"In March, 1912, contempt proceedings were begun against two men by the name of Hilliard and Nash. These men were placed under bonds of $1,000 to keep the peace. They were charged with violations of the injunction occurring at Mattoon.

"As indicating the view of the judge of the district court, before whom these proceedings were instituted, I will read into the record the opinion of Judge F. M. Wright delivered on November 21, 1911, in the case of United States v. Thomas Woods, president of the local boiler makers' union at East St. Louis. Judge Wright, in rendering his opinion, said:

"This injunction was issued after a fair open hearing in a court of justice. Everybody had an opportunity to be heard upon it, and some of the defendants and others did appear and they were heard upon it, and after a full and fair consideration of the application for an injunction the court determined that it was proper and issue it. It was issued, and thereafter it became the process of this court. Now, I said over and over again, I repeat it again, that that is not the injunction of any judge. It is belittling an injunction to call it the injunction of this or that judge. It is as easy to call it the Constitution and laws of the United States. It becomes binding and effective as any other law that ever was passed. If anybody will undertake to read it, undertake to examine it, they will find that it starts out: "The President of the United States to the defendants in the case, greeting," and it concludes with the name of Edward D. White, Chief Justice of the United States. That is what it said. It is the concrete form of a sovereign command to the people of the United States. If there was ever a high mandate from the sovereign authority of the United States, it is this injunction. It is not my order, it is the order of the court. Of course it requires the voice of some judge to express it, just like in Congress it requires the majority vote of the Members of the two Houses. But it is not their law after it is passed. Any resistance of a command like that is the resistance of the highest authority on earth. That much is to be said of the injunction.

"I know there are a class of people in this country that don't want any law at all and don't want to have any courts. They denounce it; belittle it—these processes of the courts. I say the injunction was properly issued. Now, this railroad is merely a private corporation. Don't get it into your minds that it is public, for it is not. It is a private corporation, and they are entitled to the same rights as you and I are entitled to as individuals, precisely the same, no more and no less. Now, this man here is charged with inducing in some manner, by threats or otherwise, these men immediately employed by this railroad company, a private corporation, to quit. If it was a private individual, it would be precisely the same, no more and no less. Now, there is no peculiar understanding or situation here. Some people have an idea that because it is a railroad it has no rights at all. Now, no one has a right to conspire; no men—no two or more men have a right to conspire to induce anybody whom Mr. Flannigan says he has in his employ—no one has a right, no two or more men have a right to inspire a man to leave Mr. Flannigan's employ to his injury, and no benefit to them. It is denounced by the laws of this State. The railroad is entitled to the same rights. It is a mistake to suppose you have a right to get together and conspire to induce these men to leave the employ of the company, to its injury, and without any benefit to you.

"I don't know what this strike is for. I don't believe anybody else does. From the character of some of the publications I have seen and the character of some of the correspondence I have observed I see that the outsiders are from away off from here—from this railroad, but these men who are concerned with it seem to be bossing it, and have more interest in it than anybody else.

"Now, I say to you men, that there is nobody more friendly to you than the men who are operating this Government, from top to bottom, and when you suffer yourselves to be misled as you are being misled by these outside agitators, you are simply surrendering to them the rights you ought now to be enjoying. If you would let proper people be your friends instead of these men who want to break up the country, you would be better off, and you can if you want to. I don't see what good this strike is doing you. We can all appreciate a strike that is brought about for the purpose of good—a little more wages—a little more money. But why break down the law? You don't appreciate it, but those that see to it do understand that is the object of it. Read those publications—the publications that are foisted upon you, and see what they say about it.

"Now, I have said this much, in a general way. I probably have said this much before. I would like to see all these men on strike get down to fair, unbiased, unprejudiced consideration of this thing. Go back to work. There is no reason why you are out. You can't tell a private corporation or any private concern to surrender up their business to these outside people away off from here. You don't know them. Why, I am informed—not by the evidence in this case—that the largest shops on this railroad, where there are the most men (I am credibly informed this is true), when this strike question came up, voted unanimously against it. Now, think of that for a moment. At the Burnside yards I am informed that there was a unanimous vote against that, unless I am mistaken about it, but certainly a very large majority were against it. But what happened? Somebody away off, I don't know who, some man that your suffrage has elevated and that you have submitted this to in some way or other that you felt yourselves under obligation to obey—these outsiders come in here, control your business, keep you out of your jobs, keep you out of your money. I wouldn't do it. I wouldn't submit to it. It is the most cruel tyranny on earth; men who voluntarily submit to these irresponsible men and carry out their orders to its fullest extent. That have some rules, I don't know what, but some rules and regulations that require you to obey what they say. You are under no legal obligation to obey any such orders. I wouldn't do it. Technically, this defendant is guilty.

"Now, I will tell you what I am going to do in this case. It is the last case, so far as I know, of this kind upon this docket, and I hope it will be the last, for it is no pleasure to me to be compelled to pass upon these questions and judge these men guilty of contempt of court and punish them. I am going to do this: I am going to take this case under advisement indefinitely, convene it to the adjourned session of the September term at Danville, and allow this man to go, as it were, upon parol. I will put him upon a par with all of these strikers that are out striking. If they behave I will never punish this man; but if they don't, and I am compelled to pass upon these cases again, I don't know what I will do. I trust this is the last one that will ever come up."

"I have read that rather long opinion in the record because I understand the commission wants light upon the question of injunction in particular.

"The State of Mississippi is the second most important State served by the Illinois Central system, mileage being considered. In that State there were two principal storm centers, McComb and Water Valley, these being the points where our shops are located. We had some trouble at Durant, Miss., where the freight handlers were threatened with violence, and at Vicksburg there were occasional acts of vandalism, whereby engines were disabled and the operation of the railroad somewhat interfered with. At Jackson, Miss., on the 26th of October, 27 cars had their air hose cut, and on November 14, at the same point, a messenger boy was struck on the head with a club, knocking him senseless. We had considerable trouble at Jackson on account of the clerks' strike, due to the destruction of waybills and records, whereby our shipments were confused and our deliveries interfered with. This was a practice which will be discussed more in detail in connection with my treatment of the situation at Memphis. Outside of these incidents, our difficulties were at McComb and Water Valley, and I will address myself particularly to those points.

"On October 3, 1911, we operated into McComb a special train carrying a number of men destined for McComb and New Orleans, these being persons whom we had employed to take the place of the strikers. Information had evidently been furnished to the strikers and their sympathizers that this train would arrive. In any event, there were probably 250 armed men in and about the station at McComb when this train reached that point. A number of the men were disembarked at McComb for use at that point and the rest of the trainload were taken to New Orleans. At South McComb, or while the train bound for New Orleans was passing that point, the train was fired on by perhaps 250 armed men. Fortunately, the men, by not exposing themselves at the windows or doors, escaped without harm. On the same day the camp cars at the shops, where 123 employees were sleeping, were fired on and other violent demonstrations were made. So serious did this situation become that the local authorities were entirely unable to cope with it, and the governor of the State of Mississippi was asked for troops to protect the property of the company and to preserve order. The first of these troops reached McComb at 2.20 o'clock the morning of October 4. Just prior to their arrival a charge of dynamite was exploded in the middle of the railroad tracks near the office building. On the morning of October 4, there being then present at McComb only a comparatively small number of troops, a mob assembled near the shops and served notice upon the local officers of the company that the men then at work for the company would not be permitted to remain. There were threats of attack upon the shops and the intimation that dynamite would be used if these men were not promptly removed. As stated, there were not at that time enough soldiers present to control the situation, and the governor of the State, the sheriff of Pike County, Miss., and the commander of the State guards united in a request to the railroad company, asking that the men at McComb be immediately removed; otherwise these authorities felt that there would be a wholesale massacre. Yielding to this request from the authorities, the men were removed from McComb by special train, being escorted out of the city by a detail of State guards. Very soon thereafter the number of soldiers at McComb was increased, just as fast as they could be hurried to the scene. On October 13, 425 soldiers and 37 officers were on duty at that point. Thereafter the company was enabled to recruit its force at McComb and to reopen its shops, being under the protection of the State troops. It was found necessary, however, to build a stockade around the shops and, of course, to maintain a commissary. These troops remained at McComb until about March 1, although the number was diminished from time to time as the situation improved.

"On January 17, 1912, occurred a very unfortunate affair near McComb. Five negro laborers employed as helpers in the shops at McComb lived at Summit, Miss., a town 3 miles north of McComb. It was the custom of these employees to return to Summit each night after the day's work was over. While these laborers were returning from the shops to their homes they were fired upon at night, two being killed, one fatally wounded, and two slightly wounded. The local authorities and the governor of the State took active steps to apprehend the persons guilty of this crime, and six persons were arrested, charged with murder. All of these were strikers. Some of these men were subsequently indicted by the grand jury, but it was found impossible to convict them, since the proof was largely circumstantial.

"The commissary at McComb was closed about February 1, and thereafter there was little or no difficulty.

"This railroad maintains a repair shop at Water Valley, Miss., in the northern part of the State. Shortly after the strike we employed a considerable number of men to take the place of the strikers. The trouble there culminated in an attack upon the shop on October 6, 1911. Indeed, on October 4 our shop was invaded by a mob and orders were given to all the employees to leave the town immediately under threat of being fired upon. This mob was armed with shotguns and revolvers. At 11.30 of the same night certain camp cars which were occupied by employees were fired upon. On October 6 occurred the most serious disturbance at Water Valley. At that time the shop was assaulted by an armed mob and a great number of shots fired through the windows. The employees were absolutely without any protection at that time and fled from the shop in fright and disorder. Previous to this attack the shop had been visited by local officers, the men searched for weapons, and the fact was developed that none of the employees were armed. After this attack the governor ordered State troops to be moved to Water Valley, where they remained until about the 1st of February. After the arrival of the troops there was some disorder, consisting of attempts to spike down a switch, shooting toward the shop, assaults upon employees, and so forth. Some of these assaults will be referred to later in discussing measures which were taken in the courts to protect our property in Mississippi. When the strike of the clerks occurred on the 25th of September, as has been stated, quite a number of records were destroyed at Jackson, Miss., causing the utmost confusion in the handling of freight. In order to prevent a recurrence of this form of injury on the 27th of September, 1911, the railroad company filed suit in the Federal court at Jackson, asking for an injunction against the striking clerks, and particularly seeking to prevent them from interfering with the records and business of the company and to enjoin them from committing acts of violence and making threats against the company's employees. An injunction was issued on the 28th of September, which was served on a number of the striking clerks. On the 2d day of October, 1911, the railroad company filed another bill at Jackson, Miss., against the mechanical employees. This bill, while it took the form of a separate suit, was in effect an amendment to the previous suit so broadened as to include the shop employees. This suit was filed in the southern district of Mississippi and was based upon certain acts of violence and certain interference with the property of the company at Jackson, Canton, Brookhaven, McComb, and elsewhere. A restraining order was secured immediately upon the filing of the bill, and this was served upon a number of strikers at points where violence had been common.

"When, as has heretofore been stated, the governor, on the 4th of October, sent troops to McComb, these troops were accompanied by a number of deputy marshals armed with the writ of injunction and instructed by the court to see that the injunction was served and obeyed.

"On the 8th day of October, following the trouble which has been referred to at Water Valley, a bill was filed in the northern district of Mississippi, at Oxford, of a tenor similar to that filed in the southern district. A restraining order was promptly obtained and served by deputy marshals at Water Valley and other points in northern Mississippi.

"On October 13, 1911, warrants were sworn out by the authorities of the United States against J. M. McDaniels and four others, charging them with violating section 247 of the United States Criminal Code, as well as the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890. These men were arrested and put under bond. They, together with 18 others, were subsequently indicted by the grand jury at Jackson, but in view of the fact that contempt proceedings were instituted against these same persons at a later date for violating the injunction the indictments were not pressed.

"On November 3, 1911, a United States deputy marshal filed an affidavit in the Federal court against Jimmie Thompson, charging him with having assaulted one Tim McKnight, an employee of the railroad company, in violation of the injunction. In the same affidavit complaint was made against J. R. Burkitt, Otis Green, Leo Nagle, Worth McKnight, D. T. Verlander, J. D. Dunn U. S. Prosser, Will Watkins, Luther Odkin, Thomas McCauley, and L. H. Brown charging them with having made an assault upon one Britain Mayes, a clerk in the employ of the master mechanic at McComb. Charges were also preferred in the same affidavit against John Hurst, William Glennon, Joe Sanchez, Ed Montgomery, and F. W. Walters, charging them with violations of the injunction. Citations were issued against all these parties upon the filing of the complaint."

There are others of the same nature, which I will not read unless you desire. Chairman WALSH. On the same point?

Mr. MARKHAM. The same point. [Reading:]

"Many of these cases were never brought to trial—"

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Were there any convictions at that place?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think so; yes. [Reading:]

"On November 3 another petition was filed asking for citation for contempt against John Tardy and one Permenter. This affidavit was made by United States deputy marshal."

"On November 14 a petition was filed against Ed. Montgomery based on the affidavit of one J. L. Hester. On November 15 the judge of the court tried Montgomery on this charge. He was sentenced to pay a fine of $100 and to be imprisoned for 90 days in the jail of Hinds County, Miss."

"On January 20 a complaint was made against one Claire B. Smith for an assault upon J. L. Cowen. On the same date complaint was made against Smith Cotton and Joe Bogle for assault upon two men by the name of McInnis. On January 20 another petition was filed against Joe Cotton, Joe Sanchez, and 10 others, this affidavit being filed by United States deputy marshal. Under this last affidavit, on January 31, 1912, Smith Cotton, Joe Cotton, and Joe Sanchez were tried in the Federal court, found guilty, and each sentenced to pay a fine of $100 and imprisonment for four months in the jail of Hinds County, Miss."

"On January 20 a petition for contempt was filed at Jackson against John Coker and four others, charging them with firing into a train, this petition being based upon the affidavit of a United States deputy marshal."

Chairman WALSH. Were the indictments quashed or abandoned on account of the prosecution being under violation of the injunction, at that place?

Mr. MARKHAM. Were all of them?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. What I wanted to find out was whether or not any of the indictments were pursued to trial at that particular place.

Mr. MARKHAM. These were, as I understand it.

Chairman WALSH. Are those indictments, or are they violations of the injunctive order?

Mr. MARKHAM. Take the case where complaint was made against Claire B. Smith for an assault upon J. L. Cowen. Complaint was made against Smith Cotton and Joe Bogle for assault upon two men by the name of McInnis. On January 20 another petition was filed against Joe Cotton, Joe Sanchez, and 10 others.

Chairman WALSH. Inasmuch as it is called a petition, it was not clear in my mind. I thought you read a while ago a statement there that there were certain indictments returned and that they were abandoned because prosecutions were had for violation of the injunctive power.

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes. Those were separate indictments for separate offenses, other offenses than violation of the injunction.

Chairman WALSH. I did not clearly understand the terms down there, whether these petitions were complaints or what.

Mr. MARKHAM. Is Judge Fletcher here?

Judge FLETCHER. They were retired from the files; those indictments were retired to the files, having the same effect as a nolle-pros, because these same men for the same acts were proceeded against by information in the nature of contempt proceedings. Therefore, to avoid any kind of duplication, those indictments were retired.

Mr. MARKHAM (reading): "Many of these cases were never brought to trial, for the reason that conditions rapidly improved at McComb, and it was considered by the authorities that, since violence had ceased and the operation of the railroad become normal, no good would result from pressing these charges."

I may say in that connection that the company entertained the same opinion. [Continues reading:]

"In nearly every case, however, as will be observed, the complaint was not made by employees of the railroad, but by officers of the Federal court. All the contempt proceedings above referred to were for violation of the injunction issued in the southern district of Mississippi at Jackson. In the northern district, by virtue of the injunction granted at Oxford on December 28, 1911, a petition was filed against Johnny Dalton, charging him with assault upon one George Evans. On February 10 a petition was filed against one John H. Hawkins, charging him with circulating an inflammatory circular or paper in violation of the court's injunction. On February 10, 1912, contempt proceedings were instituted against Earl White and Will Cooper charging them with assault upon one John Jones. On February 10, 1912, proceedings were begun against one W. C. Blunt charging him with making an assault upon an employee named Emerich. On February 10 proceedings were instituted against Richard Harris charging him with making an assault upon one F. W. Snyder. On February 14 similar proceedings were filed against DeWitt MacMillan and Alfred Walker charging them with making an assault on one H. K. Martin. On February 26 proceedings were instituted against Louis C. Barber, the editor of a local paper published at Water Valley, charging him with having violated the court's injunction by certain publications in the North Mississippi Herald. Hearings were had on some of these applications, and MacMillan and Walker were found guilty and sentenced each to four months' imprisonment in the county jail. The editor, Barber, was held under a $500 bond for his appearance at the next term of the court. Harris was bound over under a $500 peace bond. Cooper escaped and was never arrested.

This brief review covers all the court proceedings had in Mississippi. No suit was filed at Vicksburg, but the Alabama & Vicksburg Railroad, threatened with a strike at that point, did file a suit against the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, but this suit was dismissed, some adjustment of the difficulty having been arrived at.

"If the commission is doubtful as to the necessity of ordering out troops at McComb and Water Valley and of the necessity for securing the protection of the injunctive power of the Federal court, an examination of the acts of the governor and the legislature in the State of Mississippi during this period would convince them that no steps were taken either by the railroad or by the local authorities which were not fully warranted by conditions. I have shown that the troops were ordered out by the governor only after a very serious riot at McComb and an equally serious riot at Water Valley.

"On October 9, 1911, at the request of the governor of Mississippi, Hon. E. F. Noel, I visited Jackson, Miss., and there held a conference at which were present the governor, the mayor of the city of Jackson, United States Senator John Sharp Williams, and a number of officials and representatives of the local unions at Jackson. The situation was fully discussed, and at the end of the conference Senator Williams, who apparently appeared at the conference at the request of the striking railroad men, made a sensible and patriotic speech to those assembled in the governor's office, advising against any violence or lawlessness of any kind and particularly deploring the action of certain ill-advised men in destroying railway records—a practice which had prevailed to a considerable extent at Memphis and New Orleans.

"On October 10, 1911, the governor of Mississippi addressed a letter to the sheriff of Yalobusha County, in which county Water Valley is situated, wherein this language occurs:

"A peace that means no workmen in the railroad shops except such as may be agreeable to the strikers would be no peace at all. The law should be applied to each individual strike breaker or nonunion man and to each individual striker so that each man would be held responsible, through legal methods, for his own misdemeanors or crimes, and unlawful assemblages and riots and such gatherings should be dispersed and quelled. It was lawlessness and an absolute want of law that led people in the past to shoot men—white, black, or red—because of their color or calling, without reference to whether or not the particular individual had offended against the laws and without giving him a trial. The same characterization applies to the same transactions now. If you and the local authorities are unable to single out the criminals among the strikers or strike breakers and to prevent unlawful gatherings and to protect every man who has not violated the law in his liberty and in his property, then the powers of government, so far as your county or city is concerned, is impaired or lost in one of its most essential particulars, and the State is due the citizens whose lives or property are imperiled to aid in the enforcement of law. If the State is unable to do it, then the Federal Government is required to do it upon the call of the State. The railroad has a right to employ men to fill vacancies in place of those who refuse to work, and the men they employ are entitled to protection, except when they violate law, and to a trial before the courts, and not to mob violence, even when they do offend against the law. There ought to be no trouble about enforcing the law against a man who is a stranger and has no voice nor influence in the courts other than such as the justice of his cause would give him, and neither he nor especially others not connected with him nor his acts should be subjected to mob violence. When such condition prevails it is the duty of the State and the Federal Government to come to the aid of the local government and see that life and property is made secure, regardless of whether the men affected be classed a "gentleman" or a "scab." In either event he is entitled to a trial for his own acts and not to be subjected to mob violence for his own acts, especially not for those of others with whom he is not concerned.

"I sincerely hope that the troubles in your community will be soon adjusted, and I would be glad to do anything in my power toward effecting an amicable adjustment. It seems, however, that both the railroad men and the strikers are determined never to come together on the federation proposition, and that fact might as well be recognized, the railroads regarding it as practical confiscation of property and a surrender of control of it by the owners and the officers, and therefore they say it is not a subject for arbitration nor for any further discussion, and those who insist upon it will probably have to seek other employment than from railroads holding these views, and this fact may as well be recognized now.

"Yours, very truly,

E. F. NOEL.

"On October 19, 1911, the governor of Mississippi by his proclamation convened the legislature in extraordinary session. Among other reasons mentioned by the governor for convening the legislature at this time was 'the payment of the services and other expenses incurred in ordering out the National Guard at the request of local officials to assist these local officials against lawless acts beyond local control.' I quote further from the proclamation:

"Before the National Guard were ordered out hundreds of shots had been fired in riots at McComb city and at Water Valley. The guardsmen have others depending on their earnings, to whose urgent needs the State should give immediate response, for these men are but meeting the obligation resting upon each good citizen to do his share to protect life, property, and the peaceful pursuit of a livelihood guaranteed to every person, high or low, within our State borders. But for the prompt and effective action of the National Guard much blood might have been shed; and probably one of our leading railroads, with all of the agricultural, industrial, commercial, and domestic necessities dependent on its prompt transportation would have been for an indefinite time suspended, to great public and private loss, suffering, and inconvenience."

"At this legislative session there was an appropriation of $48,000 to defray the extraordinary expenses of the National Guard.

"On November 8, 1911, the Mississippi house of representatives, in replying to a protest which had been lodged with that body against the conduct of Col. Baker, commander of the troops at McComb, passed a resolution denouncing this protest. This resolution was in the following language:

"The report of an alleged advisory committee, representing the striking element at McComb city, read in the house yesterday, is an unwarrantable reflection upon the dignity of the State of Mississippi, a slander upon the chief executive of the State in his efforts to preserve order and uphold the law of the State against violence, and uncalled-for slur at the patriotic soldiers of the State who are serving in obedience to the orders of the duly constituted authorities, and is of such a nature as should not be perpetuated upon the journal of the house except to be condemned: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the alleged report be expunged from the journal and proceedings of the house with the regret of the house that such statements were allowed to be read herein."

"On January 4, 1912, the mayor of McComb addressed the following letter to the governor of the State:

"In view of the intolerable conditions here, which seem to be growing worse instead of better, and in view of the complete failure of all civil powers to keep the peace, including the United States circuit court, I would request that martial law be temporarily invoked to the end that the few characters who are terrorizing the community may be brought to summary justice and the streets cleared and business be permitted to be conducted without fear of life and property.

"On Sunday night three men arrived on train No. 3 from the neighborhood of Wesson, Miss. They were severely beaten up, and one escaped by walking to Summit and taking the train for home.

"This was repeated last night when one John N. Walker, a citizen of Arkansas, arrived, looking for work, a so-called "picket" offered to conduct him to a boarding house, induced him to follow him to a secluded place where he was set upon and nearly beaten to death. About the same time the houses of two citizens who are in the employ of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. were fired into and the whole community thrown into a panic.

"The so-called "pickets" congregate on the street corners and block the sidewalks, frequently forcing the people to get off the walk in order to go about their business. They show no more respect to ladies than to men, and never lose an opportunity to insult anyone who is not known to be open enemies of the railroad company.

"I have endeavored in every way to do my duty, but the municipal board is against me, four members of the board being strikers. The United States marshals admit that they are helpless, for some reason not stated.

"I therefore appeal to your excellency to take drastic measures and convince my people once and for all that there is law in the land.

"Very respectfully,

"Mayor of the City of McComb Miss.

"In response to this request the governor did, on January 9, establish a modified form of martial law at McComb.

"There was a change of administration in January, 1912, Gov. Noel having been succeeded as governor by the Hon. Earl Brewer, and a complete change occurring in the personnel of the legislature.

"Shortly after the assassination of the negro employees of this company as they were going from McComb to Summit, as has been shown, the Mississippi Legislature passed an act, approved January 20, 1912, appropriating $2,000 as an emergency fund to be used by the governor in the enforcement of law and the suppression of crime in Pike County, Miss. At this same session of the legislature, liberal sums were appropriated for the extraordinary expenses of the National Guard while being kept on duty at McComb and Water Valley.

"In that connection two different governors and State legislatures appropriated $200,000 for maintaining militia during the strike.

"One of the most significant utterances of this legislative session was the report of a committee appointed by the legislature to investigate the situation at these two points and report whether the troops could safely be withdrawn. The mittee visited both points, and on January 21, 1912, made a report, which is in the following language:

"That we left there in a body and went to McComb city on the 13th day of January, 1912, and after examining some 25 witnesses, composed of strikers, prominent in the different crafts at said place, and business men, professional men, officers—both civil and military—and some of the railroad officials, and after holding an all-day secret session, sitting as a grand jury, we found the condition of affairs were such at said McComb city that we, as a committee, do not think it advisable to remove all the troops from said place. After examining all those witnesses, none told us that it would be better to remove said troops, but many, on the other hand, advised us that it would be better to let them remain there.

"On the 18th of January, 1912, said committee arrived at Water Valley and conducted the same kind of investigation at that place as at McComb city, having examined some 25 witnesses, and after so doing, the committee thought it best not to recommend the removal of all the troops from said place. We, your committee, would, however, recommend to the executive authorities, which we can only do, to remove all the troops at McComb city except 50 soldiers and 3 officers, and 10 soldiers and 1 officer at Water Valley, and, as the civil authorities gain better control of said places, to reduce this number.

"Respectfully submitted.

"H. F. BROYLES,

"Chairman Senate Committee.

"T. I. DOOLITTLE,

"Chairman House Committee."

"Shortly thereafter, however, conditions having greatly improved, the troops were withdrawn by the governor after he had taken the precaution to ascertain positively that normal conditions were rapidly being restored, and that the property of the company would be safe in the absence of the State troops.

"Serious as were all these occurrences in the State of Mississippi, the situation would have been much more serious had it not been for the prompt, hearty, and active cooperation of the two governors in that State and of the law-abiding people living along the line of the railroad, who were at all times in sympathy with the company's policy and who lent their moral support to every effort made by the chief executives and the officers of the law to suppress violence and give the company the best protection that lay in their power. Certainly the authorities of the State of Mississippi are to be congratulated upon the firm stand which they took in favor of law, order, and the protection of life and property. I lodge no complaint whatever against the State of Mississippi, either its people or its officers. Indeed, I acknowledge my debt of gratitude to the State for the splendid support which it gave and which enabled the railroad company to continue its business without having a single train annulled and which ended all interference with the business of the company within six months from the time this strike was declared.

"In the State of Kentucky our principal trouble was at Central City and Fulton. The disorder at Central City, which is a mining town, reached its climax on October 3, 1911. At that time a number of shots were fired into railroad cars and buildings at that point and an attack made upon employees which was similar to those made at other points. On the night of October 2, a crowd of perhaps 200 people assembled about the McDowell Hotel in Central City, in which hotel there were a number of employees brought in to take the places of strikers. The crowd was boisterous and threatening. When the crowd was dispersed by a police officer, it almost immediately reassembled, and threats and menaces were made against employees and officers of the company. On the night of October 3, there was an angry mob of people in Central City, who made a number of threats against the employees of the company and who refused to permit the porter of a passenger train to cut his engine loose from the train and take it to the roundhouse. On the same night a number of shots were fired into camp cars, where the employees of the company were temporarily boarding.

"By reason of these and other acts of violence and the inability of the local authorities to control the situation a suit was brought in the United States Circuit Court for the Western District of Kentucky asking for an injunction. This suit was filed on October 4, 1911, and an injunction issued on October 5. A supplemental bill extending the scope of the original bill was filed on October 21, 1911. This suit was filed at Owensboro, in the western district of Kentucky. Quite a number of contempt proceedings were begun after the issuance and service of the injunction, but in view of the fact that conditions rapidly improved in Kentucky, it was not thought desirable to bring these cases to a trial, and they still stand, as I am informed, upon the docket of the Federal court undisposed of. It is not likely that they will ever be brought to trial unless there should be some outbreak, which nobody at this time anticipates.

"I may mention for the information of the commission the names of Will Thornton, James Garr, William Fogle, Joseph Stewart, Biscuit Mitchell, and Glover Thompson, who were cited for contempt in violating the court's injunction. These citations were issued October 24, 1911, and were returnable at Owensboro.

"There was some disorder at Princeton, Paducah, and Louisville, but I hardly think it necessary to mention these minor disturbances in detail.

"At Fulton, Ky., however, a somewhat more serious situation developed. Picket lines were closely drawn at that point, and on October 26 two carmen were injured by being shot with buckshot fired by some unknown persons. The employees were in an office adjoining the commissary when this occurred.

Thereupon the sheriff of the county, the judge of the county court, and the county attorney petitioned the governor of Kentucky for troops, and in accordance with this request a company of soldiers was sent to Fulton. These soldiers remained on duty until about January 2, when it was considered that the situation had sufficiently cleared up to permit their withdrawal.

"Coming now to the State of Tennessee. There were two principal points of interest—Jackson and Memphis.

"Our troubles at Memphis began on the 26th of September, after the strike of the clerks and the sympathetic strike of the shopmen. Some trouble was had with our passenger trains, Nos. 4 and 104, on September 26. On September 27 two of our employees, when leaving the freight house, were attacked, one watchman being beaten, and persons who were carrying provisions to employees in the freight house were driven away. Picket lines had been established by the strikers just across the street from the Calhoun Street station and in close proximity to the freight house. On the same day there came to our knowledge the fact that our records had been carried away and either hidden or destroyed, so that the proper handling of freight was practically impossible. Cards were being torn off cars and exchanged, so that there was for a time a most annoying confusion as to the origin and destination of freight. Laborers not particularly involved in this strike were molested and found it impossible to go through the picket lines around the company's property. We were not able to open one of our freight houses on September 27. Stones were thrown at and windows broken in sleeping cars which had been taken to Memphis for the use of employees. On October 12 there was an attack made upon the Nonconnah yard office, several volleys being fired during the night. On October 13 two striking car repairers were arrested near the company's property and found armed with loaded revolvers.

"These are some of the cases of violence occurring at Memphis, and are fairly representative.

"The situation in Memphis being thus quite a serious one, on September 27 both the Illinois Central and the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Cos. filed suits in the United States District Court for the Western District of Tennessee against the clerks, asking for an injunction restraining further violence and interference with the company's business and property. This injunction was granted and served on a large number of defendants and given general circulation on September 27. Later a trial was had upon the issues presented by the bill for injunction. Affidavits were offered in support of the bill and in opposition thereto. Full proof was taken, and Judge McCall, holding the court, issued a temporary injunction holding that the company had supported by its proof the charge of lawlessness and interference with the business of the company.

"Upon the hearing of this case the company filed about 75 affidavits in support of the allegations of the bill. These affidavits cover instances of all sorts of interference with the business of the company, such as assaults upon employees, destruction of waybills, changing of cards on the cars, threats, intimidations, and so forth. The affidavits are from persons who were subjected to these assaults or who witnessed them. I have before me a memorandum showing in detail the names of the persons making these affidavits and the character of violence which the affidavit covers. This is at the disposal of the commission and will be read into the record if desired.

"At the conclusion of the hearing Judge McCall, as has been stated, issued the injunction as prayed for, and in doing so used this language:

"The answer makes a technical denial of all the general charges of wrongdoing that are made in the bill, and also a technical denial of practically all the specific acts of wrongdoing, and that makes the issues of fact which the court must determine.

"Judge Gibson, in his Suits in Chancery, section 852, note 16, says:

"On a struggle between the bill and the answer the victory depends on the fullness, frankness, and savor of truth manifested in one rather than the other. A literal, formal, technical denial of the charges, especially if made seriatim, lacks the flavor of that earnest candor which is an essential of truth."

"The answer must do more than deny the facts of the bill in the manner and form as alleged. The substance of the charge must be met and traversed."

"I do not think the answer meets the requirements of the rule laid down by Judge Gibson, especially in reference to the charge of the destruction of the dray checks and shipping instructions. These clerks had the dray checks and shipping instructions on freight consigned for shipment on that date in their possession when they quit work. They should have been there immediately afterwards, or there should have been averment in the answer that they left them upon the desks and in the proper places. Not only so, but to have been entirely full and frank, the answer should have not only denied that they did not destroy them as the agents of the companies but that they did not destroy them in any capacity, nor did they mislay or conceal them. For if they were only mislaid or concealed the subsequent confusion of business would have been just as acute for the time being as if they had been destroyed.

"It is necessary to say that the complainants filed a large number of affidavits tending to support the allegations of the bill, while, upon the other hand, the defendants filed a large number of affidavits tending to support their denial of wrongdoing as alleged against them.

"The same weakness pointed out in reference to the answer appears in the affidavits filed by the defendants, and this includes the answer, in so far as it may be considered as affidavits of those whose names appear thereto.

"It would extend this opinion far beyond reasonable proportions to attempt to analyze all the affidavits that have been filed; but, in a general way, the court must state its conclusion after a due consideration of all the testimony offered.

"I am of the opinion that the answer and the affidavits in support thereof fairly meet some of the charges made in the bill, yet there are other charges made therein which I believe the greater weight of the evidence, as set forth in the affidavits filed by both complainants and defendants, is with the complainants. And these charges, so established, in so far as they can be established by ex parte affidavits, are sufficient not only to authorize the court but to make it its positive duty to grant the preliminary injunction."

"At Memphis the following contempt proceedings were had, all of these being instituted in the Federal court:

"On October 16, 1911, a complaint was made against one M. J. Scott for having assaulted the acting chief clerk at the local freight office. This attachment was issued and served, but the case apparently never came to trial.

"On October 17, 1911, a complaint was lodged against John N. Hastings for an assault upon a clerk in the office of the general freight agent, but temporarily employed in the local freight office. The proof was clear as to Hastings's guilt and he was sentenced to 10 days in jail, but on account of his youth the jail sentence was held up upon payment of costs.

"On October 26, 1911, a complaint was made against Nicholas E. Brangan for an assault upon the chief yard clerk. The attachment was issued but was never served, as Brangan fled from the State.

"On October 28 a complaint was made against J. E. McCracken for making an assault upon a man employed in the shops. The attachment issued but McCracken fled the State and was never served.

"On October 28, complaint was made against A. E. Gaskins and S. C. White, for an assault upon a clerk named Tirelli. White was fined $100, which fine was suspended by the court until some further order. The court felt, however, that Gaskins had not been shown to be guilty beyond the reasonable doubt which the law required and he was therefore discharged.

"On November 6, complaint was filed against C. W. Rowe for an assault upon a clerk. Rowe was found guilty and sentenced to 90 days in jail, but was released after having served 47 days, the railroad company concurring in a request that this be done.

"On November 24, complaint was made against Joseph Humphrey, W. H. Hall, and George J. Cissel for making an attack upon a clerk. Upon the trial, Cissel was acquitted, but Humphrey and Hall were convicted and sentenced to four months in jail. They actually served not more than three weeks, however, being released after that time on their good behavior.

"On December 8 a complaint was made against C. H. Martyn for threatening and intimidating employees. Martyn was sentenced to three months in jail and fined $100, but the sentence was suspended during good behavior and upon the condition that he would report to the marshal every week.

"On December 8, 1911, complaint was made against Herman Simonson for making an attack upon an employee named Marcrum. Simonson was found guilty and sentenced to pay a fine of $100 and three months in jail, but sentence was suspended during good behavior and upon the condition that he report weekly to the marshal.

"On December 22, 1911, a complaint was filed against John Pelegrin for making an assault upon employees. The testimony, however, showed that Pelegrin was not present when the alleged assault occurred and he was therefore dismissed.

"At Jackson, Tenn., there was some interference with the business of the company, particularly taking the form of threats against freight truckers. The injunction granted by the Federal court was not resisted at Jackson by the defendants. Perhaps the most serious occurrence at that point was the firing into the shop yard on October 6, 1911, at which time about 30 shots were discharged. On the afternoon of October 7 one of the striking clerks, a man named Alfred, was found dead in the cemetery adjacent to the shop. A revolver was found upon his person and a belt filled with cartridges. It was evident that he was accidentally shot by persons who were firing on the shops.

"In Louisiana the interference with the business of the company was confined almost entirely to the city of New Orleans and its suburbs. On the 26th of September, one of the clerks, who chose not to strike, was badly beaten by a crowd assembled about the premises of the company. On the 27th 2 traveling auditors and 2 clerks were assaulted on Canal Street. On the 5th of October, while 13 shopmen were being moved from one point in the city to another, the car in which they were riding was attacked by a mob and the movement prevented. A number of rocks were thrown, resulting in cuts and bruises of a minor character. On the same day, October 5, 8 employees, guarded by United States marshals, were fired upon by a mob at the fruit wharf, one employee being shot in the stomach and one of the marshals being wounded slightly in the hand. On October 8 an attempt was made to fire a hay shed at Poydras yard, but the fire was discovered by a watchman and extinguished.

"On November 1, Mr. Walter P. Allen, a member of Gov. Colquitt, of Texas, party, was assaulted at the Union Depot at New Orleans, evidently being mistaken for an employee. On November 7, a timekeeper, Mr. B. V. Muller, was assaulted at the corner of Howard and Dryades Streets. On November 10, a clerk, one H. N. Shaw, was assaulted by four men.

"At New Orleans the same tactics were pursued in regard to destroying records, changing the cards on cars, and mixing up freight in the yards as we confronted at Memphis. We were also greatly annoyed at New Orleans by the cutting of air hose on cars. While this trouble was not peculiar to New Orleans, this form of vandalism having occurred at Central City, Ky., and elsewhere, yet it was carried to a greater extent at New Orleans than any other place on the line. Thus, on the 6th of October, several cars were found on the terminal with the air hose cut. On October 25, 17 cars were found in this condition; on November 15, 15 cars were thus injured; on November 19, 9 cars; and on November 20, 12 cars were found with the air hose cut. On November 30, 26 cars were thus disabled. On November 17, 5 cars were injured in this way. On January 12, 25 cars were found with the air hose cut. These are only instances of the method adopted to cause the company loss and embarrassment.

"On September 26 a suit was filed in the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, in which the striking clerks were made parties defendant, seeking to enjoin the defendants named from interfering with the business of the company and from resorting to violence or unlawful means of any kind. A writ of injunction was issued and served upon quite a number of persons, and thereafter there were some prosecutions for violation of the injunction.

"On September 27 Fred Engelbrecht, Fred Keese, and James Wakefield were arrested, charged with having interfered with a laborer by the name of Blanks. These men escaped on the first trial, on the ground that they were simply calling on Blanks for the purpose of using persuasion to induce him to quit work. A few days later, however, Engelbrecht, with two other men, was found lying in wait for Blanks, apparently in order to attack him on his return home. The men were again arrested and at the end of the trial Engelbrecht was found guilty by Judge Foster of the Federal court and sentenced to 10 days in jail.

"Shortly thereafter one James Ware and other men assaulted two employees of the company on a street car at the corner of Canal and Baronne Streets. Ware was convicted of this assault and sentenced to 10 days in the county jail. On October 6, one William J. Mason was arrested for leading a mob in an attack upon the employees of the railroad company, lodged temporarily in Peters School. Mason pleaded guilty and was sentenced to serve a 90-day jail term. In imposing this sentence, Judge Foster stated that Mason was guilty of a serious crime in having started a riot, but that, in view of the illness of his mother, he would not inflict more severe punishment.

"On October 7 Max Russel and Arthur Leutz, two strikers, assaulted a clerk named Johnson, throwing bricks and other missiles at him. They were tried by the judge of the Federal court and sentenced to 10 days in the parish prison.

"On October 7 one Hill Nugent, a striker, was arrested for striking an employee of the company named Moran. Upon the testimony of a police officer and of Moran, Judge Foster found Nugent guilty and sentenced him to 10 days in jail. On October 8 a striker named John Lapouble was sentenced by Judge Foster to a jail term of 10 days for throwing rocks at employees returning from the Sturvestant Docks.

"On October 9 one Frank Grotzsch was found uncoupling an engine from the coach at Stuyvesant Docks, and a 60-day jail sentence was imposed by the judge of the Federal court. On October 14 three strikers, Bernard Bowen, Lawrence Newman, and Charles Lockeridge, made a most brutal assault upon J. E. W. Thomas and his wife, both of whom were clerical employees of the railroad company. Mrs. Thomas was knocked down by these men. The persons making the assault were arrested and sentenced each to serve 4 months in the county jail by the judge of the Federal court. On the same day, one John Coons was arrested while tearing cards off cars, and given 30 days in jail by Judge Foster of the Federal court. On October 17 one Arthur Johnson was arrested for making an assault upon clerks and was punished by being sentenced to jail for 30 days. On November 21 Henry Johnson and Albert Williams were each fined $25 for turning an angle cock, this punishment being imposed by the judge of the Federal court.

"On December 13 one Dan Daly was sentenced to serve 60 days in the county jail by Judge Foster for making an assault upon an employee by the name of Kentzell. On December 17 one Paul Souvie was arrested, convicted, and sentenced to the county jail for 6 months for cutting air hose.

"I have thus attempted to review as briefly and yet as comprehensively as possible the principal events in this strike, which, as has been stated, lasted for a period of 5 or 6 months. I have endeavored to state, in accordance with the committee's request, the number of men who went out, the steps that were taken by the company and by the civil authorities to protect the property and to permit the operation of the railroad, have mentioned all the cases filed in court upon which injunctions were obtained and all the contempt proceedings, so far as my information extends.

"I have not attempted to mention all the minor occurrences, since a history of these less important events would perhaps burden the record unduly and tax the patience of the commission. If there are any particular incidents which have been called to the attention of the commission and to which I have not referred, about which the commission desires further information, I hold myself in readiness to supply it, either personally or through the medium of other officers of the company.

"My own opinion is that there has rarely, if ever, occurred in the United States a strike of this magnitude in which there were fewer fatalities than this. As my narrative indicates, the only employees of this company who were killed were the negro laborers who were waylaid and assassinated on the way from McComb to Summit, Miss. Of course, a number of employees at various times received injuries of a more or less serious nature, but apparently none were fatal except those mentioned. It is my opinion that none of the strikers or their sympathizers were at any time seriously injured either by our employees, by the soldiers, the deputy marshals, or the private watchmen of this company. While our business for a time was badly interfered with, particularly by reason of the destruction and concealment of records at Memphis and New Orleans and the changing of cards upon cars, yet, upon the whole, as I look back upon the matter I feel that we emerged from the strike with as little loss as could have been expected. Our trains were in some cases delayed. All the trains were actually operated and the traffic was moved, though, as stated, there was some delay.

"By the middle of March, 1912, the strike was over, so far as it affected the business of the company. Since that time we have had scarcely any trouble, although there has been now and then an outbreak of trifling consequence, which we simply ignored. Perhaps 1,500 striking shopmen have returned to work, and our shop force is now and has been for two years or more in excellent condition, well organized, and thoroughly efficient. The most cordial relations now exist with all our employees and there is no trace of inharmoniousness or friction of any kind. A very large number of our present shop force are natives of the States in which the shops are located. They seem to be entirely satisfied with their wages and conditions of employment. Of course, I am not able to give information as to the present location and occupation of the men who left our service and did not return. Many of them, doubtless, have entered the service of other railroads, and some of them have sought employment in other locations.

"I have not the slightest doubt that our success in handling this strike and our ability to operate our railroad during the acute period were largely due to the fact that public sentiment generally was overwhelmingly in our favor. As indicated in an earlier part of this statement, we had the support of the substantial and influential newspapers at almost every point on our line. Commercial organizations in many cities indicated their sympathy with our position. An effort was made by one Congressman to have a congressional investigation of this strike, but the resolutions to this effect did not emerge from the committee to which it was referred. A similar effort made by a member of the Illinois Legislature was promptly tabled. While some of the local authorities were slow to assert themselves in defense of the company's property at the beginning of the strike, I attribute the feeling of indifference to a failure to understand the causes of the trouble. As soon as the attitude of the company became generally known this feeling of indifference or sympathy with the striking men rapidly disappeared, and thereafter the local authorities cooperated with the Federal authorities in enforcing the law.

"As indicative of the attitude of the clergy, I will read into the record a statement made on October 7 by the Most Rev. James J. Keane, archbishop of Dubuque, in an interview which he gave out, as published in the Waterloo Times.

"It is unfortunate that men who have local interest allow the irresponsible to secure control. They do that by neglecting to attend meetings and to elect the conservative and careful to office," said Most Rev. James J. Keane, archbishop of Dubuque, in an interview last night at the home of Rev. Father J. J. Hanley, when asked his opinion on the strike of the Illinois Central Railway shopmen.

"I am exceedingly sorry that the men have been persuaded to go out," he continued, "as I know from a very thorough canvass of the situation through the West, where the matter is being agitated, that the vast majority of them were not in favor of it. Not only do the men neglect to elect to office the conservative and careful, but by their inattention to the interests of the unions they permit the radical element to advocate and strive for the introduction of impractical principles which are unjust to vested interests of unionism.

"Some of the matters at issue in the present strike are radical, so radical, indeed, that it is difficult to see how the railroad company can yield without capitulating. They demand, as an instance, the time of service and not merit must determine whether a man is to be promoted or not; secondly, that a man's personal record should not at all influence those who are to employ him; and, thirdly, that the entire body should be made to suffer in order to promote the presumed interests of a particular craft.

"I believe in unionism; I believe that men have a perfect right to unite to protect their interests, just as capital combines to promote its interests. Men have a perfect right to a wage which will be sufficient to support their families in comparative comfort and to make some provision, provided they be economical and industrious, for the morrow. But the good which unionism serves to promote can not possibly justify the introduction into the practical conduct of unionism of principles which are unjust. I fear that some of the principles with which they are contending are such, and I believe that the superior minded, upon deliberation, will have the courage to repudiate what is wrong and to abandon a contention for what is not just. I expect that within a short time a goodly number of men who have local interests will have the courage to return to work."

"I may add that the engineers, firemen, conductors, brakemen, and all men engaged in the operation of the trains were loyal to the interests of the company throughout the trouble, and we have no cause to complain of their conduct.

"As I look back upon the matter, calmly and dispassionately, I remain of the opinion that the company made no mistake in declining to meet the officers of the so-called federation. In fact, no other course was open to us, unless we were prepared absolutely to surrender the management of the property to a small band of ambitious leaders. While the strike was, of course, a disagreeable experience and an expensive one, I do not feel that any other course could have been adopted, consistent with the permanent welfare of the property. It is a matter for congratulation that the employees of the company at all times preserved their equilibrium, and that we went through the ordeal with the minimum of violence and with the maximum of patience and forbearance. If the men who quit the service have suffered loss, and if their families have undergone privations, I, of course, regret the fact, but I do not feel that any responsibility rests upon the management. The action of the men was taken without provocation, and this company disclaims any responsibility for hardships to which the men may have been subjected.

"I invite the fullest investigation of every phase of this affair, and shall be glad to reply to any questions which the commission may see proper to propound."

Chairman WALSH. I want to call off the list of these organizations and ask you with which you had contracts or working arrangements prior to the strike of 1911.

Brotherhood of Railway Carmen?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Brotherhood of Blacksmiths?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The Brotherhood of Boilermakers and Iron Shipbuilders?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. International Association of Machinists?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Association of Steamfitters?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Painters, Decorators, and Paper Hangers?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Federal Labor Unions?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Brotherhood of Railway Clerks?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. What had been your experience with those crafts with which you dealt, as to harmonious and satisfactory relations?

Mr. MARKHAM. So satisfactory that we have not had a grievance with them for years, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You had been in perfect harmony?

Mr. MARKHAM. Usually. There were the usual negotiations.

Chairman WALSH. What, if any, points of difference existed between your company and these crafts prior to the formation of the Illinois System Federation?

Mr. MARKHAM. None that we had any notice of.

Chairman WALSH. Had any question arisen as to the matter of seniority rights of shop employees?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; most emphatically, no.

Chairman WALSH. I am asking you a number of questions that have been submitted, assuming you are going away this evening. So I am rather putting it in advance—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And many of them have been requested by the gentlemen who are attending this—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). Yes. I am sure I appreciate it very much, your allowing me to testify to-day.

Chairman WALSH. How frequently were conferences held with these various crafts?

Mr. MARKHAM. I have not any information with me as to the number of conferences; but the contracts were at various dates. I think 1909 and 1910 most of the seven contracts that you refer to date back to, and, as is usual with such contracts, there were meetings at various times to consider different questions arising with respect to the construction of the contracts.

Chairman WALSH. Was each craft dealt with separately?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How much time would you say, upon the whole, would these conferences consume?

Mr. MARKHAM. Oh, I could not even hazard a guess.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). No.

Chairman WALSH. Was it a matter of days or weeks or—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). No.

Chairman WALSH. Or months?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. It is impossible for you to approximate it?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did your company at any time prior to the formation of the Illinois Central System Federation ever organize a committee composed of committees from the various crafts for the purpose of waiting upon the governor of Illinois and urging an increase in freight rates?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not to my knowledge. It may have been done, but I have no knowledge of it.

Chairman WALSH. Was such committee ever organized by the company, or at the request or desire of the company, and sent to Gov. Deneen for the purpose of urging him to use his influence in favor of an increase in rates?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not know of any such committee having been organized, but I would see no objection to it. I should think the men would have the same interests in the company securing an increased compensation, in order that their compensation might be increased; I would see no objection to that. It seems to me it would be in perfect harmony with the relations existing between the company and its employees.

Chairman WALSH. Did the company pay for the time of and give transportation to men composing such a committee?

Mr. MARKHAM. I answered that question by stating that I did not know that such a committee was appointed; but if there was such a committee, I think that would be proper.

Chairman WALSH. You can not answer the question more definitely?

Mr. MARKHAM. You would have to give me some dates, and we would have to look back.

Chairman WALSH. Would it be specific enough to say that it was during the administration of Gov. Deneen, or the legislature which was in session during his incumbency?

Mr. MARKHAM. For this investigation I would be willing to admit that the company did ask its employees to cooperate with it in endeavoring to get increased rates from the State.

Chairman WALSH. When did you first learn of the movement on the part of the shop crafts on the Illinois Central to organize into a system federation?

Mr. MARKHAM. In May or June of 1911—in the summer of 1911.

Chairman WALSH. Did you hear of a convention held May 1, 1911, at Memphis, Tenn., where the shop crafts on the Illinois Central organized a system federation?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not remember the date, but I know such a convention was held.

Chairman WALSH. Some time prior to that?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know of a letter being sent to Mr. Bell, superintendent of motive power for your company, Mr. Foley, former superintendent of motive power, and other officials, under date of June 20, 1911, in which the so-called federated committee, composed of three members of each of the crafts, asked for a conference?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think I read a letter of June 9 to Mr. Foley of the same tenor.

Chairman WALSH. Was any reply sent to the representatives of the men?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. Have you that reply in the record here?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not in the record here.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly have that submitted, please?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

(See Markham Exhibit No. 1 at end of this subject.)

Mr. MARKHAM. I might say, Mr. Chairman, however, that we were very consistent in our declining to meet the officers of the federation from the beginning, and there would be nothing different in Mr. Foley's declining to meet them, from the letter I finally wrote them some time in August.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not the Illinois Central System Federation renewed its request for a conference in a letter sent by the president of the association to Mr. Foley on July 12?

Mr. MARKHAM. I did not catch that question.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not the Illinois Central System Federation renewed its request for a conference in a letter sent by the president of the association to Mr. Foley on July 12?

Mr. MARKHAM. It is my understanding that there was never any meeting with the officers of the federation as such; that whatever meetings we had were with officers of organizations with which we had contracts, and we declined from the beginning to give any force to the so-called recognition of the System Federation by holding meetings with its officers.

Chairman WALSH. Were you advised of the fact that Mr. Foley had met with the individuals who were the officers of the System Federation on July 21, or about that time?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not remember.

Chairman WALSH. Was any objection made in letters from the company's officials, between July 10 and July 13, or in the conference held on July 21, that the crafts composing the federation had not given 30 days' notice that they wished a change in their contract?

Mr. MARKHAM. I have no knowledge of any such meeting, and therefore I can not answer the question. I speak for the company in all these matters, and if there was any slip in the method of handling this question by the officers of the company, it was something afterwards disavowed, and if Mr. Foley or any other officer of the company met the so-called officers of this System Federation, and that is now being urged by the proponents of the System Federation as an indication that the company, to that extent, recognized this federation, I want to say as president of the company that I want to disavow any such action, as was done in my final letter to the federation.

Chairman WALSH. The company attempted to maintain a consistent attitude as to the right of the men to have a federated system?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What officials of the company gave their personal attention to the controversy with the shop employees and to the meeting of problems that arose before and during the strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. The superintendent in charge of each division—the general superintendents—three in number, and the general manager.

Chairman WALSH. Give the names of the general manager and of these superintendents.

Mr. MARKHAM. At that time Mr. Morris was superintendent of the Y. M. V., Mr. Clift of the lines south of the Ohio River, and Mr. Baxter was superintendent of the northern lines; Mr. Foley was assistant general manager and Mr. Park vice president and general manager, in charge of operation; Mr. Bell was superintendent of motive power; and they, under my direction, gave most of the attention to the strike.

Chairman WALSH. Did the same people give attention during the strike also?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; each, of course, assisted by his staff of train masters and master mechanics and the like; but we looked to those men.

Chairman WALSH. What conferences were held by the officials of the company with the board of directors or the executive committee in regard to the strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. There were no conferences.

Chairman WALSH. How was the policy of the company determined in regard to the federation during the strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. It was determined by the management in Chicago, of which I am the executive head, reporting, of course, to the board of directors, as in all other matters.

Chairman WALSH. How frequently did you make reports to the board of directors?

Mr. MARKHAM. Before the strike?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; first, before the strike.

Mr. MARKHAM. I suppose probably it was referred to, as long as it was a live question, in our weekly letter.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have a weekly letter in your general custom?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; as to general conditions on the line; it was very brief.

Chairman WALSH. And during the strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. Whenever there was occasion to refer to it.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have many reports to make to the executive committee?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not in any detail, merely expressions as to the conduct of the strike, how it was getting along, and its probable life—but merely speculative as to the life of the strike.

Chairman WALSH. Was the Illinois Central Railroad Co. at that time affiliated in any way, either directly or indirectly, with the so-called Harriman lines?

Mr. MARKHAM. It never has been.

Chairman WALSH. Did officials of your company hold conferences or exchange correspondence with Mr. Kruttschnitt, of the Harriman lines, regarding a policy to be pursued toward the newly organized federations?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did you or other officers—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). One moment, in answer to that question. There may have been an exchange of correspondence with Mr. Kruttschnitt or with officers of the so-called Harriman lines. Mr. Kruttschnitt was in charge of operation and the ranking officer of the Southern Pacific and Union Pacific, and a man I would naturally discuss any questions of common interest with. There was a large matter of common interest involved in this strike, the only difference being that we had a larger number of organizations to deal with than they had; and there was probably some exchange of views as to how the matters were being handled and how we were getting along, and a discussion between Mr. Kruttschnitt and myself on different matters, but I have no personal recollection of it. I am willing to admit, however, there was.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please ascertain whether or not there was correspondence between Mr. Kruttschnitt and yourself with reference to the general policy of dealing with this organization and submit it to the commission?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; but I want to emphasize this point: That this matter was handled by myself and without reference to what the officials of any other company may or may not have thought of our policies.

(See Markham Exhibit No. 1.)

Chairman WALSH. Did you have any conference with Mr. Kruttschnitt yourself?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did any of the other officials that you know of have any conferences with them?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have a formal or informal meeting with the heads of any other railroads with reference to the policy to be pursued toward this organization?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not shop crafts on other lines have dealt with the railroad companies as federations?

Mr. MARKHAM. I believe there are some instances; yes.

Chairman WALSH. What roads?

Mr. MARKHAM. Well, I might mention the Southern Railway as one I have in mind; I do not recall now any other—perhaps the Rock Island, and later on some lines not strong financially that could not stand out and probably had to make some arrangements.

Chairman WALSH. Any other?

Mr. MARKHAM. May have been some others, but I do not recall them now.

Chairman WALSH. It might be interesting at this time, in a general way, and as concisely as possible, to state what the effect has been on those roads, good or bad, and whether or not the fears expressed in your statement were borne out by the situation on those roads.

Mr. MARKHAM. Why, I have not any knowledge of the condition on these roads. I might add an expression of opinion on the subject, that if those fears have not been realized it is because the organization has not grown strong enough.

Chairman WALSH. Had your company taken steps to introduce piecework, bonus system, or other systems of what is properly called scientific shop management into its shops prior to the formation of the federation?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. What were the wages paid to members of the various crafts involved in the controversy prior to the strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. I can not call them offhand; there was a basis of wages common to all the other roads in this territory at that time.

Chairman WALSH. Was a questionnaire submitted to you by the staff, asking you to give those wages?

Mr. MARKHAM. At this time?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MARKHAM. No; I don't believe I quite caught that.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a request made upon you to have submitted to the commission these wages I have asked for?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not that I can recall. It can be obtained; there is no objection to furnishing it. You mean the wages in effect at the time the strike was called?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

(See Markham Exhibit No. 1.)

Chairman WALSH. What were the hours of labor for these crafts?

Mr. MARKHAM. The usual hours obtaining on other railroads in this country; I think the 9-hour day was the basis.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever consider a proposal to submit the points at issue to arbitration?

Mr. MARKHAM. No such proposal was ever made to us from any authoritative source.

Chairman WALSH. That would include, of course—what do you mean by authoritative source?

Mr. MARKHAM. I mean it never came from the officers of the organization on strike.

Chairman WALSH. Was any proposition of arbitration ever made by the federation that was sought to be had?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did the System Federation, or any other agency, at any time endeavor to secure the services of the State or Federal labor bureaus, the National Civic Federation, or other bodies as arbitrators to settle the strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think they did in one or two instances. I think I recall some letter from some State official in Illinois containing suggestions that something of the kind be done, but it was not followed up in any way; it was not from any authoritative source, and it was answered in the usual way by giving our present understanding of the status of the strike.

Chairman WALSH. Did your company adopt any policy, or did it take any attitude toward those attempted negotiations?

Mr. MARKHAM. Mr. Chairman, it never got to the point where it became necessary for us to do that. If you want to ask me what my attitude would have been if that question came up, it would be different, but that question never came to us from any authoritative source, and it was a question we never had to answer except in the abstract in dealing with it as a theoretical question.

Chairman WALSH. Perhaps you stated this in your statement, but it was so connected that I did not get it exactly clear in my mind. Were steps taken, by the employment of watchmen, to protect the company's property as soon as the strike was ordered, or was it after there was some showing made that the company's property was imperiled?

Mr. MARKHAM. It was coincident with the calling of the strike. We immediately began to employ watchmen to protect the property of the company.

Chairman WALSH. To what extent? I wish you would give us an idea. Were they employed?

Mr. MARKHAM. You mean as to numbers?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MARKHAM. I suppose at one time we had over a thousand watchmen at different points on the lines. Take a situation like at New Orleans, with all the ramifications of the railroad yards, 150 or 200 men scattered around to protect the property would not be too large a number.

Chairman WALSH. I would like you to explain approximately how many were put on, first, as soon as the strike was ordered?

Mr. MARKHAM. I can not answer that approximately; I only know that during the first month of the strike—October—we had a maximum at one time of about 1,200 watchmen, and then it was rapidly reduced every week, or almost every day after that.

Chairman WALSH. At the beginning of the strike, could you give us an idea of how many you had?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not the slightest.

Chairman WALSH. I assume that the 1,200 were had during the time that the disturbance was the most acute?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And while the trouble was going on that you have been reading about?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. In whose charge were these men?

Mr. MARKHAM. Mr. Kelliher.

Chairman WALSH. Who was he?

Mr. MARKHAM. The man in charge of our department that looks after all those things.

Chairman WALSH. What is his title?

Mr. MARKHAM. Chief special agent.

Chairman WALSH. Chief special agent?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. From whence were these men obtained?

Mr. MARKHAM. From everywhere. Mr. Kelliher was formerly in the West, connected with the Union Pacific out in Wyoming; he was a peace officer in that section, and through his acquaintance in that section he got a good many men from there. The men used in St. Louis and Carbondale came largely from the West. The men employed in the South, New Orleans, came from that district.

Chairman WALSH. Did any come from any organized agencies—detective agencies?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; I think not.

Chairman WALSH. What instructions were given to the chief special agent of your company with reference to handling these men, and arming them, if they were so armed?

Mr. MARKHAM. His instructions were to do everything he possibly could to avoid the loss of life.

Chairman WALSH. Were instructions given to him in writing?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; we were in constant communication, and there was no necessity for doing that.

Chairman WALSH. When were the instructions given; during the ordinary course of business?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; by his immediate superior officer, handling the matter through him.

Chairman WALSH. Where were the arms obtained?

Mr. MARKHAM. What arms?

Chairman WALSH. I assumed, perhaps, without having the fact in mind, that these men were armed?

Mr. MARKHAM. If we found it necessary to buy shotguns for men in some of the outlying districts around New Orleans we would go to some hardware store and buy them; I don't know just where.

Chairman WALSH. Were these guards armed with weapons generally?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. They were not armed?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; but where a man was in a little outlying cabin, for the purpose of guarding property from destruction or fire, or where other persons may have been endangered, because of the isolated nature of the place, they were probably furnished with shotguns, or something of the kind.

Chairman WALSH. Who had power to do that?

Mr. MARKHAM. Mr. Kelliher.

Chairman WALSH. Entirely?

Mr. MARKHAM. Or the general superintendent in charge at the time.

Chairman WALSH. Have you a record in your office showing the amount and nature of the firearms furnished?

Mr. MARKHAM. We can get it.

Chairman WALSH. Will you do so, and furnish it to the commission?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

(See Markham Exhibit No. 2.)

Chairman WALSH. Did the board of directors or the executive committee have meetings to consider the strike situation?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not for that special purpose; no. Judge Fletcher, are you making a note of these things?

Judge FLETCHER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Were Mr. Kelliher's men on a special pay roll at all times?

Mr. MARKHAM. I am not sure about that; I think he had his own pay roll.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please ascertain and submit the pay roll to the commission?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

(See Markham Exhibit No. 1.)

9732 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Chairman WALSH. Now, my question was, did the board of directors or executive committee have meetings to consider the strike situation?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not for that special purpose.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any meeting or meetings of the board of directors or executive committee at which the strike situation was discussed?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; only such meetings as I was present at, and would make the usual references to the conduct of the strike and to the progress of it.

Chairman WALSH. Was any stenographic record kept of the reports you made to the executive committee?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. What steps were taken to obtain machinists and other shopworkers to take the places of the men on strike? Give the entire modus operandi.

Mr. MARKHAM. We made the usual arrangements, Mr. Chairman, with the employment agencies throughout the country, making the usual basis for payment for securing the men.

Chairman WALSH. Please give what that is.

Mr. MARKHAM. I can not. I can only say that when a strike occurs on a railroad the first thing you have to do is to get men; there are certain employment agencies throughout the country that make it a business to secure men, and the usual plan, if it happens to be, say, for instance, in Cincinnati, is to go to them, and they advertise for men to be employed under certain conditions to go to certain places, and those men are required to sign an application for employment setting forth the conditions of their employment, and the fact that they may be called upon to take the places of strikers, and the usual plan is to pay the labor agency, in some cases, so much a day for the men in charge for the running of the office, and in other cases a certain sum is paid for each man furnished by the labor agencies.

Chairman WALSH. Which plan was followed in this case?

Mr. MARKHAM. Both.

Chairman WALSH. How many agencies did you have of that sort?

Mr. MARKHAM. Half a dozen at least.

Chairman WALSH. What were the names of the companies with which you dealt?

Mr. MARKHAM. I can not call them off; one was the Pinkerton Agency, for example; another was the Hannon. I can not give you the names of those agencies; however, I can get them for you.

(See Markham Exhibit Nos. 1 and 2.)

Chairman WALSH. Give all you can think of now.

Mr. MARKHAM. I can only recall those two.

Chairman WALSH. What officers of the Pinkerton Agency did you deal with?

Mr. MARKHAM. I did not deal with them at all; it was dealt with by our general manager in Chicago. I think Mr. Foley handled that; the assistant general manager.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall the names of any other of those agencies?

Mr. MARKHAM. No. Mr. Chairman, I want to make it just as easy as I can for the commission in getting detailed information. We took advantage of all of these agencies, wherever they were in the country, and got the men wherever we could, and we paid sometimes more and sometimes less for the service. It was a question of getting the men, regardless of what it cost; we did not consider that. It was to get the men; that was the first consideration.

Chairman WALSH. Did you use the O'Brien Agency?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not recall.

Chairman WALSH. Did you use the Turner Agency?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not recall.

Chairman WALSH. You will submit the names of those?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

(See Markham Exhibits Nos. 1 and 2.)

Chairman WALSH. Now, what official of your company made application direct to the agency to furnish the men?

Mr. MARKHAM. I presume Mr. Foley, the assistant general manager, did it; it was under his jurisdiction.

Chairman WALSH. What proportion of the membership of the crafts unions affected left your employ—what percentage of the men?

Mr. MARKHAM. Pretty close to 100 per cent, sir; I do not think there were very many left. You must remember that a large number that went out were influenced very largely by the instructions the men gave them. They did not think it was a real thing. They were not prepared to go out. They did not go out with the understanding that they were going on a prolonged strike. They were told as a general thing that it would be just on for a time, and then the men would go back to work. For instance, at Water Valley, shortly after the strike was called, a wife of one striker was overheard talking to another woman, telling that her husband said it would be over in a short time and the company would be after them to come back to work, but that it did not look like the men were going to be called back, but that they would be going and asking the company to take them back. I just recite that as illustrating the fact that they didn't understand what they were going into. They didn't know a strike was being called. They had not been given any opportunity to vote on a real strike. The strike went on on the 25th of September—the 30th of September—while the strike vote was to be returned on October 10; just a mad scramble. No one knew what they were doing.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will take a recess until 2 o'clock. Kindly return at that time, Mr. Markham.

(At 12.30, April 7, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock in the afternoon.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. We may proceed now, Mr. Markham.

Prior to the strike, did the company recognize the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Why not; for any other reason except that which you have given—that they were so intimately connected with the officials?

Mr. MARKHAM. That was the principal reason.

Chairman WALSH. Were there any other reasons?

Mr. MARKHAM. I have tried to give in my statement, Mr. Walsh, all of the reasons that governed us in that respect; and I would be glad to read again from the statement.

Chairman WALSH. No. As I look back over it that is all I recollect, and, of course, the commission is gathering a good deal by the oral testimony, as you notice.

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And I just wanted to freshen up on it a little. Was there any other reason?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; the principal reason was the confidential relations that existed between the clerks and the officers and management of the railway.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that the payments of wages to railway clerks have not increased in proportion as have the wages, for instance, of railway conductors and enginemen for the past couple of decades?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think that is true.

Chairman WALSH. It has been submitted here that it is a common thing for clerks, as they grow older, to be reduced in position and in compensation until, when they approach old age, they are, in many instances, unable to make a living.

Mr. MARKHAM. I know of no such condition obtaining on the Illinois Central.

Chairman WALSH. Would you give the rate of pay—what you might call the typical rates of pay of clerks?

Mr. MARKHAM. I could not give it from memory. I could give it from our record, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that the payment of compensation to rate clerks, for instance—those are rather high-class clerks—and revising clerks—

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; those are high-class men.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that the rate of pay of rate clerks has constantly fallen during the last 20 years—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). No; on the contrary, I should say, they have risen during that time.

Chairman WALSH. What does a rate clerk get now?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. What did he get 20 years ago?

Mr. MARKHAM. I don't know. I am dealing only with general terms. My impression is, from discussions had with officers of the company about the difficulty of obtaining good men for rate clerks, that wages have risen. I can get the information for you, however, if you desire it.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would, please, on that particular class of clerks.

Mr. MARKHAM. How long a range?

Chairman WALSH. Well, I would like to get it, Mr. Markham—pick us out, for instance, the clerks that joined the association—for instance, did the yard clerks and did the bill clerks join it?

Mr. MARKHAM. Probably all the clerks in the employ of the company at certain stations in the South.

Chairman WALSH. Well, take the bill clerks, the yard clerks in the local departments, and then take those that have existed in some departments for quite a length of time, like journal clerks, ledger clerks, revising clerks, extension clerks—enough so that we can get a typical situation from which we can make deductions so that we may ascertain whether the tendency has been upward or downward.

Mr. MARKHAM. You want that over what range, say?

Chairman WALSH. Say, pick out a period extending back over 20 years—what it is to-day, and 5 years ago, and in periods of 5 years.

Mr. MARKHAM. Very well, I will do that.

(See Markham Exhibit No. 1.)

Chairman WALSH. Were the general office clerks, as a rule, in this case in this organization?

Mr. MARKHAM. I don't know of any general office clerks being in this particular organization, but I understand they are eligible, however.

Chairman WALSH. What are the clerks that are in the local office—bill clerks and yard clerks and check clerks and what else?

Mr. MARKHAM. Why, in the local offices there are the clerks employed in the making of waybills, making of expense bills, and making of the various entries covering the receipts and forwarding of cars, and all that sort of thing.

Chairman WALSH. Of course, these others I have spoken of—the revising clerks, rate clerks, etc., are general office clerks?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; not necessarily. Those are clerks employed at the more important stations. At a one-man station he may do all the work—revise the waybills, and make his own expense bills, and take care of his own cashbook, and make all the entries of his station; but at a station that is larger it may require different men for each branch of the work.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please indicate again—you probably have in your statement, but I did not catch it—what was the first violence in this strike—the first act of violence?

Mr. MARKHAM. The first prominent act, I should say, was the interference with our operations at McComb, Miss.; and Water Valley; that is, after the principal strike was called. We had acts of violence at Mounds when the incipient strike of the 25th was called, and at various places. There were so many of them and they covered such a vast, large scope of territory that it would be impossible for me to segregate the particular thing, or any particular time.

Chairman WALSH. Or the first one?

Mr. MARKHAM. Or the first one.

Chairman WALSH. You mentioned something about newspaper comment. What steps, if any, did the company take in regard to publicity? Did it have an organized department to get out publicity?

Mr. MARKHAM. Why, it had a department that I undertook to run personally, sir; and following very closely upon the calling of the strike we prepared this pamphlet [indicating] giving the facts about the strike, dated October 12, 1911. Now, this pamphlet was circulated all along our line of road, and the principal statements contained in it were printed in all of the prominent papers, beginning at Chicago and ending at New Orleans.

Chairman WALSH. Was any payment made to the newspapers?

Mr. MARKHAM. Oh, decidedly, at regular advertising rates; used pages; and we went to a very considerable extent to get all the facts about the strike before the people, and we were willing to pay for it.

Chairman WALSH. And those same papers that made the editorial comment you have mentioned?

Mr. MARKHAM. I will say absolutely no. We made no connection between the advertising end and the editorial end—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). No; but they were some of these papers?

Mr. MARKHAM. These papers probably; but I can not say. I can not even now name the papers we made arrangements with, but just our papers all along the line.

Chairman WALSH. What was the total amount of expense incurred by the company in regard to newspapers, during the strike, in paying for advertisements?

Mr. MARKHAM. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it?

Mr. MARKHAM. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Give any idea whatsoever?

Mr. MARKHAM. No. I could by reference—

Chairman WALSH. Will you please give us that?

Mr. MARKHAM. I will be very glad to.

(Witness subsequently furnished the amount as $3,196.65. See Markham Exhibit No. 1.)

Chairman WALSH. You say you handled that for the company yourself?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; that is, I handled the preparation of the matter and then directed that arrangements be made with the various newspapers to print it for us.

Chairman WALSH. Did the strike require the assignment of additional attorneys?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think not. We may have, in some cases where we were asking for injunctions—we may have secured the services of additional attorneys, but I don't recall now that there were any such cases.

Chairman WALSH. Were there requests made by any of the following organizations upon your company, asking you to arbitrate the differences between yourselves and the employees: The Cotton Exchange of New Orleans, the Commercial Club of Memphis, the Federal Department of Labor, or the National Civic Federation?

Mr. MARKHAM. It was suggested by a member of the National Civic Federation that the good offices of the members of that federation might be offered to the Harriman lines and the Illinois Central with a view of bringing about an arbitration. I had a conversation with Mr. Low in New York.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Seth Low?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; and I think I succeeded in convincing him that more harm than good would come from any attempt to settle the matter in that way. I think I convinced him that quite a large principle was involved that had to be disposed of, and that anything that you might call outside interference would result in more harm than good.

Chairman WALSH. Was any request made by the Cotton Exchange of New Orleans?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not recall that. Just a moment, there was an informal request from a man who was at that time president of the exchange. On one of my trips to New Orleans he came to see me, saying that if he could do anything to bring about a settlement of this trouble, which was of interest to the people of New Orleans, he would be glad to do it, and I think I convinced him that more trouble and harm would come from any outside interference of that kind than good.

Chairman WALSH. How about the Commercial Club of Memphis?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not recall about that.

Chairman WALSH. Did the governor of Mississippi try to do anything in that respect?

Mr. MARKHAM. Gov. Brewer of Mississippi did take considerable interest in the matter at one time, but the question as to whether we would agree to arbitrate this question was never put to us by the governor. He had a conference in his office with a number of the leaders of the organization, but nothing came of it. There was some question on their part as to whether they would confer, and the question was dropped.

Chairman WALSH. Was there anything from the Department of Labor at Washington?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not until some six or eight months ago, when two representatives of the Department of Labor came to see me to discuss the question of the strike, and more particularly to discuss the question of permitting the return to our employ of a large number of men who were still out. They were told—I said to them what I have said repeatedly to every commercial organization or to anyone who attempted to take an interest in the situation of those men, that we had no grievance against the men who went out on this strike, but followed an unusual practice in dealing with them. We never had closed the doors to the men that went out, but left the door open, unless they had been engaged in actual acts of violence or destruction of property. The fact that a man went out on strike did not disqualify him for future employment by our company unless, as I say, he might have engaged in some act of violence or destruction of property; and that situation exists to-day. I said to the men at that time that if they made application for employment we would give them the preference unless they had been guilty of some act of violence or destruction of property.

Chairman WALSH. What arrangements did the company make for housing those men brought in to take the places of the men on strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. We built commissaries, stockades around the different shop plants, and put up building to take care of them, and fed them and arranged for their sleeping.

Chairman WALSH. When were the stockades built with reference to the calling of the strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. Some time afterwards.

Chairman WALSH. How long afterwards?

Mr. MARKHAM. A matter of 10 days after the beginning of the strike, and some 5 days at McComb, where the strike condition was bad—on the fourth or fifth day.

Chairman WALSH. Was anything done to inquire into the character of the men so employed?

Mr. MARKHAM. No, sir; we had to operate the road and had to take such men as we could get.

Chairman WALSH. You mentioned the commissary; what was the commissary?

Mr. MARKHAM. A place to feed the men.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe how it was operated.

Mr. MARKHAM. We had a regular organization; we put men in charge to look after it just as you would a small hotel; to provide sleeping quarters and to provide arrangements for the men eating, and that sort of thing. In some cases we made provision for the sale of tobacco to them, and overalls, and such things as that that the men would need that could not go to town for them.

Chairman WALSH. How was a charge made to the men?

Mr. MARKHAM. To start with, we furnished them with these facilities in addition to their regular pay.

Chairman WALSH. For how long?

Mr. MARKHAM. The last of the commissaries was closed out in 5 months, and some in 60 and 90 days.

Chairman WALSH. As to the wages paid to the men who were brought in, how did they compare with the wages paid theretofore?

Mr. MARKHAM. Exactly the same wages.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any exchange of employees between the Illinois Central and the Harriman lines during the strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. You understand what I mean?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; I understand perfectly.

Chairman WALSH. In cases of prosecution, public prosecutions for alleged infractions of the law, were your attorneys furnished to prosecute the men?

Mr. MARKHAM. I can not answer that question; I do not know of my own knowledge whether they were or not. We did what we could to assist in the prosecution of those engaged in acts of violence or destruction of our property. I do not know whether our attorneys appeared in court in connection with the prosecutions. Of course, our attorneys got up—made the case; they got up the information and made the complaint, and all that sort of thing.

Chairman WALSH. But whether they participated in the trials, you do not know?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; I can not answer that.

Chairman WALSH. Who selected the newspapers through which the advertising was done, this page advertising?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think I did in this general way, that I told them to select, for example, all of the Chicago papers, all of the New Orleans and Louisville papers; I do not think there was any discrimination in the large towns; we took all the papers.

Chairman WALSH. Were there country papers that carried these advertisements also?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think very few papers in the smaller towns; perhaps in Jackson, Tenn., and Jackson, Miss.

Chairman WALSH. Did any of the papers in these localities adopt an editorial policy that was inimical to the company in the strike, or in favor of the strikers?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not recall any; the general sentiment was very favorable to the company.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall any paper at all that took the side of the strikers editorially?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; unless it was some paper edited and managed by the strikers; there was one or two of that kind.

Chairman WALSH. Did the officials of the company recognize the fact that there would be a strike in case a conference was refused with the federated committee?

Mr. MARKHAM. We never believed they would go that far. We thought our cause was so just that it would prevail, and when the proper time comes I would like to read into the record circulars that were sent out to our employees dealing with a probable strike on August 24, and again on September 30, when it was called.

Chairman WALSH. Perhaps this might be as good a place to read it in as any.

Mr. MARKHAM (reading):

"CHICAGO, ILL., August 24, 1911.

"To All Employees:

"This circular is issued for the purpose of acquainting the employees and the public with the demands made upon these companies by the officers of the 'Federation of Railway Employees of the Illinois Central System'"—

This circular was issued some 30 days before the calling of the strike (Reading:)

"In which they claim to be authorized to make a new contract with these companies covering all employees in the mechanical department and with those employed indiscriminately in other departments.

"The fact is ignored that the principal crafts already have contracts with these companies, signed by their authorized representatives, and that these crafts have not given the formal notice, as stipulated therein, that they wish to cancel or change the agreements now in force. The management is observing these contracts in the utmost good faith and expect the employees parties thereto to do likewise. If they desire that they shall be revoked or modified or conference arranged looking to the handling of matters between the company and its employees differently than at present, it must be taken up in the regular manner as has been the practice heretofore.

"Should this management violate the existing contracts by reducing wages or changing working conditions without giving the 30-day notice they would be accused of acting in bad faith, and justly so. The clause in the machinists' agreement reads as follows:

"These rules shall be in force October 8, 1909, and thereafter: Provided, That after 30 days changes may be agreed upon by either party giving 30 days' notice to the other of changes desired for conference."

"In the contract with the boiler makers and blacksmiths and all the other principal crafts this clause reads as follows:

"The rules and rates as shown herein to become effective May 1, 1910, and remain in force until May 1, 1911, and thereafter: Provided, That after the first year changes may be agreed upon by either party giving 30 days' notice to the other of changes desired for conference."

"The officials of the so-called federation have not denied the existence of these contracts or the fairness of our position, nor have they gone about this modification or abrogation in the formal and proper way. On the contrary, they have called mass meetings in certain localities which have naturally been attended by those who are in sympathy, and from such source would undoubtedly obtain a majority of those present in favor of forcing the company into a position which must result in great harm to itself and its employees."

You will notice, Mr. Chairman, this circular was issued after this correspondence that has been referred to this morning. [Reading:]

"It is the hope and wish of the management to retain the present relations with its employees and to continue to better their condition. If, however, it is placed in a position where it must violate its contracts, made in good faith with employees constitutionally authorized to make such contracts; or choose the alternative, there is left open only one course.

9738 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

"The management makes the foregoing explanation through a sense of duty to its employees, the owners of the property, and last, but by no means least, to the shippers and traveling public who are dependent upon the Illinois Central for transportation facilities.

"To indicate the radical demands made and the inconsistency in many respects thereof, it is only necessary to summarize a few of those submitted.

" SUMMARY OF DEMANDS.

"1. Demand that 'not more than eight hours shall constitute a day's work,' except Saturdays, when they shall work seven (7) hours, and be paid for eight (8).

"Nine hours is now the standard working day on the Illinois Central system, except for car men, whose agreement calls for 10 hours. It is also the standard on all railroads.

"2. Demand 'an advance of 5 cents an hour for hourly men' and proportionate advance for monthly men.

"The Illinois Central increased the pay of its shopmen last year, and they now receive as high or higher wages than those of competing roads. The increase demanded varying from 12 per cent to 35 per cent, according to each man's present rate, would amount to more than $2,000,000 per annum.

"3. Demand 'double time after 12 o'clock midnight for daymen, and after 12 o'clock midday for nightmen.'

"Time and one-half is now allowed for overtime, also for Sundays and holidays, with other special allowances, which make Illinois Central rates more liberal than those of most other roads.

"4. Demand that all crafts shall have 'uniform hours for commencing and quitting work,' which shall be the same hours for all.

"This would leave all shops, roundhouses, and terminal yards without a working force for a third of the time, or compel the company to pay time and one-half or double time for work done outside of 'regular' hours. The railroad must run day and night to accommodate the public.

"5. Demand that men 'sent out on the road for any cause shall receive time and one-half from the time called until they return, and not less than $1.50 per day for expenses.'

"Now receive straight time during regular shop-working hours, and time and one-half for overtime hours, with $1.25 a day for expenses. This would compel the company to pay men time and a half while waiting for trains or riding on trains, either day or night.

"6. Demand that 'when reducing expenses in shops and round houses the full force of men will be retained and reductions made in hours until the hours shall have reached 40 hours per week. Any further reductions will be made by shutting down the shops.'

"This prohibits the railroad company from at any time reducing the force, regardless of decreases in business or changes in operating conditions.

"7. Demand that 'all reductions in hours and shutdowns will be universal at all points on the system.'

"This regardless of local increases or decreases in business or any other variation in conditions. Operating in 14 States, business fluctuates to a considerable extent, dependent upon crops and other conditions. The forces of the company must necessarily be arranged accordingly.

"8. Demand that 'applicants for employment shall only be required to give name of position wanted and address of nearest relative.'

"This would prevent the employing foreman or master mechanic from asking an applicant for work as to his ability, character, habits, or experience, or otherwise informing himself relative thereto. This would deprive the company and also its employees of any protection against disreputable and incompetent men getting into the service.

"9. Demand that in filling vacant positions as foreman or gang boss 'seniority to govern.'

"This would compel the company to promote and put in charge of its work and properties the man who, by reason of seniority, is longest in the service, regardless of his ability, age, experience, habits, or capacity for increased responsibility. This method would be contrary to the first principles of efficient and economical management, and the railroad company could not excuse or defend it as efficient management.

"Many other radical demands are made, all tending toward inefficiency of service and increasing cost of operation.

"During the past year the company has increased the pay of its mechanical forces $428,188 per annum."

I want to impress this upon the commission that during the year preceding this demand made upon us we increased in the pay $428,000. [Continues reading:]

"It has increased the pay of its employees in all departments $1,744,350.

"Having in mind the welfare of its employees, the company during the past year has appropriated large sums for the improvement of sanitary conditions at the respective shops and grounds. It has also in other ways provided for the betterment of its employees and expects to continue such policy.

"The managing officials must continue, as heretofore, to pass on all matters relating to the proper and efficient conduct of the property. To put this into the hands of its employees under a federation of many classes would not properly safeguard the interests of its stockholders, the public, or the employees themselves."

That is the circular sent out to the employees.

Chairman WALSH. What is the date of that, please?

Mr. MARKHAM. August 24, 1911.

When the strike was called another circular of about the same import was issued. I will only read a part. I won't read the part that is a duplicate of what I have just read. [Reading:]

"CHICAGO, ILL., September 30, 1911.

"To all employees:

"This circular is issued for the purpose of acquainting the employees and the public with the causes leading up to a strike of certain classes of employees in our mechanical department.

"For many years we have had contracts with these organizations, made in conferences with their representatives, mutually agreed to and satisfactory in all of their terms. No change in the working conditions or rates of pay have been made except upon the filing of agreed notice of a desire for a conference to make such changes. The representatives and business agents have always been met with courtesy and full consideration has been given to their requests for changes in rates of pay or working conditions. The best evidence of this is that during the past year the company has made increases in the pay of its mechanical forces amounting to $428,188 per annum.

"On June 21, 1911, we received a request from a so-called Illinois Central and Allied Lines Federation for a conference and submitting therewith a proposed agreement, of which the following is a summary.

I give the summary as read in the preceding document. [Continues reading:]

"Upon our refusal to meet the officers of the federation, we were asked to meet and did meet the various officers of the different crafts with which we had agreements. They were advised that we felt compelled to consider the existing contracts in full force and effect until canceled in the manner provided therein, just as they would have insisted on our doing had the conditions been reversed.

"Following the conference, the international officers took the whole matter out of the hands of the officers of the federation and finally decided to resubmit the question of striking to the members of the different crafts. The members were asked to take into consideration the fact that existing contracts had not been abrogated in the manner provided therein, and were given until October 10 to record their votes. It is well known that the international officers of at least some of the crafts supported our position and bitterly opposed violating their contracts by consenting to call a strike on the Illinois Central. The conservatives seem, however, to be in the minority, and the result is one of the most uncalled for walkouts of labor in the history of this country. The shopmen at Memphis and New Orleans quit their work in defiance of the instructions of the same grand officers responsible for calling a general strike.

"The Illinois Central has not sought this controversy and has no quarrel with organized labor as such, but it will use all the resources at its command to retain such control of the management as will enable it to continue the exercise of public functions, for which it was created, and which subsequent events have shown it could not have continued to exercise had the management consented to enter into negotiations with the organization which is primarily responsible for this trouble."

Chairman WALSH. Did the officials of the company confer regarding their policy toward the duly organized federation with the officials of any other railroad company?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not recall.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have correspondence with them, with the officials of any other railway company?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not that I recall; I wouldn't say.

Chairman WALSH. Did you confer, any of you—yourself, or any of the officials—confer regarding this policy with the General Managers' Association of Western Railroads?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not so far as I have knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Or with officials of the association?

Mr. MARKHAM. Mr. Chairman, it is a lone fight. We fought the battle alone. We received no help from any source, from the railroads. I am sorry to say that most of them were standing by ready to take up the business that left us because of the trouble we had in handling the business as a result of this strike.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to ask you if it is not a fact, Mr. Markham, that at the time this strike was called there were 31 railways that were dealing with the federated unions organized on this plan?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not know that, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And I was further requested to ask you if it is not a fact that at the present time there are 52 railways that are dealing with the federated unions organized upon this same general plan?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not know it to be a fact; no, sir. May I add to that, however, if it is a fact, and it keeps on going, they will be sorry they have ever done it. That is a thing that we have been trying to avoid throughout this whole contest—was putting the railroads in this country where through the power that would be given the leaders of this organization—power not only over the railroads of the country, but over all of the other industries of the country—that it would be a detriment to the commerce of the country.

Chairman WALSH. Can you estimate approximately the amount that has been expended—that this strike has cost your company?

Mr. MARKHAM. Several millions of dollars. I could not attempt to say how much, because the year following the strike was rather a poor year anyway, and the earnings dropped off.

Chairman WALSH. The direct expense was approximately how much—the hiring of guards, the payment for commissaries, and the erection of stockades, those that might be called local expenses, mentioning nothing of any falling off in the traffic, or anything of that sort?

Mr. MARKHAM. I have never made any figures, and any statement that I would make would only be the wildest kind of guess. I would not undertake to do it; no.

Chairman WALSH. Has the company—is there any official of the company who has figured out the cost of this?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Per year?

Mr. MARKHAM. We made up our mind, sir, that it was a question that had to be fought out, regardless of the cost.

Chairman WALSH. I take it, from what you say, that nothing has occurred since, either in the strike itself or in any experience that you have had, that has caused you to change your mind as to the wisdom and desirability of the policy which you read from your paper.

Mr. MARKHAM. I am more strongly confirmed in it than ever, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell has a few questions he would like to ask.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Has the company dealt with transportation organizations in combination of any kind?

Mr. MARKHAM. We have not been asked to.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have not been asked to?

Mr. MARKHAM. No. We are dealing now through the General Managers' Association with the enginemen collectively, the firemen and engineers; but we have not been asked to deal with collective organizations of the train and enginemen. That was the purpose of your question, Mr. O'Connell?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. With the Order of Railway Conductors and Brotherhood of Trainmen at the present time, under a joint agreement?

Mr. MARKHAM. I am not so sure about the practical effect, whether the general manager meets them together or not. I think Mr. Garretson knows and could answer that question better than I can. It is a detail I do not get into. But we have not met the four organizations collectively, have not been asked to, the question has not been raised on our system.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Or in the past; do you know of meeting the engineers and the firemen?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not know that we have ever met the engineers and firemen together, sir. They are acting together in this application for wage increase.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I know they are.

Mr. MARKHAM. But I do not understand they are acting together individually with respect to other agreements with individual roads.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the past you do not know of the I. C. having dealt in that manner?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not know. I do not think we have. We have separate agreements, you understand, with all of these different organizations—the conductors, the trainmen, the enginemen, and the firemen.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The question is, however, that you have dealt with the engineers and firemen; met them at one time?

Mr. MARKHAM. Met with them?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that the same has taken place in the meeting in the order of conductors and the others?

Mr. MARKHAM. I would like to make an explanation. It is not the same condition. To do that there would be a meeting of these other crafts.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Under the same condition?

Mr. MARKHAM. Under the same condition; no. I tried to make that plain in my paper.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just briefly state why. I do not quite catch the reason.

Mr. MARKHAM. Mr. O'Connell, take the organization of machinists, for example; I would not undertake to state who they are. I do not know them. They are represented—the machinists employed in industries other than the railroad industry—and there is not the same community of interest between the machinists' organization—the members of the machinists' organization and other organizations working in the train service. The firemen and the enginemen and the conductors are all working together, and they have a community of interest. You are dealing with questions pertaining to their work, and then you are dealing with questions that are more or less common to the four organizations. But when you are dealing with the organization of machinists and the blacksmiths and all of these organizations, you are dealing with men who have interests outside of the railroad. It is a different question entirely. You never know when you are going to get mixed up in an industrial fight. Just as in the old A. R. U. trouble they had, and the trouble in Ireland, about four years ago, that I referred to in my paper, where there was a strike on some timberwork, and where the men belonged to the same organization—a strike was called on the railroads because they were hauling a product of this plant. We do not think there is a community of interest between the men who are employed on the railroad and the men who are employed in the outside industries. There is not the proper community of interest between the men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Isn't there considerable expense in the matter of shopmen having committees, meeting the officials of the company, and taking up these several questions separately, incurring a great expense necessary to bring the men together, that could be avoided if they acted collectively?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; but it may cost so much more in other directions. You might save at the spigot and lose at the bung hole in that case. Our contention is that the greater loss and the smaller saving in the expense of committees, of time lost by the workmen or by the railroad company itself, would be so small that it would be infinitesimal when taken into consideration with the greater losses that would follow through the combination of these forces that I have spoken of.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I take it, from the documents you read into the record, your fear of the combination becoming so strong and powerful was that it would have an influence not in the best interest of society in general?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That by the combination they would become extraordinarily strong, as it were?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Wouldn't it be rather a strong argument in favor of organization—a combination of that kind—of the men?

Mr. MARKHAM. The trouble with it would be too much power in the hands of too few men, and the question is whether they would exercise it wisely or not. Power never has been exercised wisely, too much in the hands of any one man or set of men, in the past, and I doubt if it will ever be. It will be just as injurious in the hands of the labor leaders as in the hands of the capitalists.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So the real cause of your opposition to meeting the men as a combination prior to the time the strike occurred or after was that they had not given what you considered the 30 days' notice in accordance with the agreement of the men, or of this fear of this combination?

Mr. MARKHAM. The real cause was the fear of the combination. And we justified our refusal to these men by putting before them the fact they had not given the 30 days' notice, and demanded that they live up to their contract, just as they expected us to do. If you want me to be frank, the real cause was the fear of putting too much power into the hands of men who would not use it wisely.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understood you quoted me in your document that you read—that paper?

Mr. MARKHAM. May I further amplify that by saying, too, Mr. O'Connell, we have always felt that if we had been given the opportunity to sit across the table with the leaders of these different organizations by themselves, with the representatives from the different points on the line, discussing this question of the system federation, that we would have talked them out of it. We wanted that opportunity, and we were not given it. We were entitled to that opportunity.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Wasn't it the general impression of the men and the leaders of these organizations that they had at least technically given 30 days' notice?

Mr. MARKHAM. It was claimed so; but I did not believe it, nor do I think you believed it at that time. You went on record as not believing it. I don't think Mr. Condon did. I think some of the men I talked to—I am not sure but what one of the gentlemen is here that I met in conference—that I had in conference some 30 days before the strike was called. Those gentlemen did not urge that question on me very strongly, but simply claimed that we were taking advantage of a technicality, and that we knew of it through some other sources. But, I said, "We want you to tell us, in accordance with the contract. Here is a contract, and we want you to live up to it, and we don't want notices given through somebody else. We want it from the men who are acting under that notice. You may come back and repudiate it and say, 'We did not give it to you.'" We were insisting throughout that they live up to their contracts, just the same as they expected us to do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, this is supposition, of course. But if they had given 30 days' notice, in accordance with the requirements of their contracts, and then had asked to meet your company jointly, that difficulty being cleared away, what would then have been the position of your company?

Mr. MARKHAM. I would then have been still of the same opinion as at that time, that it would have been an unwise thing to have done. I don't think I would have done it; but it is pretty hard to tell.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So that really the failure to give 30 days' notice was not the cause of the break between you? That would not have avoided it if both sides—

Mr. MARKHAM. Well, I am not so sure about that. It would have depended on conditions at the time. A good many things might have happened between that time and the giving of the notice and the time of the calling of the strike. You must remember that this strike was called before the final vote was taken. The company had no reason to expect a strike would be called at that time. It had a right to believe that the vote would be taken as instructed by the heads of the organizations at the time, and that then, after the vote had been taken, then notice would be served on the company and it would be given opportunity to say what it wanted to do; but it was not given that opportunity, and the strike was just as much of a surprise to the company as it was to a great many of the men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the employment of men to take the places of those who went on the strike, were bonuses or rewards of any kind given or promised?

Mr. MARKHAM. To the individual men?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes.

Mr. MARKHAM. No. They were given some bonuses in the way of free commissary services, as testified a few moments ago; paid the regular wages, and, for a time, were given the free commissary services.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were any promises made of rewards if the men would stay a certain time in the employment of the company—say, six months or a year?

Mr. MARKHAM. No, no; absolutely not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were the agents that were employing these men, so far as you know, or have you heard, whether they made promises of any kind to the men that if they stayed in the service a certain length of time they would receive a bonus?

Mr. MARKHAM. Each man was required to sign a contract—an application for employment that set forth the conditions of employment, and whether anything was promised outside of that by the labor-employment agents or other men of course I have no means of knowing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you a copy of that contract with you?

Mr. MARKHAM. I have; yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Will you just put that in the record?

Mr. MARKHAM. I was looking for it, and will be glad to file it with the commission.

(Witness submitted application blank referred to. It appears at the end of this subject, marked "Markham Exhibit No. 3.")

Commissioner O'CONNELL. This is the point—one of the points—that I have in mind in this contract: It says [reads]: "As a condition to receiving any wages I agree to continue at least 30 days in such employment unless sooner discharged by the company, and no wages are to be payable to me if I voluntarily leave my employment within that period."

Mr. MARKHAM. You see, we were furnishing these men free transportation, paying out a good deal of money for transportation and getting them in New York, for example, and paying, for example, the Pennsylvania or the Erie $18 or $20 apiece to get them to Chicago, and we wanted some assurance and some guaranty that they were going to remain in our employ a certain length of time after we got them. If you please, that may have been a bonus. If it was, it was a necessary one. We were not in a position to choose. We had to fill the places of some 9,000 men, and we had to get them wherever we could.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. This reads further [reading]: "And no wages are to be payable to me if I voluntarily leave my employment within that period."

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, suppose an employee's transportation was only $5 or $10, and he earned $100 in a month. You say you would not—

Mr. MARKHAM. (Interrupting). Oh, no; we would have treated him fairly, as we always do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Under this contract he would not have the right to ask for it?

Mr. MARKHAM. Probably not; but he would have been treated fairly. In many cases we paid the money for the time occupied in coming under contract, and then sent them back to their homes because claims were made that the conditions had been misrepresented to them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were the employment agents instructed to notify those seeking employment that there was a strike on the road?

Mr. MARKHAM. They were. I think you will find that document has that provision in it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Has there been published in some of the reports, or the annual reports of the company, the statement, I take it, of yourself to the board of directors, or of the board of directors to the stockholders, quoting, in your annual reports, the cost of the strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not recall of our making any such figure. The increase in expenses and some reductions in earnings were accounted for by reason of the conditions following the strike; but I know of no attempt having been made to determine the exact cost of it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Has the strike been adjusted? Is it still on?

Mr. MARKHAM. I believe it is still on. We do not hear of it any more, sir—have not for a long time. If you mean, it has never been called off, Mr. O'Connell, it has never been called off.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I mean, there has never been any settlement?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are there not a number of directors on the so-called Harriman lines—the Union Pacific, the Southern Pacific, etc.—who are also directors of the Illinois Central?

Mr. MARKHAM. Why, I think at the time of the strike there were two or three common directors.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Wasn't it commonly rumored or understood at least that there were personal representatives of Mr. Harriman on the directorate of the Illinois Central?

Mr. MARKHAM. Well, you know, the Union Pacific owns a very large block of stock in the Illinois Central and has a representation on the board. There is no question about that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And they are very closely associated, at least in a financial way?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; they have common directors, but there is no relation between the companies, financial or otherwise. The Illinois Central is operated entirely separately from the Union Pacific, and the finances are handled entirely separate. There is no connection at all in their operation, and it conducts its business and handles its finances just as separately as the Union Pacific and the Atchison or the Union Pacific and the North Western or any other line.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the handling of the business, I take it, the Illinois Central would, where it was just as convenient, at least, direct or exchange its business with the Harriman lines in preference to some other line?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes. Yes; surely, but—

Commissioner O'CONNELL (interrupting). You would send freight over the Harriman lines, preferably to the Santa Fe, to San Francisco?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; but the situation is such that it is to its interest to do it. The Illinois Central runs out to Omaha and connects there with the Union Pacific. Handling the business with the Union Pacific gives the Illinois Central the long haul. In the case of the Southern Pacific, at the time that the two lines were operating by the same management, we connected with them at New Orleans and got the long haul by taking the business to New Orleans and delivering it to the Southern Pacific for certain territory. It was to the interest of the Illinois Central to do it; and then, besides, there was this friendly interest that grows out of this relation—out of the ownership of a large block of the Illinois Central stock by the Union Pacific. But that is not reciprocal. It happens to be to the interest of the Union Pacific to deal more favorably with some of the other lines than with the Illinois Central. I am looking at you, Mr. Atchison [smiling].

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understood you, of course, that you never had any association or conferences or correspondence that you recall with the officials of the Union Pacific or of the Southern Pacific with regard to the causes of the strike on the Harriman lines proper?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; I know very little about them, sir. Our hands were so full, sir, at the time that we did not have time to consider anything but our troubles. We let them take care of their own.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were your relations with the shopmen under their contractual relations perfectly harmonious up to the time the strike occurred?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL (continuing). In times gone by?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think as harmonious as those of any other railroad.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask you a few questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You stated a moment ago, Mr. Markham, that the real underlying reason of the attitude of your company was the fear of placing power in the hands of a few men?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it your opinion that it is more dangerous to place the power of representing the employees of a corporation like your own in the hands of a few men than it is to place the handling of a property in the hands of one or two or three men?

Mr. MARKHAM. Most decidedly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. For what reason?

Mr. MARKHAM. For the reason that you have more power. You can exercise your power in so many different directions. If you please, if I might answer the question fully, I would say that if you were to give me control of all the railways of the United States to-day there would be some limitations on the powers that I could exercise—limits placed on the exercise of powers by law, by custom, by usage, by everything—the laws of society. But if you place me in the attitude or position of a labor leader with absolute control, so far as any one man can enjoy such control, it would be more dangerous, because I could exercise that power in an entirely different way. I would not be answerable to the same laws, the same regulations, the same conditions, as the man who exercised power as the owner or controller of the property.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is the man who represents labor of a weaker moral fiber or more of a lawbreaker than the man that represents a corporation?

Mr. MARKHAM. I don't think so as a rule, sir; but he is not answerable to the same tribunals as the other man is.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Whether he is answerable to the same tribunals, is he not answerable to the same moral tribunals?

Mr. MARKHAM. They ought to answer to the same; ought to be no difference.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, do they?

Mr. MARKHAM. I am afraid not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In your opinion, which would suffer the most if they did answer to the same tribunals?

Mr. MARKHAM. That is too purely a hypothetical question for me to try to answer.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You don't mean that the morals are hypothetical? According to the testimony that has been given before this commission by all the representatives of all the great financial groups of the country the average man handling an industrial corporation or transportation corporation is absolutely unhampered by his board of directors. He is absolute. Is there, in your opinion, a greater incentive for a man who stood as the representative of the labor men on a property like this to administer that power less intelligently and less honestly than the other man?

Mr. MARKHAM. That would depend upon the man so much. It would depend upon the various processes by which he reached that particular position which he occupies. There is a great deal of theory in answering that question, too.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It is a little like the porter testified yesterday; it depends on the man?

Mr. MARKHAM. It depends on the man; yes. Now, let's take—since you are discussing that question and we are sitting around a table, as it were—let's take my own case. You know something of my history—of how I came up to the—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). Yes.

Mr. MARKHAM (continuing). To the Illinois Central. I think you know that I have not forgotten yet how to talk the language of the men still in the ranks. Now, I have the same sympathetic feeling toward the men occupying the subordinate positions that I ever had and the same desire to have pleasant relations. But my attitude toward the men—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). Well, but are you less honest or more honest than when you shoveled coal on the dock at Tucson?

Mr. MARKHAM. I don't think I have changed much. I think I have kept my principles the same now as then.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, if two men started on the same basis from that same point and one traveled up through labor unionism and the other up in the corporation service, what agencies would tend to make one man less dependable?

Mr. MARKHAM. Why, it would depend again on the man. There is no answer to a question like that. It is like the question, Is it a good thing to send a boy to college?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Take your personal illustration of a moment ago. Had you got turned into the other channel, would you have been less dependable as the officer of a labor union than you are as the president of a railway company?

Mr. MARKHAM. I would have been less dependable for the reason that my responsibilities would have been different, perhaps. It depends on whom you hold him responsible to.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Isn't that a hypothetical question, whom you hold them to?

Mr. MARKHAM. Perhaps—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). Are your responsibilities greater to stockholders than they are to a man who places simply his trusts and interests in your hands?

Mr. MARKHAM. But, my dear sir, our responsibilities are not confined to responsibilities to the stockholder. We serve at least quasi-public institutions when we serve the railroads of this country, and we have a duty to the public and a duty to all the people. Why, on the Illinois Central Railroad, we have fifty or sixty thousand employees. So it is not a fact that we have not just as much interest in those men on a good many considerations as our stockholders, and the owners of the property; and there is the question of service to the public and giving good service to the public. I have the three considerations.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, if the control was absolute of all of the men who served the Illinois Central Railway Co. and was vested in one man's hands—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). May I differentiate between the different kinds of men; and so far as the organization of which you yourself are a member, they are run by high-class men, and that as long as they are run by that class of men none of the things will happen that I am afraid of, but I am not so sure of other organizations outside of the railroad service, and it is that I am afraid of and not those that are purely and simply railroad men.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But on the question of this responsibility, if one man had the absolute control of all of the men who served the Illinois Central, the thing you fear, would he owe less to this same clientele?

Mr. MARKHAM. He might not owe less, but he would give less.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Why?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not know; there comes your theory again; it depends on the man.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then, in fact, your attitude is really based on your distrust of men instead of your distrust of the man because he is an official of a local union?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And consequently you distrust the other agents of a corporation in the same degree if the interests differ in the same degree?

Mr. MARKHAM. I go largely on my experience in the past with such organizations as the old Knights of Labor and the American Railway Union; wherever they have attempted to control the interests, I mean the result has been bad in the past, and I am afraid it will be in the future.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Let me ask you one question: Have you read Tridon's (?) New Unionism?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a fact that every laboring man, if he would hear the document which you presented here this morning, in which you say they have a right to act in common with the company, would cease to be a class organization man and would immediately become a member of an industrial organization comprising every class that is on the pay roll of the railroad, for instance?

Mr. MARKHAM. I should hope so; I would not want to state it as a fact.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a classic that Debs could not have produced?

Mr. MARKHAM. What do you mean by that?

Commissioner GARRETSON. An appeal to every man who labors to make common cause with every other man who labors for the same employer?

Mr. MARKHAM. It is bound to add to the dangers, that sort of organization.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is the danger to the corporation?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; it is the danger to the interests of this country as well as to the well-being of the companies, not only the corporation but the stockholders of the corporation and the people who depend on the corporation for transportation facilities.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Who is the country?

Mr. MARKHAM. The people.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How many of those people are laboring men?

Mr. MARKHAM. A very large number, but they do not all belong to labor unions, though.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am not talking about unions, but laboring men. In regard to the consistency of the railway company's position, you used this phrase, that your attitude was that having agreements with several—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). Nine in the federation, and we had agreements with seven.

Commissioner GARRETSON (continuing). Having agreements with seven of those organizations you could not deal during the life of those agreements; is

It not a fact that in every agreement you have you always deal for its revision during its life, and that the 30-day notice is not a notice to terminate, but for revision?

Mr. MARKHAM. We were objecting to dealing with men who had nothing to do with the agreements we were working under. We said we were willing to meet with the men who made the agreement and discuss the question with them, but did object to meeting the ones that had nothing to do with it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am not dealing with the facts that occurred, but with your statement; your statement was that you could not deal with them during the life of the agreement. The fact is, you deal with every organization you have an agreement with, during its life?

Mr. MARKHAM. I admit that, but with the qualification that we are dealing always with the men who make the agreements and not folks on the outside that have nothing to do with it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. There are cases where you have done the opposite?

Mr. MARKHAM. I deny that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are you sure?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes, sir; so far as my information goes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. So far as your information goes?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a fact that when your agreements were separate with the Order of Railway Clerks and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen that they desired to make a joint agreement, and that a joint agreement was arranged and became effective at the date of the termination of the old ones?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not say it is not a fact, but I do not know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That course was pursued by the company in that case?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You are not prepared to say you did not?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; I say that I do not know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Again, is it not a fact that your company formerly had a joint agreement with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen?

Mr. MARKHAM. Maybe we did; I do not know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And on notice of a desire from those two organizations to terminate the joint agreement that you negotiated with the two separate organizations?

Mr. MARKHAM. Well, the joint agreement was never changed from. I have tried to explain that we put them in a general class when we came to discuss these matters. I am not saying that we would not be willing to-morrow to meet a joint committee, but what we were asked to do in this other matter was entirely different from what we were asked to do with regard to the engineers and firemen or the other trainmen.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The only phase of it I was interested in was the attitude your company occupied.

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not see that there is anything inconsistent in the two attitudes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, in regard to understandings between the Illinois Central and the other portions of the Harriman lines, you testified that there had been no—I don't want to go too far—did you testify there had been any correspondence on the subject with the officials of other Harriman properties?

Mr. MARKHAM. I was asked if there was correspondence with Mr. Kruttschnitt on the subject, and I said I did not know. Since going back to the office this noon I have looked it up and found that there was no correspondence. The files do not show any communications with Mr. Kruttschnitt before the strike or afterwards affecting questions of policy governing the strike.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was there any with the general managers or presidents of independent properties, the U. P. or S. P., either East or West?

Mr. MARKHAM. Before the strike?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. MARKHAM. There was probably some correspondence—not that I had but that took place between other officials of the company, with reference to what was happening in different sections of the country.

Commissioner GARRETSON. All three of the higher officials of the Illinois Central, the president, vice president, and general manager, came from Harriman lines, did they not?

Mr. MARKHAM. I would not—

Commissioner GARRETSON (Interrupting). Yourself from the Southern Pacific, Mr. Parks from the Union Pacific, and Mr. Foley from the Union Pacific?

Mr. MARKHAM. I would not say that I came from the Southern Pacific; I was six years out of the business.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But you were made on the Southern Pacific?

Mr. MARKHAM. That is true.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was there any understanding brought by those officials in regard to the attitude of the corporations from which they came as to the course to be pursued?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not think so. I do not think the fact that these three men happened to be in the employ of the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific at any time had anything to do with the conduct of this strike.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It might explain this, might it not, that if the same attitude was pursued by the companies with which they had had their experience, that was followed by them here, it would show at least a coordination of thought?

Mr. MARKHAM. If there had been no attempt on the Southern Pacific to amalgamate the five shop crafts or metal crafts and the attempt was made on the Illinois Central, its attitude would have been the same.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a fact that on the Southern Pacific, that company went to the extent of submitting to the demands of the different organizations rather than meet them jointly?

Mr. MARKHAM. I have heard of that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And that that was later than the date of the Illinois Central strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And that the company abandoned that position?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And did meet with them in settlement of the questions?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; but that did not have a thing in the world to do with the policy of the Illinois Central in dealing with the same questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It only shows a continuous line of thought.

Mr. MARKHAM. I am hardly willing to agree to that, that it showed a continuous line of thought.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You call it a detached line?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You made some reference to the testimony given by E. E. Clark, a former executive of the Order of Railway Conductors and Mr. P. H. Morrissey, formerly an executive of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, in regard to independent action by their organizations; are you aware of the fact that those two men—are you familiar with the articles of federation that exist between them?

Mr. MARKHAM. Only in a general way.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are you aware of the fact that notwithstanding the testimony you read, Clark and Morrissey are the men who wrote those articles of federation and who championed them strongly?

Mr. MARKHAM. I would be inclined to argue they were right in 1894 and wrong now; but it would depend on the side of the question you took.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And you would grant the right of another to think that they were wrong in 1894 and right now?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You know the school into which Morrissey has graduated since that time, the pursuit he follows at the present time?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think he is a railroad official to-day.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes; dealing with the wage question on the other side of the table than the one he used to?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In regard to the formation of committees here in Illinois, I think you made the statement, Mr. Markham, that for the purposes of this hearing you would admit that such committees were probably formed; I am not misquoting you in that?

Mr. MARKHAM. What committees do you refer to?

Commissioner GARRETSON. This committee that waited on Gov. Deneen.

Mr. MARKHAM. Oh, yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You disclaimed definite knowledge, but I think you used the expression "for the purposes of the hearing," you would admit that such was done?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If it is legitimate—and you stated that it was a perfectly legitimate purpose in your opinion?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If it is a legitimate purpose to combine all of the elements that serve a railway company and to utilize them and use them on behalf of the railway company in determining the rates that shall obtain in a State and to utilize them to influence the authorities of the State, is it less legitimate for those men to come together on their initiative and use the same influences for their own benefit, as between themselves and the company?

Mr. MARKHAM. It is altogether a question of the exercise of power wisely or unwisely.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Ethically one is as legitimate as the other?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; I do not know of any objection to it ethically.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then it becomes a question of the interests involved?

Mr. MARKHAM. A question of fact.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then there can be no inconsistency in the men doing this, if they are able to do it?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not the slightest in the world.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You made the statement that you could not afford—I am not quoting exactly, but the purpose—you made the statement that the company could not afford to deal with this federated committee, because the act of conferring with them would in itself be a recognition of the right of the men to form such federation?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Can there be any question of their right to do it?

Mr. MARKHAM. You know better than anybody else—what I mean is as to the practical side of the question; when you once let a body of men like that get inside of the door and begin discussing the question with them, then the difficulty in getting rid of the question is harder than if you maintained your position from the start.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then you do not mean to question the right of the men to form such federation, if they are able to do it?

Mr. MARKHAM. Oh, no; we simply deny the fact they were able to do it on the Illinois Central Railroad.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Practically speaking, I guess you demonstrated that.

Mr. MARKHAM. I guess so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a fact that exactly such combinations exist among the different railways at the present time?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not that I know of.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And for exactly the same purpose—the exercise of power?

Mr. MARKHAM. Not that I know of.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What about a certain committee that exists?

Mr. MARKHAM. What committee do you refer to?

Commissioner GARRETSON. I will refer, first, to the committee on legislation that represents 97 per cent of the railways of this continent. Is there not such a one in existence?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That deals with the legislation as applied to transportation?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it formed for the purpose of gaining legislation that is undesirable?

Mr. MARKHAM. No, sir; it is formed for the purpose of preventing legislation not desired.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But gaining that which is desirable?

Mr. MARKHAM. Gaining that which is constructive and desirable.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And the federation then would work to gain that which would be desirable to them?

Mr. MARKHAM. They are doing that all the time, and there is no question of the right of the men to do that; it is being done all over the United States and the world.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And they have taken their cards out of the employees' books for doing that?

Mr. MARKHAM. I am not so sure about that. The employees may have gotten some cards and instructions from them.

Commissioner GARRETSON. We have all been in the school of experience for some time.

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Take it in dealing with wages; is not the same plan followed territorially? There are three associations in existence that deal for all of the large railway institutions, with possibly one or two exceptions?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The Western and the Eastern and the South-eastern?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes. The collective system of dealing has been forced on them by the organizations, as I understand it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What method is used?

Mr. MARKHAM. Militant insistence.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That only made it easier for men to deal in a bunch than one man alone?

Mr. MARKHAM. I am not arguing about the reasons, but the facts. The organizations have insisted on the collective system of bargaining and insisted on the railroads coming and dealing with them at one time and dividing up the territory as you have indicated.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you know what that grew out of?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not know the real reason; I would be glad to have you tell me.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In dealing with the wage question is it not true that the organizations were confronted for 10 years with the situation described by a general manager who admitted that they should have more money, but that he could not afford to spring the raise on his competitors. When they admitted that for a series of years then they concluded to be put against their competitors' conditions.

Mr. MARKHAM. I have no criticism to offer of it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But the fact remains that the very thing you fear; that is, the underlying reason—not the excuse for your attitude—that it is done by the employers right along in various directions, but you fear it when it is done by the men?

Mr. MARKHAM. It is only done by the companies in dealing with organizations stronger than them.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How about the legislative idea?

Mr. MARKHAM. It is a matter of community of interest, if you are speaking now of the legislative program between the men and the railroad companies.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is there not the same community of interests in every employee of the Illinois Central Railway Co. when it comes to dealing with the question of whether he believes he receives an equitable wage and is permitted to work under equitable conditions?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You made the statement a moment ago that you thought because your cause was so just there would be no strike. If you admit, as you have now, the right of the men to do this thing, was your cause so just when you contended against them?

Mr. MARKHAM. What do you mean by admitting the right? I said if they wanted to come together and do the thing on the outside they had the right to come to us, but we had the right to deny that request. You are dealing again with a question of theory in asking me if I thought the men had the right to enter into that combination. I am not denying that, but I am not admitting they are right when they do it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not confusing the use of right and power? You admit they have the right, but question their power?

Mr. MARKHAM. I admit they have the right, but do not admit that they are right when they come to us and went to the point of calling a strike on this railroad for the purpose of enforcing that right.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The right to combine, then, as you look at it, is like this: You will assert that in carrying out the business of these various combinations with which your company is connected, that they have the right to do these things as far as they have the power to do them?

Mr. MARKHAM. And as far as they may be legally permitted to do so, but only so far as they can do it without injury to anyone else; there are lots of "buts" in it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It is not a question of injuring some one else always?

Mr. MARKHAM. No, sir; but when it becomes a question of morals or abstract right or wrong I think it comes in it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The legal limitations probably exist for all concerned in the same degree?

Mr. MARKHAM. I doubt that; I do not think so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You read a decision by a certain judge prefaced by the statement that a very large element criticized the courts. In that statement by the judge, if I heard it correctly, he made the statement that he did not know what the strike was for and he doubted if anyone else did. Am I quoting correctly?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think that is substantially what he said.

Commissioner GARRETSON. He then proceeded to read the men a lecture on listening to outsiders and reviewed the whole case from his standpoint, although he asserted that he did not know anything about it, and then proceeded to advise them what to do. Was not any man who was an international officer of the organization or any man who was a chief officer of a corporation an outsider?

Mr. MARKHAM. I hold no brief for the judge, and I was merely reading into the record his statement that had reference to a matter we were called upon to give an opinion on. As I say, I hold no brief for the judge, and I would much prefer not to enter into a discussion of it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am speaking of the way the law is followed. You referred to what was the legal limitation on the company, but not on the men. How many men would read with an unbiased mind that dissertation by the judge and not have a tendency to criticize the courts?

Mr. MARKHAM. I do not know; I could not answer that question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I would like to have figures on the subject, but I suppose you can not refer me to any?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Aishton would like to ask a question.

Commissioner AISHTON. Just a question, Mr. Markham. I understood in your written statement that there were nine organizations in this federation of crafts, nine different crafts, and that with seven of those crafts you had what were known as agreements or schedules or contracts?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. How were those contracts made with those different crafts?

Mr. MARKHAM. They were made in the usual manner that obtains in making labor contracts; meetings were held between the officers of the company and the officers of the organization and the ordinary form of contract worked out and entered into. I have, for example, here, an agreement with the machinists, a contract that was made on October 8, 1909. There was present at that meeting Mr. Rhoderick, Mr. Malloy, Mr. Rodgers, and others. Mr. Rhoderick was chairman, and these other men, from Burnside, Clinton, Alton, McComb, Water Valley, Waterloo, and so on. All points on the road were represented.

Commissioner AISHTON. Representatives of the workmen who entered into that contract representing the entire crafts on your system?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; as I understand it, there was.

Commissioner AISHTON. And those delegates that attended that meeting or convention at which this agreement was entered into were elected by the men of the different crafts on the railroad?

Mr. MARKHAM. That is my understanding.

Commissioner AISHTON. To represent them at this meeting?

Mr. MARKHAM. Representatives of the men from the different shops at the different points on the line.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does that contract contain the signatures of the delegates for the men?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

9752 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Commissioner AISHTON. And that contract contains what you have stated the 30-day clause?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; the 30-day clause I read into the record a short time ago.

Commissioner AISHTON. You had similar contracts with the seven different crafts, seven of the nine crafts that made this other request on you?

Mr. MARKHAM. Similar contracts to those that were reached and arrived at in the same way.

Commissioner AISHTON. How do you estimate the value of such a contract, Mr. Markham? Is it covered by a bond or by any financial obligation if it is broken, or is it as a matter of good faith as between the two contracting parties?

Mr. MARKHAM. You eliminate the element of good faith and there is nothing left to it.

Commissioner AISHTON. Good faith in making that contract is the entire value of that contract to a transportation company?

Mr. MARKHAM. Absolutely.

Commissioner AISHTON. And is the only thing that insures a continuation of service for the 30 days?

Mr. MARKHAM. That is all.

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Markham, you said, I think, in your oral testimony, or read out of some document, that in the 12 months previous to the calling of this strike there was an advance in compensation given the men in the mechanical department of your road amounting to $428,188?

Mr. MARKHAM. I read that; yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. Was that advance in compensation made as a result of the negotiations between these committees representing the men and these organizations?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. And your company?

Mr. MARKHAM. And under contract similar to this. There was an advance made, I think, through that same period to the machinists' wages contract still in force to that effect.

Commissioner AISHTON. And the committee's request made by this federation of nine crafts was a different personality, that is, different persons than the people that executed these contracts with you?

Mr. MARKHAM. Entirely different; the officers were different.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner BALLARD. Just one question. Your road has agreements, enters into agreements and contracts with the four orders known as the railroad orders; that is, the conductors and engineers and firemen and brakemen?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. And those men, as I understand it, do work for the railroads and for the railroads only?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. And any negotiations you make with those representatives of those orders are made purely from the railroad standpoint?

Mr. MARKHAM. Absolutely.

Commissioner BALLARD. Now, these other crafts that you spoke of, for instance, take the machinists, the machinists which work for your railroad might not have the power of controlling the machinists' organizations of the country, and therefore the machinists organizations of the country might force the railroad machinists to demands which would not be proper for a railroad, but might be prevailing in an industry; that is one reason that could be given?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes. To make that a little plainer, what we object to is getting mixed up in quarrels with those outside of the railroad service because there was a strike in a machine shop somewhere else. For instance, I use the illustration of the Baldwin Locomotive Works. That is one thing. If there is a strike in the Baldwin Locomotive Works we do not want to be prevented from exercising the right or privilege of buying engines from the Baldwin Locomotive Works, and, after buying them, having the machinists in our employ say there is a strike in the Baldwin shops and they shall not work on these locomotives. It is through this larger organization, more powerful organization that I speak of, that it would come about under that System Federation being in a position to exercise that power.

Commissioner BALLARD. Then you feel these various unions should have so-called railroad unions separate from others so that the railroads would treat with those probably without serious difficulty?

Mr. MARKHAM. We do that. We have done that for years. We have no trouble in dealing with them.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all.

Commissioner LENNON. Would you advise—excuse me—would you advise the railroad corporations of this country to disintegrate the large organizations that they have been brought into and resolve back into the small organizations that existed originally?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; it would not be an economical proposition to do it.

Commissioner LENNON. Why do you feel that the workmen ought to do that?

Mr. MARKHAM. Because, through organization of the railroad employees, the railroads of the country serve the people of the country, the commerce of the country, more economically and more efficiently.

Commissioner LENNON. Isn't it true that the labor organizations where they work together more efficiently serve the interests of labor and consequently the interests of the country?

Mr. MARKHAM. I am not sure of that; no. I am not sure that the interests are concurrent in a case of that kind. But what we are afraid of is the unwisdom exercise of power that it would give to such an organization.

Commissioner LENNON. I have heard several times some very commendatory statements regarding Brother Garretson's organization and some others; have you found that the dependability of the men of those organizations is greater than among the machinists, the blacksmiths, or boiler makers, or shop organizations?

Mr. MARKHAM. Well, we had in this strike of ours, we had these organizations go out in defiance of the orders of their grand officers. They went out before the strike was authorized or called, and they refused to go back when their grand officers tried to get them to go back. I have never known of a case of that kind on the other side, that they did not discipline their men, and discipline them severely for doing it. And I have known of some cases—I do not know of any of these men that have been disciplined for what they did to us.

Commissioner LENNON. Is it not true that there has been a policy of the railroad corporations toward the brotherhood or that at least permitted a more thorough organization among them than has been the case with the shop organization, more easily?

Mr. MARKHAM. We have never denied the right on the Illinois Central, so far as my knowledge goes, to anyone, to the shopmen to organize. We have never refused to treat with them in precisely the same manner we treat with the other organizations. I hold no brief for the other railroads of the country, and I can not speak for them.

Commissioner LENNON. Have you in your past experience, Mr. Markham, with the agreements with these other organizations, leaving out for the present the brotherhoods—have you found them more loyal to their agreements—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). To each other, you mean?

Commissioner LENNON. Like the machinists, the boiler makers, or other organizations?

Mr. MARKHAM. No. That is what led to this strike.

Commissioner LENNON. No; prior to this strike, in the years gone by, prior to the strike.

Mr. MARKHAM. My experience goes back a good many years to the time when I was on the Southern Pacific, and there was a lot of trouble with these other organizations, with incipient strikes. If I recall, we had the men on a strike at a certain point because the pay car was 12 hours late. They are not as responsible organizations as the others, and yet, notwithstanding that, the railroads have dealt with them along the same lines.

Commissioner LENNON. Are they less responsible because of not being of as good character, or is it because of the fact that their environments are such that complete organization is more difficult?

Mr. MARKHAM. It is not a question of completeness of the organization. They have had that.

Commissioner LENNON. They have?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; quite as complete, according to my information, as any of the trainmen or enginemen's organizations.

Commissioner LENNON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Is there anything else you care to submit that has not been covered by the questions? If so, you may do it now.

Mr. MARKHAM. You asked me for certain information before I left.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MARKHAM. And I have prepared during the noon hour a little memoranda covering those points.

You asked about the agencies through which we obtained our men. We obtain practically all of our new force through the Pinkerton National Detective Agency, Waddell & Mahon Corporation, Thiel Detective Service—very few men from the last, the first three—Furlong Secret Service Co., Mooney & Boland Agency, National Secret Service, Model Labor Agency, Michael Labor Agency.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Those were agencies you secured your guards from?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; the agencies we secured our men from.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You mean your—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). To work in the shop.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Workmen?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Those are all detective agencies.

Mr. MARKHAM. I know they are, but they are men who engage in gathering up men and that sort. They did not get all of them, but during the first of the trouble we received quite a number of men through those agencies.

You asked me about the reply to a letter addressed to Mr. Foley under date of June 20, 1911, from the office of the federation. I can not find there is any reply that was made to that letter.

You asked me to furnish a letter, dated July 12, from the federation organization. We have made careful search of our files and do not find any such letter was received from the federation.

Then you asked again for copies of letters in which the company insisted on being given 30 days' notice. The letter was addressed to Mr. Buckalew (?) on August 9 by our assistant general manager, Mr. Foley, and referring to a circular which is attached, the circular which I read here to-day.

You asked me then to search my files for copies of correspondence with Mr. Kruttschnitt. I do not find anything either before or after the strike dealing with the policy of preventing the strike on our respective lines.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does that document indicate the agencies which you mentioned, and also give the number of men each of those furnished?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; I can't give you that. I don't know.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does the Pinkerton Agency furnish men who are to work as mechanics in the shop?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes. They open offices at various places and put notices in the newspapers calling for men, for machinists and boiler makers, or whatever class of men they want, and we had our representatives at the different points examine the men and see that they were obtained and then they were forwarded in batches of 10 or more to points where they were needed.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I think in your document you read into the record you said there was something like 9,000 employees that went on strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Can you give us any idea as to the number of workmen you employ during the time of the strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. Oh, no. They were coming and going all the time. We find, of course, great difficulty in getting the right men, the right kind of men, getting men that would stay. At some of the places conditions were not very encouraging. There was a good deal of violence or threatened violence, and it was very difficult to keep men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Could you furnish us with a statement, to come later, showing the number of workmen in the machinists, take that, for instance, that had been employed during the time of the strike?

Mr. MARKHAM. That we employed after the strike was called?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. After the strike occurred to take the place of the strikers and to keep up your force since that time.

Mr. MARKHAM. Well, you have some idea, Mr. O'Connell, of the way the force changes. I suppose that in the shop very few railroads have at the end of the year more than 70 or 75 per cent of the men in their employ that they had at the first of the year. This class of employment changes right along. It would be quite a task to show all the men that came into the employ and left during that time. It may be of information to say that we have to-day within a matter of two or three hundred of the same number of employees we had four years ago when the strike was called.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose during the year 1914 you had employed in your shops, you had given employment say to 25,000 workmen, had that many different names on your roll?

Mr. MARKHAM. It might have been, probably would have been.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Or 50,000?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; I would not go as high as that, but even 25,000 would be the wildest kind of a guess, because I have no idea whether that is correct or not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. We have had some information heretofore on the permanency of employment, the isolation of employment; what is the number of men that keep coming and going to keep the positions filled?

Mr. MARKHAM. We had more or less difficulty, Mr. O'Connell, in getting competent men, and you see in losing the services on a railroad as old as the Illinois Central of all of its mechanical force, or practically all at one time, very few of them returning to the service, it would take a good long time to pick up competent men, and the process of weeding out was a long one, a slow one. But we have to-day, I am happy to say, that we have a good lot of men, and we are turning out good work, and we are employing as many men in the shops to-day as we were when the strike was called four years ago.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is your production as great now with the same number of men as it was prior?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think so; yes, sir. I think our efficiency is quite as good to-day as it was then.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. At any greater cost or any lesser cost?

Mr. MARKHAM. I sometimes think a little less cost, things are a little bit different, have a little better control of the situation.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have created a better efficiency, you think?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think so. Our men tell me so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there still much employment of men going on and quitting of men?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; we have a very good class of men, men that have been with us a good long time now. Of course, changes in the force occur now and then as before the strike occurred.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The strike has been going on now for how long?

Mr. MARKHAM. Nearly four years.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Four years?

Mr. MARKHAM. It will be four years on September 30.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You could not, offhand, estimate the number of people that have been employed in the shops in that time?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; I could not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would it be a very laborious task to get from the records an estimate of the number of employees?

Mr. MARKHAM. Well, no; we can go over the shop pay rolls. It would be quite a task; it would take some time to do it, but it is just a matter of clerical labor. If the information is desired by the commission we will be glad to furnish it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes. Well, you will let us have that?

(See Markham Exhibit No. 1.)

Chairman WALSH. All of these matters called for, I will say, that require preparation that you could not bring now, if you will please prepare them, you will be called upon later by the secretary, because they keep a memorandum of what we request.

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; I understand that.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I would like to ask do you have a permanent contract with the Pinkerton Co. for gathering these employees?

Mr. MARKHAM. Probably a letter exchange.

Chairman WALSH. And also with the Waddell & Mahon Corporation?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; I have no reason to understand they were handled in any different way. I presume they were all handled the same way.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I understand Mr. Park, on account of his engagements, can not appear before this commission.

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; Mr. Park is on this arbitration here.

Chairman WALSH. Now, who could appear here most conveniently to your company with those contracts or with the correspondence that constituted the contracts?

Mr. MARKHAM. Why, we would be glad to file copies of the letters or contracts with you, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The reason I asked particularly if some one could bring them, some one in authority of whom we might ask some questions concerning them—

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I might say that the commission is making a special investigation of that subject, or has been, through experts—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). Yes.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). And we would like to make whatever additional investigation of that we can.

Mr. MARKHAM. I shall be glad to—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Could Mr. Foley come?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; Mr. Foley could do it, if the commission desires him to appear.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; and bring those contracts with him.

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, in the absence of Mr. Park, I have been handed some questions to ask you.

Was there complaint made on the part of the shop employees against the introduction of the so-called scientific management scheme, including piecework, the bonus system, and so forth?

Mr. MARKHAM. Why, we never had any such plan on the Illinois Central Railroad; never had any such scheme.

Chairman WALSH. There was no such thing?

Mr. MARKHAM. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a complaint on the part of the employees—a general complaint—as to the organization and management of the hospital association?

Mr. MARKHAM. There was some complaint on the part of the shopmen; yes.

Chairman WALSH. I will go through these questions just as they have been submitted to me; they being submitted by the other side—

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes. Let me say, however, as regards the hospital association that the shopmen's organization was the only one on the railroad that took organization official notice of the organization of the hospital department or objected to it in any way.

Chairman WALSH. The first question is, What suggested the organization of the hospital association on the Illinois Central Railroad?

Mr. MARKHAM. A desire to serve the employees of the railroad.

Chairman WALSH. What suggested the organization of the hospital organization on the Harriman lines?

Mr. MARKHAM. The Harriman lines had the hospital association when I began to work for them in 1881. That is about 34 years ago, and my mind does not go back—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Was the plan of the organization of the hospital organization taken up—on the present line of management, I think that means—by conference of the different railroads and made a matter of general railroad policy?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. When was the hospital association organized, and what methods were used, if any, to induce the men to join?

Mr. MARKHAM. It was organized in July, 1911. Certain men were—I think circulars were sent to the men outlining the basis of the organization, and they were—addresses were made to them at certain points—certain gatherings, and opportunities given them to listen to reasons in support of the organization.

Chairman WALSH. Is it not a fact that the application blanks for employment require the applicant to agree to pay a certain monthly rate to the association as a condition precedent to getting a position?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; 50 cents a month is the charge, by the way.

Chairman WALSH. Is the amount of the payment uniform, or determined by the hazard of the occupation, or salary of the employee?

Mr. MARKHAM. It is uniform.

Chairman WALSH. And the scale is just—what is the monthly charge—50 cents to all?

Mr. MARKHAM. Fifty cents to all.

Chairman WALSH. To all crafts?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How much money does your company collect monthly from the men for the hospital association?

Mr. MARKHAM. About $25,000—$25,000, or $26,000, or $27,000, depending on the number of men in the employ of the company.

Chairman WALSH. How is the money collected?

Mr. MARKHAM. Deducted from the pay roll, 50 cents from each person.

Chairman WALSH. How is the association managed?

Mr. MARKHAM. Managed by the chief surgeon under an organization made up of the managing officers of the railroad.

Chairman WALSH. Are the employees permitted to have a voice in the management of the association and the disposition of its funds?

Mr. MARKHAM. The employees have no—do not participate in the management of the organization.

Chairman WALSH. Have not the employees repeatedly requested that the fund be managed by a board of directors, and that employees be given representation on the board of directors?

Mr. MARKHAM. They have not. It has been our purpose to so handle the affairs of the organization that there would be no reason for their wanting to make a change, and I think up to the present time we have been very happy in succeeding in that regard.

Chairman WALSH. Has there ever been any accounting given to the employees of the hospital association fund?

Mr. MARKHAM. The account is open to their representatives at any time they want to know about it. The funds of the hospital department are kept in a separate bank, and the facilities for taking care of the employees are added to just as fast as the accretion of the funds of the association will permit. We have in South Chicago, at Fifty-seventh Street, a hospital now in course of construction, costing three or four hundred thousand dollars.

Chairman WALSH. What is the fact in regard to providing facilities and services for passengers injured who have not contributed to the fund?

Mr. MARKHAM. If it is for the railroad, the railroad pays for the services. The railroad contributes to the fund the proportion used either for passengers or trespassers or any employee for whom it is responsible.

Chairman WALSH. Have the employees any voice in the selection of the physicians and surgeons employed and paid out of the fund?

Mr. MARKHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that physicians and surgeons employed and paid out of the fund are selected by the officials of the company and owe their loyalty to them and, as a consequence, are a witness for the company and against the men who pay them and who are injured employees making claims for damages for personal injuries, which are alleged to be the result of the negligence of the company?

Mr. MARKHAM. The purpose of that question is to discredit the organization. I understand those are submitted—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Yes; these are submitted questions.

Mr. MARKHAM. For the purpose of discrediting the organization.

Chairman WALSH. Regardless of the motive for asking the question, as to the practice, what is the fact—

Mr. MARKHAM (interrupting). It is not true.

Chairman WALSH. As to real estate purchased out of the contributions of the employees, in whose name is the title placed?

Mr. MARKHAM. Will you ask that question again, please, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. In the purchase of real estate, how is the title taken—the purchase of real estate out of this fund?

Mr. MARKHAM. Real estate purchased in Chicago was taken in the name of Mr. Park and myself, as trustees for the employees for the hospital department.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just to keep the record straight, Mr. Markham, you say this hospital that is being built will cost three or four hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Where does that money come from?

Mr. MARKHAM. From this fund belonging to the employees.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Out of the funds of the employees?

Mr. MARKHAM. Oh, yes; and the company contributes its share in the fund.
 Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that in Paducah, Ky., the property of the hospital association was by the Illinois Central officials in charge turned over to that company?

Mr. MARKHAM. No; it was turned over to the hospital department. The Illinois Central owns the land on which the building is located. Just the building and its appurtenances were turned over to the Illinois Central Hospital Association by the employees of that section of the line who were the formers of the old organization and under conditions that were entirely friendly, and all of that, and at less cost than under the old organization.

Commissioner GARRETTSON. Was that the old Chesapeake & Ohio Southwestern system?

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How was the title to that property held before it was transferred?

Mr. MARKHAM. Well, the real estate is owned by the railroad.

Chairman WALSH. It was—the title was in the Illinois Central Railroad?

Mr. MARKHAM. Well, or the old Chesapeake & Ohio; I don't know just how the title was; but the railroad owns it at least.

Chairman WALSH. And the title is in whom now?

Mr. MARKHAM. The title of the land still stays where it was; it has not been changed.

Chairman WALSH. And what was the value of the improvements upon the land?

Mr. MARKHAM. Now, one moment there—the title now, as I recall, remains in the railroad company, and the hospital department, I think, pays 4 per cent on the agreed value for its use.

Chairman WALSH. What was the value of the improvement?

Mr. MARKHAM. I don't remember.

Chairman WALSH. Approximately?

Mr. MARKHAM. I haven't the slightest idea; I can not tell you.

Chairman WALSH. Is it not a fact that physical examinations by the doctors appointed by the company and paid for out of the contributions by the employees would afford a means of getting rid of employees who were active in labor unions?

Mr. MARKHAM. I don't think so.

Chairman WALSH. Is it not a fact that the physicians and surgeons are called to testify in behalf of the company in personal injury cases and are paid by the company out of the hospital fund?

Mr. MARKHAM. I don't think so.

Chairman WALSH. Are the reports made by the examination of physicians and surgeons employed in the hospital association accessible to other employers?

Mr. MARKHAM. How is that, again?

Chairman WALSH. I would take that to mean, are the reports as to the physical condition of persons who have been in the hospital open to other employers? For instance, you have a physical record of an individual in your hospital. If you were called upon by another employer for that, would you furnish it to him or give him access to it?

Mr. MARKHAM. I think that would involve a question of medical ethics. I would not think anything of that kind would be done.

Chairman WALSH. So far as you know, is there any practice concerning that?

Mr. MARKHAM. I know of none, and do not believe any such exists.

Chairman WALSH. What method is used by the company to determine the competency of physicians and surgeons selected for the hospital association?

Mr. MARKHAM. Our chief surgeon would have to answer for that, sir; I could not tell you.

Chairman WALSH. You don't know as to that?

Mr. MARKHAM. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Is it not a fact that the physicians and surgeons used by the railway company are paid a small sum of money yearly to make them employees, and that their real compensation is free transportation?

Mr. MARKHAM. I would not say that. There is a good deal of prestige connected with being on the roll of a railway company as its surgeon and physician. The transportation may be regarded as of some value, but I think the question of prestige is more important than anything.

Chairman WALSH. Is this free transportation so paid charged against the hospital fund?

Mr. MARKHAM. It is not.

Chairman WALSH. Is it not a fact that the company has a fixed schedule for operative work done by surgeons, and do you believe this might not be an inducement to impose unnecessary operations upon patients by a surgeon who is not conscientious?

Mr. MARKHAM. That is a matter of medical detail with which I am not familiar. I could not answer.

Chairman WALSH. Is it not a fact that in the hospital service young and inexperienced medical men are employed, who secure their experience in the profession at the expense of sick and injured employees?

Mr. MARKHAM. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. I had a memorandum here that might be of interest on that. There is on our hospital staff here in Chicago, Dr. John B. Murphy, professor of surgery and head of the surgical department of Northwestern University Medical School, and chief of surgical staff of Mercy Hospital, Chicago; Dr. Arthur R. Edwards, dean of the faculty and professor of medicine of Northwestern University Medical School; Dr. C. L. Mix, secretary to the faculty and professor of nervous diseases of the Northwestern University Medical School; Dr. L. W. Bremerman, professor of urinary diseases of the medical department of the University of Iowa; Dr. R. G. Harris, consulting dermatologist, Cook County Hospital; Dr. R. J. Tivnen, associate professor of optomology, Northwestern University Medical School, and head of the eye department of Mercy Hospital, Chicago.

I don't think anyone would call those gentlemen young or inexperienced men, and yet the man who pays his 50 cents a month has, if it is necessary—or is in a position to get the advantage of an operation performed, for instance, by Dr. John B. Murphy.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Will you file with us that history of the strike that you have in book form;

Mr. MARKHAM. Yes; here it is.

(The pamphlet referred to, entitled "The facts about the shopmen's strike," was submitted in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you, Mr. Markham. You will be permanently excused.

Mr. MARKHAM. Thank you, gentlemen.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Wharton.

TESTIMONY OF MR. A. O. WHARTON.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name.

Mr. WHARTON. A. O. Wharton.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business, Mr. Wharton?

Mr. WHARTON. At the present time I am president of the railway employees' department of the American Federation of Labor.

Chairman WALSH. What is your place of residence?

Mr. WHARTON. St. Louis, Mo.

Chairman WALSH. I take it you were engaged, before you were in that work, in some craft?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What is your trade?

Mr. WHARTON. Machinist.

Chairman WALSH. How long did you work at your business?

Mr. WHARTON. I entered the service of the Santa Fe Railroad as apprentice in 1887.

Chairman WALSH. Just sketch briefly and concisely, please, your own activities down to the present time, both in private employment and in railroad employment and as a member of a labor organization.

Mr. WHARTON. Well, in addition to making that statement, I would like to state that I have prepared some information which I would like to read later.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. WHARTON. I served an apprenticeship of four years as apprentice to the machinist's trade, and then was engaged or employed as a journeyman machinist on various railroads throughout the country up until about 1901, when I became an officer of the International Association of Machinists, and since that time, and up until 1912, I was in the employ of the International Association of Machinists, principally engaged organizing locals of that organization and negotiating agreements between railway companies and employees on the various systems of this country.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please repeat the name of your organization?

Mr. WHARTON. This organization I now represent?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. WHARTON. Railway employees' department of the American Federation of Labor.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would describe what that is, its connection with any local body, as well as its connection with the American Federation of Labor. Have you a statement which covers a large number of these matters?

Mr. WHARTON. I have.

Chairman WALSH. Would you prefer to submit that statement as Mr. Markham submitted a statement, first?

Mr. WHARTON. I would; and then to answer any questions you desire to ask afterwards.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. You may proceed, Mr. Wharton.

Mr. WHARTON (reading): "I have followed railroad work almost exclusively since entering the shops of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe R. R., Topeka, Kans., in 1887 as an apprentice to the machinist's trade.

"Beginning with the Knights of Labor and referring to the organization of the machinists, boiler makers, blacksmiths, carmen, and other craft organizations that again came into existence as a result of the failure of the Knights of Labor, the organization of a system federation, composed of machinists, boiler makers, and blacksmiths on the Santa Fe and Union Pacific Railroads in 1892, the strikes on both these roads in May of 1893, their successful termination, the appearance and demise of the American Railway Union in 1893 and 1894, the rapid growth of the craft organizations thereafter, the appearance of the United Brotherhood of Railway Employees in 1900, its demise in 1903 or 1904; the organization of the railway employees department of the American Federation of Labor in 1908 and its reorganization in 1912, together with the fact that I have had some 15 years' experience in negotiating agreements between various railroads and the men employed by them in the mechanical departments, in my opinion, qualifies me to speak with some degree of authority with respect to the causes leading up to the organization of the System Federation plan of concerted action.

"The very nature of the railroad industry, the organization and system of supervision necessary to its successful operation, and the absolute helplessness of the individual are three of the principal reasons.

"The mileage of a railroad is divided up into divisions. At each division point a force of employees is maintained, the number and qualifications of the employees being governed by the nature of the service required. Each division has its corps of officials and is generally under the direct supervision of a division superintendent or a division master mechanic, or both, who are in turn subordinate to a district or general superintendent or master mechanic, and so on up to the general manager, vice president, president, chairman of the board of directors, and the board of directors jointly.

"In the locomotive and car shops there are numerous subordinate foremen, designated as straw, scratch, pit, on gang foremen, leadmen, machine foremen, roundhouse foremen, car foremen, general and division foremen, who have direct supervision over the men and work they perform.

"An order issued by a general manager or other general officer of the company is in turn communicated to each subordinate official until it is delivered to the man or men who actually execute it. A general order may thus be put into full effect and force over an entire system, and, according to its character, affect one division point or all division points or an individual employee, or all the employees.

"When the present craft organizations were inaugurated the men were subjected to all kinds of intimidation, coercion, and discrimination, the more active ones often being dismissed from the service. This opposition on the part of the railway officials was quite general. Because of these conditions strikes frequently occurred, first in one craft, then another, and in the beginning only one shop or division point would be involved. A strike of this kind generally resulted in the closing of the shop affected and the transferring of the work to the next division or shop, and these men consciously or unconsciously were used to defeat their fellow workers.

"To overcome this, and following the example set by the railroad officials, each craft inaugurated a system of district organization. Each district was delegated the authority to organize and conduct the business of all the members of their respective crafts on the entire system, subordinate to their respective grand lodges. As a result of this change in policy, and despite the opposition of the railroad officials, the men were eventually successful in securing system agreements with many of the railroads.

"During this period it developed that the officials in negotiating agreements, and dealing with but one organization at a time, would play one organization against the other. Each organization in turn would be confronted with this fact, all of which worked to the disadvantage of the men as a whole, and this system was extended to a point where the officials would attempt to force the men on one road to accept conditions that prevailed on another, always with the object in view of compelling the men to accept as a standard the poorest conditions in that territory.

"Due to this fact and because of a general belief that the railroads had formed some kind of an association having for its object the dealing with questions affecting the employees, we attribute the rapid development of the American Railway Union, culminating in the abortive strike of 1894, which, together with the great industrial depression that prevailed during 1894, 1895, and 1896, so affected the organizations that they remained comparatively inactive for a period of several years. During this period of trade-union inactivity the railroads had taken advantage of the conditions and quite generally introduced what is termed the "personal record system." This rule required the applicants for positions to give a brief history of their lives, and as a condition of employment they were compelled to furnish reference satisfactory to the employer for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the date of filing the application. This resulted in establishing what we term an absolute and positive black list and placed the man who was out of a job at the mercy of the employer. In addition to this a number of the railroads introduced what is termed a "physical examination" test for shopmen. This rule is subject to the same abuses as a black list, as the company selects the examining physician and his decision is final, although the applicant, if accepted, is compelled to pay from one to two dollars as an examination fee. Many men have been rejected and were examined by other physicians and pronounced physically fit to enter the United States Army or Navy. Piecework and bonus systems and other so-called efficiency methods, together with the establishment of an age limit ranging from 35 to 45 years, after which age no man would be employed, were put into effect by a number of railroads and were attempted by a number of others.

"A peculiar thing in connection with practically all of the so-called efficiency methods is the acknowledged fact that the mainspring of the whole institution and the one thing absolutely essential to its success, 'the human being developed to the highest point of efficiency,' is not taken into consideration, neither is he protected or provided for in any respect. No human being capable of self-support should be cast upon the industrial scrap heap, and no system that predicates such a condition should be tolerated.

"Beginning with 1900 and up to the close of 1907 the various craft organizations began to renew their activity. They became involved in a strike on the Union Pacific Railroad against the introduction of piecework, all shop crafts participated, and after a strike lasting about one year a settlement was reached. Piecework was not established. Following this strike the machinists on the Santa Fe became involved in a strike, due to the refusal of this company to enter into an agreement. Later the boiler makers and then the blacksmiths also became involved. After a four years' struggle this strike was declared off.

"These strikes and the increasing cost of negotiating the respective craft agreements annually, this item alone running into the hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the fact that the railroads had federated and were playing one craft against the other, also using competing lines as a basis of settlement and the abrogation of the craft agreements early in 1908 by the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad, bringing on a strike of all trades. The notice of a reduction in wages served on all employees of the Southern Railroad and allied lines, which was prevented by the united action of both the shop and transportation organizations; the strike of all shop employees on the Canadian Pacific system about the same time, which was also settled in a manner satisfactory to the men; the attempt to introduce piecework on the New York, New Haven & Hartford in January, 1908, which was prevented by all shop crafts federating and protesting; the abrogation of all craft agreements on the Iowa Central in February, 1908; the successful termination of this strike and recognition of the federation organized as a result of the company's action; and the abrogation of all craft agreements on the Wabash in 1907, resulting in the formation of a federation at a later date and the signing of a federated agreement, brought about agitation that led to the introduction of a resolution in the A. F. of L. convention, held in Denver, Colo., November, 1908, the purpose of which was to organize the railway employees' department. This resolution was adopted unanimously, and the department was chartered February 19, 1909. The strike on the Denver & Rio Grande terminated in March, 1909, the settlement being favorable to the men, a federation being organized in the meantime.

"In 1907 the craft organizations on the Missouri Pacific and St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway became involved in strikes in the following order: Blacksmiths, boiler makers, and sheet-metal workers. In each of these cases the strike resulted because the company had played one organization against the other, a settlement having first been made with the machinists in February of 1907, none of the organizations following being given the same consideration.

"In 1908 this company made an effort to get the Brotherhood of Railway Car Men to accept piecework; the men refused. Later the company abrogated their agreement with this organization, and after a strike of some seven months succeeded in introducing the piecework system in the car department.

"No further trouble occurred until May 2, 1910, when this company declined to renew the agreement with the machinists and grant the same concessions that had been conceded to the machinists on some 17 other roads in the Southwest. This company attempted to force the Missouri Pacific machinists to accept a set of rules that had been accepted by the committee on the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad. This the men declined, and a strike of the machinists, apprentices, and helpers took effect May 2, 1910. In the meantime the company signed agreements with the boiler makers, blacksmiths, and sheet-metal workers. By October 21 conditions had reached a point that resulted in these three crafts striking in support of the machinists. Numerous conferences had been held between the officials of the company and the general officers of these organizations, including the machinists, all to no avail, the company maintaining their original position; i. e., that the machinists on the Missouri Pacific must accept the agreement signed up by the machinists on the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad, notwithstanding the fact that this would mean a distinct loss of conditions enjoyed by the Missouri Pacific men for many years. This strike terminated on December 21, 1910, the joint or federated committee being recognized and the machinists securing the same increase per hour as that granted the other crafts and the restoration of their former agreement, together with a number of additional concessions. The outcome of this strike gave added impetus to the federated movement.

"As an evidence of the growth and development of the American Railway Association, we refer you to the Official Railway Guide, quarterly supplement, published by the National Railway Publication Co., 75 Church Street, New York.

"I have here a copy, which contains in detail the organizations of every character. I think there is scarcely anything in the railroad industry, from politics to finance, that is overlooked in the various subdivisions and organizations established by the railways of the entire country.

(The document referred to by witness was submitted in printed form.)

"Our experience and knowledge of the subdivisions of this parent organization are such that we feel absolutely justified in stating that certain of these subdivisions have to do with and very materially influence the policies of the associated railways in their dealings with the organizations representing the railroad employees."

"Generally and specifically speaking, our experience has been that the railroads compel unreasonable terms and conditions of employment where the organizations of the men are weak, and that when dealing with other railroads the fact that such conditions do exist are advanced as an argument against acceding to the just and reasonable demands made. We have also found that when two or more committees on two or more railroads are negotiating agreements at the same time, the railroads keep in close touch with one another, and if there is the slightest concession made with respect to the original proposition by any of these committees it is immediately telegraphed to the other railroad officials and by them used to weaken the position of the respective committees.

"We also have experienced the studied and deliberate method of protracted conferences, the purpose of which is to make the cost of the negotiations so expensive that the men will be compelled to relinquish part of their reasonable demands.

"And in connection with this I desire to state that for a number of years there were at least a hundred railroads, or their representatives, negotiating agreements annually. On an average I would say there were possibly five shop crafts represented, which meant that there would be five committees meeting officials on these railways on an average of once a year, renewing their schedules, and that the average cost per committee possibly would be regulated to some extent by the size of the railroad; but in some instances we have known a single craft committee to have found it necessary to assess the members on that system sufficiently to raise $5,000 for the purpose of paying one committee—the craft in securing an agreement on that one system. It is safe to presume that the various shop organizations in this country, in negotiating agreements annually were compelled to pay in the neighborhood of $250,000, which sum was raised by some form of assessment levied on the men on these various systems, handled through their district organization.

"We also find that it is absolutely essential to maintain committeemen at all division points and a general chairman, under salary, as a means of compelling the average railroad company to carry out and put into effect and operation the rules and conditions of employment embodied in these agreements, the result of which is to materially increase the cost of maintaining the contract and securing the conditions agreed upon.

That represents an expense of, possibly, on one railroad, say, averaging between six and eight thousand miles, to each organization that is in a position to support a general chairman, in the neighborhood of $2,500 a year. This added expense is simply to take up and adjust grievances arising from the possible misinterpretation of rules or by a studied or deliberate effort on the part of the officials to evade an agreement which has been entered into. In many instances it has been an absolute fact that after entering into an agreement every possible method was put into practice to break down and evade the rules that they had agreed upon.

"The burden of this expense is so great that the smaller craft organizations are unable to meet it, and as a result the agreements entered into are ignored to a very large extent and the members denied redress, the common practice on some roads being to single out and discharge the men elected to serve as committeemen. If they succeed in doing this, the men are at the mercy of the officials, and dare not become active or raise their voice in protest for fear of discharge.

"We have also found that the practice of the railroads in employing operatives from the so-called private detective agencies has contributed very largely to the labor troubles experienced by them.

"We recently had in our possession a letter signed by C. L. Patterson, manager of the St. Louis branch of the William J. Burns National Detective Agency (Inc.), dated March 8, 1913, addressed to the Universal Cutter Co., St. Louis, Mo. This letter was sent out for the purpose of soliciting patronage, and among other things stated 'we are also prepared to furnish skilled mechanics and craftsmen, trainmen, switchmen, telegraph and telephone linemen and operators, men and women for any occupation or business, who will keep you advised at all times relative to dishonest employees, labor agitation, carelessness, and disobedience of employees, and so forth. In the event of a strike among your employees we are prepared to furnish strike breakers and guards for your property. A few dollars intelligently expended for detective service may save you thousands.'

"It is presumed that anyone can readily understand this proposition, but there are some things in connection therewith which only those who represent and are engaged in the organizing work of a trade-union can fully explain. The private detective agencies, and there are many of them, consist principally of men who have been unable to earn a living in any other manner than that of preying upon their fellow men. Many of them, if asked to fill out one of the personal-record employment applications required by some of the railroads, would be compelled to give as a reference the rogues' gallery.

"We herewith submit the picture of E. A. Strang, secured from the rogues' gallery, St. Louis, Mo., as a striking illustration of the type. This man joined the machinists' union and acted as an inside or cover-up man for an agency during the Missouri Pacific strike of 1910. We herewith produce the copies of two letters from Assistant General Manager J. W. Small, of the Texas lines of the Harriman system, dated December 3 and 29, 1911, found in the possession of Strang. These letters are self-explanatory. Strang has a police record that stamps him as an all-around crook. We herewith submit the picture of E. A. Strang, secured from the rogues' gallery of St. Louis, Mo."

[No. 11. The Manufacturers' Information Bureau Co. J. K. Turner, president, Cleveland, Ohio, U. S. A.]

CLEVELAND, OHIO, December 5, 1908.

THE RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' DEPARTMENT.

The inauguration of the railway employees' department of the American Federation of Labor at Denver last month is a significant movement which unquestionably signifies a renewal of labor agitation among the railway employees in the next six months.

The various orders interested in the new federation are: The Order of Railway Telegraphers, Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, Iron Ship Builders, International Freight Handlers, International Association of Machinists, International Association of Car Workers, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths, Brotherhood Maintenance of Way Employees, International Association of Steam Fitters, Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, and the Switchmen's Union of North America.

For a number of years past the old-line brotherhoods not affiliated with the federation have been endeavoring to establish a federation of the five great brotherhoods. The first meeting was held in Toledo about three years ago, and the developments of that meeting indicated a live interest in the proposition, but no definite action was taken at that time. Since then these efforts have been continued, and the foremost movers in the work were Morrissey of the trainmen and Hanahan of the firemen. The A. F. of L. officials for the past two years have been endeavoring to enforce an affiliation to the federation on the part of the brotherhoods without success. The two conservative brotherhoods, namely, the engineers and conductors, being the stumbling block in the way of affiliation, and developments for the past two years indicate, on the part of Morrissey and Hanahan, an effort to dominate the movement, Morrissey endeavoring to merge the conductors with the trainmen and Hanahan the engineers with the firemen.

This has been a fortunate development, from the standpoint of common sense, and the developments for the last six months, which eliminated Hanahan from the movement for personal reasons, and the elimination of Morrissey, which will take place in January, clears the atmosphere in that direction and leaves the control of the brotherhoods in the hands of conservative leaders. These facts taken into consideration makes the action at Denver doubly significant. The two organizations of carmen, headed by Ronemus and Richardson, having been brought together at Denver, and their differences in a measure healed, would indicate that but one organization of car workers may be in the field in the next year. Flannery and Braggins, of the freight handlers and clerks, respectively, who have been at loggerheads for years, have buried the hatchet at Denver, and it behooves the railway management throughout the United States to watch this new organization and prevent their ever obtaining sufficient strength to hold the balance of power.

The most important work facing the railway management at the present time, in the estimation of the writer, should be directed to prevent the merging of the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen and the International Association of Car Workers, for in the division of power of these two organizations has resulted comparative peace, hence it would seem desirable to prevent, as far as possible, this merger. The significance of the legislation enacted at Denver is that it has been along the lines advocated by the Socialists and Industrial Workers of the World, whose attitude and claim for recognition has been industrial unions in place of trade autonomy.

In the formation of this railway employees' department at Denver upwards of half a million organized workers are pledged to the support of the rules and regulations yet to be adopted. Since the convention adjourned the sum of $25,000 has been provided for by special assessment levied upon the various organizations for the purpose of providing funds to establish this movement on a sound economic basis.

That circular was issued by the agency which we will show you later was engaged in various other cities extracting dollars from the railroads for the purpose of simply destroying organizations.

Chairman WALSH. At this point, Mr. Wharton, we will suspend, and, gentlemen, we will stand adjourned until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

(Thereupon, at 4.30 p. m., Wednesday, April 7, 1915, an adjournment was taken until 10 o'clock Thursday morning, April 8, 1915.)

CHICAGO, ILL., Thursday, April 8, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners Lennon, Aishton, O'Connell, Ballard, and Garretson.

Chairman WALSH. Please be in order; we will proceed.

Mr. Wharton, we will proceed now.

TESTIMONY OF MR. A. O. WHARTON—Continued.

MR. WHARTON. Continuing where we left off yesterday, I have copies of letters here in further connection with the detective agencies.

Here is a letter, dated St. Louis, January 19, 1915, to Mr. P. J. Condon, 403 McGill Building, Washington, D. C., as follows [reading]:

"DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Owing to the fact that we are having considerable difficulty at several points throughout our respective jurisdictions in regard to the employment of some of our members by the people who are backing the Mediator, and having been informed that you have gone into this matter quite thoroughly, securing information which can be used to good advantage in dis-abusing the minds of our members in connection with the purposes of this publication, I would be very glad to have you send me a copy of the data secured.

"Trusting that you will be able to favor me with the above at an early date, I am, with best wishes,

"Faternally, yours,

"A. O. WHARTON,

"President Railway Employees' Department."

In reply is the following letter [reading]:

WASHINGTON, D.C., January 22, 1915.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON, St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Your esteemed favor of the 19th to hand and contents noted. I beg to advise that in the same mail I have a similar request from Brother A. McGillivray. I am herewith inclosing a carbon copy of my reply to Brother McGillivray, which I think will be a sufficient reply to your favor of the 19th.

With best wishes, I am,

Faternally, yours,

P. J. CONLON,

International Vice President.

A letter to A. McGillivray, Cincinnati, Ohio [reads]:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 22, 1915.

Mr. A. MCGILLIVRAY,

Dennison Hotel, Cincinnati, Ohio.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Your telegram of the 21st to hand and contents noted. I beg to advise that the investigation that I made in regard to the Mediator developed the fact that J. K. Turner, of Cleveland, Ohio, who has been notorious as conducting a detective agency for the last 20 years in Ohio for the purpose of supplying spies to employers and hiring men to break strikes, is the main editor of the Mediator, with headquarters at Room 608, Rockefeller Building, in Cleveland.

If you will note, the Mediator does not bear the union label, and some years ago the Cleveland Citizen—the official organ of the central body of Cleveland, Ohio—made an exposure of the J. K. Turner Detective Agency and printed a long list of union men and officials of different unions that were operators under this company, and I would suggest that you drop a line to Mr. Max Hayes, editor of the Cleveland Citizen, for further information concerning this gentleman, as he knows more or less about him and his methods. As a leopard can not change his spots, neither can J. K. Turner change his manner of doing business.

Faternally, yours,

P. J. CONLON,

International Vice President.

And another letter of February 9, 1915, to Mr. McGillivray, as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, February 9, 1915.

Mr. ARCH MCGILLIVRAY,

Birmingham, Ala.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Pursuant to my promise to you to look into the career of Mr. J. K. Turner, president of the Square Deal Club and editor of the Mediator, I beg to advise that I have not found out anything new over that which I already knew, viz, that said J. K. Turner operated a detective bureau on Euclid Avenue, in Cleveland, for several years, and made a business of furnishing employers with operatives, for the purpose of spying on employees and foremen as well, as well as reporting the proceedings of union meetings in the year of 1901.

Through the medium of Mr. Turner's stenographer, to whom one of our representatives was paying attention, quite a lot of manuscripts from Mr. Turner's office fell into our hands, and his whole system of operation, together with a list of his operators were exposed in the Cleveland Citizen, at that time an official organ of organized labor in the city of Cleveland. Mr. Turner never saw fit to question the exposure or sue the Citizen for libel, thereby establishing beyond any shadow of doubt that the exposure as made in the Cleveland Citizen was authentic.

Among the list of operators were machinists, blacksmiths, painters, carpenters, and in fact every line of trade, most of whom carried union cards, and who were afterwards expelled for their duplicity.

Now, Mr. Turner appears in a new rôle with the same old crew. A few weeks ago our business agent, William Jack, of Cleveland, called on him at his office in the Rockefeller Building here. Business Agent Jack frankly told him that he had come to learn about his Square Deal Club and further told him that he was the local business agent of the machinists, so as to have no suspicions regarding the nature of his visit. Jack opened the ball by telling Turner that on account of his past record of running a scab-herding detective agency, organized labor looked on his scheme as one of the many now afloat to divide the railroad workers.

Turner therefore pressed several buttons on his desk, and in walked several men, one a machinist, one a pattern maker, and another a boiler maker, and so on until eight, all told, appeared, representing different trades. Turner then asked each one to outline to Jack his idea of the Square Deal Club. Each one in turn told Jack of the get-together plan, and the peculiar part of it was the stories were almost identical, showing the lesson had been learned from a textbook.

All this merely indicated that Turner had just changed the name of his business. It is the same old Turner and the same old crew sailing under a different banner.

Now, if you want further information you may write Business Agent Jack or Mr. Max Hayes, 979 Parkwood Drive, N. E., Cleveland, Ohio, either of whom are able to give you a line on Turner, but like all men in the same business they hide in a deep hole, and it is hard to dig them out in the limelight.

Fraternally, yours,

P. J. CONLON,
Intl. Vice President I. A. of M.

"The functions assumed by these so-called private detective agencies is unquestionably one of Government, and should be given serious consideration by those in authority. Theoretically the private detective agency may be all right, but in actual practice we find that these agencies do not confine their operations to the legitimate calling of detecting criminals.

"In reference to the furnishing of 'skilled mechanics and men and women detectives for any occupation or business' and specifically mentioning among other things, 'labor agitation' and of being 'prepared to furnish strike breakers and guards,' this establishes the fact that these so-called detective agencies do not confine themselves to detecting crime and criminals, unless it be considered a crime for men and women to organize for mutual protection and advancement, morally, physically, and mentally. The skilled mechanics referred to are usually members in good standing in the union; if not at the time of their entering the service of the detective agency, they become members as soon as possible, and as soon as this is accomplished they begin operations by furnishing the agency with the names of the active members of the union. This class of operatives are commonly known as 'inside or cover-up men.' They receive a salary anywhere from $100 to $200 per month and expenses, and in the agency are known as operative number so-and-so. Any operative who fails to furnish the kind of information wanted by the agency is called to account, given positive instructions containing a detailed statement of information he must furnish, and notified to return all letters received, including the report, by return mail.

"In connection with this phase of the private detective agency, their work does not in the slightest degree bear any relation to crime or the violation of any law, unless it be at the instigation of the 'detective' who originates the proposition, and whether or not he is successful in securing the cooperation of a fellow member proceeds to send in a report that the member or members are a dangerous lot of men. This kind of work establishes his reputation, and he becomes what is termed a reliable 'operator.' The agency in turn informs the employer, and the man or men involved, who up to the time of the appearance of these spies in their midst had always been recognized as honest, reliable workmen, become in the eyes of the employer and the uninitiated, dangerous and undesirable employees. These agencies claim that a 'few dollars intelligently expended for detective service may save thousands later,' whereas in our opin-tion the actual cause of many strikes that have resulted in the loss of thousands, and in some cases millions of dollars, can be traced directly to them.

"Labor disputes form one of the principal assets of this organized band of trouble makers, grafters, and crooks, incorporated under the name of 'detective agencies.'

"These agencies have not accomplished anything that could not have been achieved by the Government itself; on the other hand they have reached a point where they actually constitute a menace to the industrial peace of the Nation. If the thousands and thousands of dollars now being spent by employers in this manner were intelligently applied in improving the conditions of employment of their employees, we are of the opinion that much better results would be obtained, and most of these so-called detective agencies would be compelled to go out of business if the employers of labor withdrew their patronage. We recognize the necessity of maintaining a legitimate detective force under the direct supervision of and maintained by the Government, but not the right of individuals to usurp the functions of the Government for personal gain."

CHICAGO & EASTERN ILLINOIS BONUS SYSTEM.

TOLEDO, OHIO, December 11, 1914.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,
5 and 6 Ohio Building, St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Relative to the matter of the bonus system of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad, we herewith inclose you letter from Attorney Lyford, general counsel for the receivers, under date of December 8, containing a statement of the bonus system, which statement was prepared by Mr. Epler, who is the superintendent of motive power for this company.

We would appreciate it very much, if, at your convenience, you would write us, giving us the benefit of any suggestions that you care to make concerning this statement.

Yours, very truly,

MULHOLLAND & HARTMAN.

[William J. Jackson and Edwin W. Winter, receivers Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad; W. H. Lyford, general counsel.]

714 McORMICK BUILDING,
Chicago, December 8, 1914.

Mr. CHARLES HARTMAN,
The Nicholas Building, Toledo, Ohio.

DEAR MR. HARTMAN: In compliance with your request for a statement of the bonus system, our Mr. Epler has prepared such a statement, and I give you below a copy thereof.

Statement by Mr. Epler.

"The bonus system is a method of paying a workman a premium over and above his regular wages for performing or completing an operation in a time, either closely approaching to or less than a definite and predetermined standard time for performing the operation. The operation is closely studied in all its details while watching the workman perform it, and from this study, after eliminating all unnecessary movements and lost time, and instituting improved methods in doing the work, a definite or so-called standard time is set for performing the operation. The relation that this standard time bears to the actual time which the workman takes to perform the operation determines his efficiency, and from his efficiency his extra wages or bonus are determined on a fixed percentage basis.

"Bonus is paid to the workman for all efficiency in excess of 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent, the percentage increasing as the time taken to perform the work decreases. This bonus or premium payment is a percentage of the wages earned or paid for the actual time the man is working; thus, if the standard time for an operation is one hour, the workman's wages 30 cents per hour, and he performs the operation in one hour, he receives his wages (30 cents) and an additional premium of 20 per cent (which is the fixed percentage at 100 per cent efficiency) of his hourly rate, or 30 cents, this giving him a premium of 6 per cent (cents) for performing the work in the standard time. If he performs the operation

In an hour and a half, no bonus or premium is paid. He is, however, paid his regular wages at the rate of 30 cents per hour for the hour and a half, or 45 cents. If he performs the operation in any period of time less than an hour and a half, his efficiency, of course, increases, and he gets the percentage of his wages in accordance with the following table:

Per cent efficiency.	Bonus, per cent of wages.	Per cent efficiency.	Bonus, per cent of wages.	Per cent efficiency.	Bonus, per cent of wages.
66.7.....	0.00	75.0.....	1.30	83.5.....	5.25
67.0.....	.01	75.5.....	1.45	84.0.....	5.55
67.5.....	.02	76.0.....	1.60	84.5.....	5.90
68.0.....	.04	76.5.....	1.80	85.0.....	6.25
68.5.....	.07	77.0.....	2.00	85.5.....	6.60

"In this table you will note the percentage of his wages paid as bonus increases rapidly until 90 per cent efficiency is reached, after which point each per cent increase in efficiency increases the percentage of wages paid as bonus 1 per cent.

"In handling the bonus, description of the method used in freight-car repairs is typical. When the car requiring repairs comes on the repair track it is inspected by a man appointed to that duty. He records on a card all the work that is to be done. The timekeeper takes this card and opposite each operation of repairs that is to be made marks the standard hours set for performing it. This card is then tacked on the car. It serves two purposes—first, notify the workman that repairs are needed, and, second, to show him the standard time for performing the work. The workman signs the card and notes thereon the time that he starts to work on the car. When the work is completed he also notes the time of completion. The difference between the starting and finishing time, of course, gives him the total time that he has worked on the car. A comparison of the time that he has worked on the car with the standard time to perform the work gives him his efficiency.

"In addition to this, workmen are notified by the timekeeper after the car is finished of the time that they consumed in repairing the car, the standard time for doing the work, and their efficiency in performing same. The workmen, by retaining these notices, have a check against the amounts paid them at the end of the month and from these can calculate their earnings and premium. However, bonus is not calculated on each individual car, but is calculated at the end of each pay-roll period. The total hours worked by the men and the total hours of standard time are used to determine their efficiency, and from this average efficiency their premium for the period is calculated. Thus, a workman working a period of 2 weeks at 9 hours per day, with the wage rate of 25 cents per hour, would be paid for the 12 days' period a regular rate of $27. If, during this period, he had secured 108 hours of standard time he would be paid a bonus of 20 per cent of the $27, or a premium of $5.40. If, on the other hand, he had only accumulated 97.2 hours of standard time, he would have been working at an efficiency of 90 per cent, and would be paid 10 per cent of his regular wages as a bonus, or $2.70. Again, and as is the average condition, had he accumulated more standard hours than he actually worked his bonus or premium payment would be larger. For instance, had he accumulated 118 standard hours, his efficiency would be 110 per cent, and he would be paid a premium of 30 per cent of his wages as bonus, or $8.10.

"The advantages to the workmen of the bonus plan over the piecework system are:

"The guaranteed day rate, which fixes the minimum wage and one which the workman agreed upon when he secured employment.

9770 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

"It furnishes for him the full advantage of any increase that he may be given in his regular rate, while with piecework the price is the same for all, regardless of their hourly rate. Quite frequently skilled workmen have to perform certain operations in connection with their regular duties that are usually assigned to less skilled workmen, and under piecework the price is made for the less skilled and lesser paid class of workmen, with the result that the higher paid workman loses the advantage of his higher rate. With the bonus, it being on a time-limit plan, he is paid a premium on his regular rate, based on the time he takes to perform the operation.

[In re to bonus system, C. & E. I. Ry.]

St. Louis, Mo., December 15, 1914.

Messrs. MULHOLLAND & HARTMAN,
Suite 1311-17, the Nicholas Building, Toledo, Ohio.

GENTLEMEN: Replying to your favor dated the 11th instant, in which you inclosed a statement on the bonus system prepared by Mr. Epler, Supt. of M. P. of the C. & E. I. Ry.

I am herewith inclosing you a copy of an address delivered by Mr. John P. Frey, which I believe will furnish you with a splendid argument against the bonus system. I am also giving you a brief statement of my views on the subject.

In Mr. Epler's statement you will note that he has entirely evaded one of the most essential features in dealing with the employment of workmen. His statement contains absolutely no reference to the right of the workman to collective bargaining. Mr. Epler is already on record as saying that he did not consider that the agreement had been violated in introducing the bonus system. Yet this agreement, such as it is, represented collective bargaining and the right of the employees to be represented by duly authorized committeemen in all matters relating to conditions of employment, hours of labor, rates of pay, etc., without the right of collective bargaining, we immediately place the workman at a great disadvantage.

According to Mr. Epler's own statement in the first paragraph, "The bonus system is a method of paying a workman a premium over and above his regular wages." In the next to the last paragraph he states, "The guaranteed day rate which fixes the minimum wage and one which the workman agreed upon when he secured employment." These two excerpts indicate very clearly that Mr. Epler has in mind not only the right to employ an individual workman at a wage which appears to be one of mutual agreement, while in reality it represents an employment based upon the lowest bid submitted by the workman who desires to connect himself with a job, and whose bid must in the natural course of things be more or less determined by the necessity for employment with which the individual workman is confronted, but he goes even further than this; he has in reserve still another method of controlling the wage of the workman, after the jobless man has set a minimum hourly rate for his services, as outlined above, believing that he can in a measure overcome this low hourly rate by earning a bonus, he finds the employer regulating the bonus in a manner that leaves him absolutely at their mercy as an individual, and having no voice in the setting of the bonus he again becomes confronted with the problem of competing with not only a condition he has had no voice in establishing but is forced to accept a bonus rate that has been established by the employer, who has used every available means to ascertain, under the most favorable conditions, what can be done by the best and swiftest workmen, the system of eliminating all unnecessary movements or operations leaves nothing to chance in so far as to the amount of work that can be performed under the most favorable conditions by specially selected workmen is concerned. In addition to this, Mr. Epler injects a very innocent-looking proposition in the following words: "However, bonus is not calculated on each individual car, but is calculated at the end of each pay-roll period," which means still another method of holding the workman to the minimum hourly rate.

For illustration: A workman may, if furnished steady work for the first week of his two-week pay-roll period, be able to earn a bonus of 20 or 30 per cent, but in the second week he is compelled to wait for either work or materials or work on the low hourly rate, and this reduces his bonus in proportion to his average performance for the entire pay-roll period.

These efficiency systems lack one essential feature of equity, the workman does not share an increase in his earnings in proportion to the increased output. The employer assumes that in purchasing a machine, or introducing any other method that will increase the output per man employed, he is entitled to the full benefit thereof, the proof of which is in evidence, by noting the earnings of the men, as compared with the output before and after the introduction of improved machinery and methods of performing the work.

The efficiency experts admit that their system does not take into account or make any provision for the workman whose days of usefulness are numbered by his ability to keep up to the standard of efficiency required, and this standard time is, according to Mr. Epler's own statement determined by "closely studying each operation in all its details, after eliminating all unnecessary movements and lost time and instituting improved methods in doing the work, a definite or so-called standard time is set for performing the operation." Under such a system it is readily seen that only workmen capable of maintaining the pace set are considered desirable employees, and just as soon as they begin to fall below the standard set they are cast upon the scrap heap, and once it is established that they can not keep up the pace no other employer wants them. As one evidence of the result of this system, and its effect on the workman, we now find many employers who will not employ men after they have reached the age of 40, and in some instances as low as 35, while others set the age limit at 45.

In addition to this, efficiency experts maintain that their system does not recognize the right of collective bargaining, without which the workmen are absolutely at the mercy of not only the employer, but every subordinate official from the lead or gang foreman to the superintendent and manager. The recognition and establishment of this system means slavery in its most abject form, even to a greater degree than that of the chattel slave, because as a chattel slave it was to the interest of the owner to see that these slaves were properly fed and housed; to do otherwise meant a property loss, whereas under this other system the employer has no interest in the workman other than his ability to perform the service exacted, and when he fails in this he is cast out and another secured to take his place.

Labor unions are not opposed to any system which means greater production, provided the interests of the workman are safeguarded and he becomes a beneficiary in proportion to the results obtained.

We demand that our inalienable rights as human beings be not abridged, and in the name of humanity we shall never willingly accept as a condition of employment any system which has for its purpose the lowering of the standard of living and which further increases the existing inequality in the distribution of the wealth produced.

I have not had the time to go into details as fully as I would like to, but trust these few statements will in a measure be of some service in explaining our position.

Very truly, yours,

A. O. WHARTON, President.

In line with that policy, we desire to introduce here the form of application blank that has recently been introduced by the Chicago & Eastern Illinois system, which I believe is in line with our general contention that the introduction of these systems lead to the physical examination and other systems that are introduced in the line of efficiency that has a tendency and shows the evil and final results of these systems if they are not properly controlled.

This is a form of blank which I will read just briefly—the important features connected therewith.

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed.

MR. WHARTON (reading). "There are three ways to improve the character of the service: 1. Employ a better class of men. 2. Discharge the vicious and incompetent. 3. Educate those kept."

"So far as possible men should be employed from those living along the line of the road. Their normal character, physical fitness, mental capacity, and past record should be rigidly examined."

And emphasized in heavy type: "Only the best should be employed."

It provides for the signer of this application as follows:

"DEAR SIR: I hereby apply for a situation as ———, or in such other service or employment as may be necessary or required from time to time by the company, or my superior officers, and, if accepted, agree to observe all the rules and regulations, to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors, to conduct myself properly whether on or off duty, to perform my duties to the best of my ability, and in the event of my leaving the service from any cause, I hereby authorize the company and its officers to answer any and all inquiries as to my conduct and qualifications while in such service and, so far as they may know, the cause of my leaving the same."

Then it asks to give the state, height, weight, color of hair, color of eyes, general health, education (number of years spent in school); name of wife (if married); residence; name of father (if living); name of mother (if living); names and ages of children (if any); names and addresses of nearest relatives (if no family or parents living).

Previous railroad experience (past three years).

Cause for leaving last situation (explain fully).

Previous service with this company (if any).

Have you any physical ailments or defects, such as lameness, deafness, color-blindness, or shortsightedness? (Each question should be specifically answered.)

Are you habitually addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors and do you promise you will not become so while in the employ of this company?

The following persons will certify to my good character:

There are spaces after each one of those to be filled in.

"I accept employment with the full understanding that if my references or services do not prove satisfactory I will not be retained in the service."

A place for signature and a place for witness.

"Application approved for employment as _____."

"NOTE.—This application must be filled out by applicant in presence of and witnessed by the head of the department in which the applicant is to be employed."

That application would place the workman absolutely at the mercy of the employer if for any cause he might desire to get rid of him or relieve him from service in the employ of the company.

Commissioner LENNON. Is that application generally used on the one road you are talking about?

Mr. WHARTON. That is a type. It is very similar. We have here another; this case which has come to our notice in the form of a telegram addressed to myself at St. Louis, dated April 2:

"We have a change of officials and the applications of employees to date have been misplaced or destroyed. The new general manager requests all employees to make new applications, giving personal history and places of employment for five years previous to working for the F. S. & W. Advise by wire.

"D. E. WINFREE."

This is simply a typical case of following out that same line on another road.

Scientific management and efficiency systems, the railroads have quite generally agitated for, and, in some instances, forced the men to accept conditions that we feel safe in saying are detrimental to the men, the railroads, the public, and the human family in its entirety.

The following article expresses our views, and in our opinion clearly points out some of the dangers of the so-called scientific management and efficiency methods. We have, I think, a splendid analysis of the system—efficiency—analyzed from the viewpoint of a man well qualified in every respect, which I would like to have injected into the proceedings, by John P. Frey, editor of the International Molders' Journal—of the International Molders' Union Journal, as follows [reading]:

THE RELATIONSHIP OF SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT TO LABOR.

By John P. Frey.

Address by the editor of the International Molders' Journal before the Western Economic Society, Chicago, March 14, 1913:

The problems identified with the development of our industries will undoubtedly be viewed and analyzed from as many conflicting angles as there are classes in the community. The manufacturer, the business man, the professional man, and the workingman, each will have a different viewpoint; each will reach a decision influenced, to a greater or lesser degree, by his own self-interest. The final solution will be found, not in the dictum of any one of these classes, but in the equitable and harmonious combination of every one of them. I admit, beforehand, the difficulty of securing such harmony, but am strongly of the opinion that an exchange of views and their unbiased consideration and discussion by an assemblage of this kind will go far to promote it.

It is as a member of a trade-union composed of skilled mechanics that I am endeavoring to examine and analyze "scientific management" in its relation to labor.

That system for the increasing of production, popularly called scientific management, is a subject of sufficient importance to the wage earner and the industries of our country to warrant the careful examination of all thoughtful men; for, in addition to the problem of production, it involves the workman's standard of mechanical efficiency, his physical welfare, and his social status.

If scientific management in its final analysis fails to increase the workman's earnings, develop his mechanical ability, lengthen his period of usefulness, elevate his standard of living, and distribute in an equitable manner, between capital and labor, the gains from increased productiveness, it has failed to deserve the title conferred upon it.

With the object of avoiding any confusion of terminology in the discussion of the subject, the following definition is submitted:

By scientific management we have in mind those methods for increasing production which have been advocated within very recent years by several gentlemen who are recognized as among the most prominent advocates and exponents of systems for the standardization, systematization, planning, and routing of work in manufacturing establishments and in offices, the grouping and operating of machines to their greatest efficiency, coupled with time studies of manual movements, the elimination of unnecessary motions by employees while at work and their stimulation to greater effort of piecework, bonus, task, differential, premium, and other systems, rather than by a daily-wage rate.

Any system which will lower the cost of production by eliminating inefficient management or unnecessary labor through the adoption of more practical methods of operation should be welcomed and encouraged, for inefficiency in any form can only result in placing a needless burden on the cost of production and to the extent that it exists retard in inverse ratio the progress of industry and the production of wealth. Whether it is in the machine or the workman himself, all motions which do not accomplish definite and practical results, all unnecessary movements result only in wasted energy, and wasted energy is a dead loss. With any system which will eliminate useless labor the American trade-union movement will be found in full accord.

From an examination of scientific management as presented in the books prepared upon the subject by some of its best-known advocates and exponents, it would appear that it aims to secure greater production from machinery and workmen:

(a) By systematizing, standardizing, and overseeing all work, by speed, repair, inspector and gang bosses, or functional foremen and overforemen.

(b) By having time studies made by experts with split-second watches in hand, with which to note the time consumed in performing each motion made in connection with the work.

(c) By having studies made with the object of eliminating all useless motions, so that production can be increased.

(d) By having the time to perform a given piece of work determined by an expert from the records secured.

(e) By the minute subdivision and specialization of the work, and the employment, to the largest degree possible, of laborers trained to work under the system of subdivision and specialization, rather than the employment of skilled mechanics.

(f) By the payment of a bonus or premium to workmen for measuring up their day's work to the task set, and the payment of similar inducements to the foremen and overforemen for maintaining the quantity of production of the gangs of workmen or the departments under their charge.

As presented in the works upon the subject, scientific management as applied to workmen moves with the smoothness of a well-oiled and perfected machine, in which each one performs his part with the accuracy of a mechanically and mathematically perfect tooth on a gear wheel, when it meshes with the teeth of another wheel in transmitting power. But whether this system in every-day practice accomplishes with workmen what it seems to accomplish with them in books is a question which we desire to investigate.

Before entering into an examination of the relationship of scientific management of labor, there is one fact which is deserving of consideration in connection with the discussion. The American workmen, as verified by the great mass of statistics upon the subject, produce more within a given time than the workmen of any other country. He has no equal as a producer; this being due partly to his mental and physical alertness and ambition, and partly to the various systems of specializing and speeding up which were well developed before scientific management was brought forward as an industrial stimulant. That he has worked under such high pressure as to prematurely age him has been well demonstrated by the policy of many corporations to hire no workmen over 40 years of age or when their hair is tinged with gray.

High tension and intensity of application have become a marked feature of our industries. Machinery is operated to its physical limit, and when worn out is thrown on the scrap heap; workmen, likewise, are expected to work to their physical limit, and like the worn-out machines they, too, are liable to find themselves in the industrial scrap heap when there should still be years of effective labor in their minds and bodies. As illustrating this tendency in our American methods of production there is the illuminating testimony given by Mr. Harrah, of the Midvale Steel Co., before the congressional Committee on Labor, March 1, 1900, a portion of the committee's record for that date giving questions and answers [reading]:

"Mr. GRAHAM. I was going to ask whether you thought that you could put your machines so as to accomplish getting out more work in 8 hours than you can now in 10?"

"Mr. HARRAH. No; the machines are worked to their fullest capacity now.

"Mr. GRAHAM. You would have to get some kind of improved machinery?"

"Mr. HARRAH. We have the most improved kind of machinery now; but we make it a rule to run a machine to break. For instance, the life of a hammer bar may be two years. If that hammer bar does not break within two years, I go for the forge master, because I know he is not getting the work he ought to out of the forge. It is the same way in the machine shop. If a lathe, the natural life of which might be two years, does not break down before that, I would go to the engineer in charge.

"Mr. GRAHAM. Everything is run to its full capacity now?"

"Mr. HARRAH. Absolutely. Yes, sir; we have absolutely no regard for machinery or men."

The Midvale Steel Co. is one of the plants where scientific management was first applied by one of its leading exponents.

Instead of burdening this paper with additional evidences indicating the intensity of labor in this country, the impressions of two of the world's greatest thinkers as to its effects will be submitted.

On the occasion of his last visit to the United States, that eminent philosopher, Herbert Spencer, after noting the intensity with which our toilers were working, declared that the time had arrived to preach and practice "The gospel of relaxation." Last year another famous British scientist, Sir Thomas Oliver, visited our shores. After attending the Congress of Hygiene at Washington he visited a number of our industrial centers, expressing some of his impressions later on, in part as follows:

"Generally speaking, work is rushed too much and life is lived at too high pressure in the United States. There is no reason for either. Work and the love of work for the monetary gain it brings are more characteristic of Americans than of most other people, and yet what is the gain if life is shortened by the strain imposed upon it in trying to obtain these? A nation whose workmen are old at 40 is certainly not only not rich in men, but it is not doing its best for them."

That the American workmen are now working at higher speed and producing more within a given time than the workmen of any other country we are confident can not be successfully questioned.

With these brief preliminary thoughts, we may proceed to more carefully examine scientific management in its relation to labor, as its influence and effect upon labor are of more importance than any other feature it may possess.

While scientific management in some of its phases has entered into the most minute details, on some important factors connected with production it touches but lightly and indefinitely, while other equally important ones are practically ignored.

This is particularly true of its attitude toward workmen, the flesh-and-blood human beings who are to be developed into semiautomatic attachments to machines or rigid and inflexible forms of directing production if one feature of this system is to be applied.

The efficiency of a workman is not to be determined solely by his ability to continuously feed and operate a machine or perform some other task with a never-changing motion at high speed, acquired as the result of time and motion studies by those who may be employed as experts in this work. To a very large extent his efficiency will depend upon his alertness of mind and physical responsiveness, and his ability to maintain both under the numbing influence of his monotonous task.

During recent years there has scarcely been a convention of employers but that papers are read which bewail the difficulty of securing competent mechanics and proposing plans by which mechanical knowledge among workmen may be increased.

Trade-unions have been unjustly accused on the one hand of preventing apprenticeship, while on the other, and in contradiction of that charge, an effort is made to discover the reasons why the boys and the rising generation seem unwilling to apprentice themselves in trades. So strong is this disinclination on their part that during the past decade the wages paid to apprentices have been practically doubled, and yet in many industries it is most difficult to secure or retain apprentices. It is our opinion that the intense specialization and subdivision of work as developed in our American system of production is the most prominent cause, for the boys and their parents have come to believe that apprenticeship in most cases does not mean the development of mechanics, but rather the production of specialists skilled only in some simple subdivision into which the method of production has been developed, and unable because of their lack of mechanical and manual skill to hold their own as journeymen mechanics on the termination of apprenticeship.

In Germany, that country which to-day stands out so prominently as a land where all-embracing scientific methods are applied, the workmen have reached a degree of efficiency which makes them the peers in mechanical ability of those of any other nation, and this efficiency on their part is the result of the broad and thoroughgoing mechanical and theoretical education which they are given as apprentices, and the opportunities which are afforded to them afterwards as mechanics to become familiar with the theory as well as the practice required in the industry in which they are engaged.

Through their cooperative courses, in which the coming generation of engineers are being educated, our leading universities are recognizing the principle that theoretical knowledge must be supplemented by practical experience in the industries during the course of study, if the highest efficiency is to be attained. And likewise the manufacturing establishments are learning that well-equipped superintendents and foremen can not secure satisfactory results from workmen deficient in mechanical skill and knowledge.

Advocates of scientific management will contend that it is not their intention to speed the workman to his extreme physical limit, and it is quite possible, by quoting detached expressions from their works on the subject, to give a color of truth to this contention; but no practical man acquainted with the methods of production and the influences which emanate from the management of a corporation through the superintendent, foremen, and subforemen to the workmen, to stimulate their productivity, will fail to realize that, even though the system of scientific management with its time studies, its precise form of organization, and its premiums and bonuses to workmen and foremen for quantity in production, was established in any plant by the best trained and most just experts and with a proper care that no workman would be driven to speedy physical exhaustion. It must soon degenerate into a system under which each workman would be forced to labor to the physical breaking point or drop out to make room for others whose vitality had not yet been exhausted.

In fact, in the well-known reference to the laborers in the Bethlehem Steel Works, Mr. Taylor, in his book on shop management, says, "The tasks were all purposely made so severe that not more than one out of five (perhaps even a smaller percentage than this) could keep up."

Perhaps no one has had a greater opportunity of studying the effects of various systems of shop management on the workmen employed than Judge Higgins, president of the Court of Conciliation and Arbitration for the Commonwealth of Australia, and as his views on this question are most valuable in connection with the subject now being discussed, a few excerpts from a recent decision which he prepared are submitted. The case was one arising in the shoe industry, and those portions of the decision having a direct bearing on the subject under consideration read:

"The claim of the employees in these proceedings as to apprentices is, in effect, that there should be no boys employed unless apprenticed to learn some substantial portion of the work of a factory; that there should be no 'improvers'; that the number even of apprentices should be limited to one apprentice to every four journeymen; that the wages should be settled for each year of apprenticeship; that the apprentice should be properly taught.

"I am glad to see that the claim makes, in the main, in the direction of industrial efficiency. At present all the conditions of boy labor in this great Australian industry tend in the direction of inefficiency, and as the men trained to make boots by handwork from start to finish pass from the trade there is every prospect that in place of intelligent, skilled artisans the Commonwealth will have thousands of anemic, ill-developed, undertrained factory slaves—youths unfitted for any work but the feeding of some one insatiable machine—youths prematurely put under the strain of bread winning and soon to be replaced by other youths ad infinitum.

"The employees want, as far as it is possible, to eliminate improvers, to prevent the existence of such a class at all, to stop this pestilent manufacture of imperfect tradesmen. They want to prevent capable workmen of average capacity from being put out of work by men who submit to work for a smaller wage on some ground of incapacity, generally actual, sometimes only alleged.

"From the point of view of this court, whose ideal is industrial peace, I feel even more strongly than before that the system of improvers as it now stands is a perpetual menace to the peace of the community.

"Another point is that the improver is often kept exclusively for many years to one single machine of the simpler class, until he becomes extraordinarily apt to it. His speed is an argument for greater speed on the part of those before him and behind him in the team of men and boys working at some process. The worker before him must keep him fed with stuff; the worker after him must not let the stuff accumulate, and the strain becomes intense. The specialized improver is often used to force the pace. But if the improver lose his little fraction of a job, he is useless for any other job. To get a similar job elsewhere he must fight. His only weapon is to offer to submit to a reduction of wages, and inevitably he forces down the claims of the journeymen who are looking for work.

"But what is the proper remedy? Or, rather—as my functions are limited—what is the proper order of this court to make under the circumstances? I can not undertake the responsibility of telling every employer in the Commonwealth what he ought to do in case of every employee at every stage on every day of his employment and under all circumstances. I conceive it to be my duty to leave every employer free to carry on his own business on his own system that he may make the greatest profit within his reach, so long as he does not perpetuate industrial trouble or endanger industrial peace, and that means so long as he satisfies the essential human needs of his employees and does not leave them under a sense of injustice.

"In the strain of competition the pressure on the employer is often very great, and he ought to be free to choose his employees on their merits and according to his own exigencies, free to make use of new machines, of improved methods, of financial advantages, of advantages of locality, of superior knowledge—free, in short, to put the utmost pressure on anything and everything except human life. Unless there is to be industrial war at every turn, human life must not be treated in the game of competition as if it were a ball to be kicked. This, the most valuable asset of the State, must be protected, whatever else suffers.

"Extreme specialization injures the boy in his manhood and as a tradesman, and it is the cause of much industrial disturbance. Extreme specialization may make the output greater and cheaper and may at the same time be injurious to the men and to the public."

The human factor can not be ignored in the industries. To-day the wage earner's stimulation to greater physical exertion has been highly developed through the constant pressure brought to bear upon superintendents and foremen. Elaborate cost sheets are prepared monthly by every department, and those showing the lowest cost for production in similar departments are sent to the superintendents of those which show a higher cost, with the polite request: "Please report to us on the reasons why your department shows a higher cost for production during the month than Department A." Under this stimulus there generally is but one course pursued, that being to speed up labor.

Under the great concentration which has resulted in huge corporations the former bond of personal interest between employer and workmen has disappeared; neither now knows the other; the one is only a number on a brass check or card; and the other may live a thousand miles away. The one who holds a brass check is forced to realize his position by the treatment accorded him by a foreman spurred on by the desire to secure a bonus for the large output of his department and by the rigid discipline to which he must conform and the promptness with which he is discharged for any reason.

Under present methods of production, where thousands of workmen are employed by a single corporation, it may be difficult to reintroduce the element of human sympathy between workmen and employer, but a truly scientific system of management can not overlook this most important factor if it is to endure.

One feature of scientific management which has interested labor is its evident opposition to collective bargaining between organized workmen and their employers. The claim is practically made by some of its leading exponents that the system can not be successfully applied unless the huge corporation insists on dealing with the workman as an individual, and then of bringing every possible pressure, including discharge, upon him. A brief extract from a letter, which we were informed was written by one of the most prominent exponents of scientific management to a firm which had tried the system for six years without success bears witness to this fact. It reads:

"Have you tried the incisive plan of centering on one man instead of going at the whole shooting match at once? I think the failure is due to the lack of patient persistence on the part of the employers, and then to the lack of centering right onto a single man. No workman can long resist the help and persuasion of five foremen over him. He will either do the work as he is told or leave."

The implication is not difficult to grasp. Where the large corporations have had a free hand in centering their stimulus to activity upon the individual workman and determining the conditions under which workmen will be employed, they have frequently accomplished results which, while probably showing increasing production per man, have also developed conditions of labor which have shocked the moral and humane sense of the Nation. An illustration is afforded by the iron and steel industry which, according to the report of the Federal Department of Labor, covering the month of May, 1910, indicated that 29 per cent of the 172,706 workmen covered by the investigation, worked 12 hours per day, 7 days in the week—84 hours in all; and that every second week, when the shifts changed from day to night or vice versa, many of these workmen were forced to remain on duty without relief for from 18 to 24 hours. Of these 172,706 men, who included all unskilled and skilled workmen in the plants where investigations were made, 85,812 or 49.69 per cent, received less than 18 cents per hour.

Practically every abuse, every arbitrary and unjust condition affecting workmen which has crept into our industries, has only developed where the workmen failed to enjoy the right of collective bargaining with their employers for the determination of the wage rate and the conditions under which labor was to be performed.

The specialization and subdivision of work, which as much as it is possible tends to make the workmen specialists, that is to say, fractional mechanics, whose knowledge of a trade or industry is confined to but a few simple operations, is anything but a scientific method for developing and maintaining the necessary supply of mechanics and in this direction scientific management seems to be most eminently unscientific.

It is unscientific because it does not include an adequate system for the education of apprentices from which competent mechanics can be developed.

It is unscientific because it does not adequately provide for the workmen's progress in mechanical knowledge, but tends to restrict him to the subdivision of a specialty, keeping him endlessly performing the same operation, disregarding the fact that this constant repetition, which in time becomes semiautomatic on the workman's part, through its very monotony numbs the mind instead of inspiring it.

It is unscientific because if applied in all of our industries it would at once prevent the development of competent mechanics, and produce in their place fractional mechanics, who could only work effectively under the groups of functional and superforemen provided for by the system.

It is unsafe, as well as unscientific, inasmuch as its tendency is toward the production of quantity rather than quality. The number of bricks which can be laid in a day is one thing, the strength and durability of the wall being an entirely different matter. The number of steel rails which can be run through the rolls in a day may be an interesting item in the matter of production, but of far more importance to the public is the ability of these rails to stand the burden of traffic, instead of breaking under strain they should have been able to stand, and ditching the train with its passengers.

On this question of steel rails, the statement of Mr. W. H. Wickhorst, engineer for the American Railway Association, is valuable. In his paper on "Rail Research by Railroads and Producers," presented at the recent International Congress for Testing Materials, he said in part:

"While the railroads were thus busy increasing the capacity of their motive power and cars, the steel mills were likewise endeavoring to secure increased tonnage. These efforts took the form of eliminating unnecessary delays, installing larger converters and more powerful machinery, and using larger ingots, and sometimes of allowing less time for the chemical reactions. At the height of the tonnage endeavor in the rail mills, about five years ago, there was a considerable rivalry between the different mills to produce the greatest tonnage, and it reached a condition that might almost be termed madness; that had only secondary regard for the quality of the product. The purchaser had the choice of buying rails as made by the mills or going without them."

It is unscientific because it has failed to adequately understand the human factor and the spirit of our American institutions, for it makes of one man a taskmaker and taskmaster without the free consent of the other. It ignores that principle so clearly set forth by the congressional committee, which, after investigating the Taylor and other systems of shop management, said in its report: "Government in a mill should be like government in a State, with the consent of the governed."

Scientific management seems to lay greater stress upon the quantity of production than upon its quality. It seems to give more consideration to workmen as units in production than as human beings, and must tend in the unbridled efforts to increase production being made in many industrial establishments to-day to approach as closely as possible the methods of those ancient Egyptian taskmasters who finally endeavored to have bricks made without straw.

In connection with its relation to labor in these respects the term "scientific management" seems to be about as accurate as the name given to that little quadruped which has been the subject of so much scientific experimenting, the guinea pig, which in the first place does not come from Guinea, and in the second, is not a pig.

With the experiments which may be made in the name of science to discover the highest speed which a machine can attain, its greatest capacity for production, and minimum length of time in which its usefulness can be exhausted before it is discarded and thrown in the scrap heap, labor has no objections, but American workmen will object with all the strength at their command, and justly so, to all efforts to experiment likewise with them.

With improved shop equipment and more efficient systems for routing, handling, machining, and assembling material in the course of construction we are in harmony. But we are in most positive opposition to the application or continuation of any system which tends to deteriorate the American workman mentally, morally, or physically.

Organized labor believes that true scientific management is that which reduces the cost of production by eliminating useless labor, which improves the facilities for doing work by surrounding the workmen with good light, pure air, sanitary conditions, and safeguarded machinery. A system of management under which care will be taken to prevent workmen from overstrain, as well as provide that their output should reach an adequate standard, and which will afford ample opportunity for the fullest development of mechanical and manual skill on the part of all workmen. A system under which the terms and conditions of employment will be governed by agreements entered into by employers and their workmen as a collective body. And, finally, a form of management which will never allow quality to be sacrificed for quantity, nor men, women, and children to be classified with machines. The equity right of human flesh and blood must be recognized by any system that would endure.

Scientific management, as the workers know it, vitally concerns every thinking man and is undoubtedly one of the principal causes of industrial unrest, he cold blooded, coolly calculated system of exacting from the workmen the last ounce of his physical and mental strength, without the least regard for his future, represents one reason why federation and concerted action are so much desired by the various labor organizations; other reasons equally apparent is the desire to offset the tremendous power exercised by the federated railroads to obviate the necessity of strikes, to curtail the exactions of subordinate officials and to compel the employer to give our representatives a fair chance to meet with them and talk over in a dispassionate manner matters that vitally affect both.

We have a form of physical examination being introduced by the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad Co. and a circular letter in connection therewith. I will read just the physical qualifications in order to reduce the monotony of the reading. It refers to every man employed on the railroad. This statement is issued by William J. Jackson, receiver of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad, as follows:

PHYSICAL EXAMINATION OF APPLICANTS FOR EMPLOYMENT AND EMPLOYEES FOR PROMOTION.

"Classification.

"1. All those handling trains and train signals; i. e., engineers, firemen, motormen, engine hostlers, conductors, brakemen, flagmen, train porters, yardmasters, switchmen, signalmen, towermen, and boatmen, and others engaged in marine service.

"2. Station agents, telegraphers, train telephone operators, station baggage-men, switch tenders, section foremen, railroad crossing flagmen, watchmen, crossing flagmen, bridge foremen, and foremen of building department.

"3. All other employes except common laborers.

"Requirements.

"1. Vision. Normal (20-20 required in each eye). Firemen and engineers entering the service must be tested with plus 2d lens, and if able to read 20-foot line must be rejected.

"Hearing. Normal (whisper at 20 feet, accumulator or watch at 20 inches).

"Color perception. Normal (worsted or lantern).

"NOTE.—Firemen for promotion to engineers, and brakemen for promotion to conductors, must have combined vision of 20-20, provided vision in one eye is not less than 20-40 without glasses.

"Physical defects. All physical defects tending to impair the efficiency of the individual disqualify.

"Reexamination. Reexamination of employees in this class must be made every three years.

"Vision. Only those whose vision does not fall below normal in one eye and 20-40 in the other may be allowed to hold preferred or main line runs.

"Hearing. One-half of the requirements for entrance to service.

"(2) Vision. 20-20 required in one eye and not less than 20-30 in the other.

"Hearing. Normal. (Whisper at 20 feet, accumulator or watch at 20 inches.)

"Color perception. Normal. (By worsted and lantern.)

"Physical defects. All physical defects tending to impair efficiency of the individual disqualify.

"Reexamination. Reexamination of employees in this class must be made once every three years.

"Vision. Combined vision must be 20-30 and not less than 20-40 in one eye with or without glasses.

"(3) Vision. Combined 20-30, not less than 20-50 in one eye without glasses.

"Hearing. One-half normal (whisper at 10 feet, accumulator or watch at 10 inches).

"Color perception. Car repairers and others whose duties require handling of signals (flags or lanterns) must have normal color perception.

"Physical defects. All physical defects tending to impair efficiency of the individual disqualify.

"NOTE.—Employees over fifty (50) years of age or employees who require glasses to bring their vision to standard must be examined every year. Employees who have suffered severe injury or illness must be examined before they reenter the service.

"List of physical defects.

"All classes. Trachoma or other inflammatory conditions of the eye, or chronic discharge from the ear; varicose veins of both legs or marked varicosity of one leg; phlebitis, skin disease (especially eczema or even a strong tendency to it); loss of thumb or loss of two fingers on one hand disqualify the first class and station baggagemen and switch tenders in the second class only. Hernia disqualifies all classes. Unmistakable evidence of alcoholism, acute gonorrhea, and all manifestations of syphilis, traumatic and pathological bubo disqualify all classes as long as symptoms are apparent. Orchitis, epididymitis, hydrocele, undescended testicle, malignant tumors, recurrent appendicitis, old depressed fractures of the skull, or any fracture followed by head symptoms, spinal injuries, epilepsy, antero-posterior curvature, severe injury of the back, tuberculosis, marked scrofulous cachexia, aneurism, necrosis, acute and chronic periostitis, acute and chronic cystitis, floating cartilage and impaired mobility of joints disqualify first class and all second class except agents and operators, who may be accepted if inflammation has long since subsided and the affected joints be free from pain. Diabetes, chronic rheumatism, gout, chronic diarrhoea, chronic hepatic disorders attended by jaundice or those that are disabling in their nature; hepatic cardiac or renal dropsies, asthma, hæmoptysis, valvular diseases of the heart, angina pectoris, evidence of organic diseases of brain and spinal cord, insolation, inveterate neuralgia of the larger nerves disqualify all classes.

"(a) When hernia occurs while in the service, the right to continue in, or of promotion to class 1, will not be lost, provided the employee, by operation or otherwise, effects a satisfactory cure.

"Candidates for students' privileges, for employment, or reexamination in or selected for promotion, must pass the prescribed examination and tests before being permitted to enter or remain, except temporarily, upon the duties of the position sought or occupied.

"An examination fee of $2 is paid by the company in all cases to the examining surgeon. Employing officers in charge of the pay rolls are instructed to deduct said examination fee, upon the pay roll in favor of the company, from the first month's wages of all applicants assigned to service. The examination fee of $1 for rejected applicants or those who may not be given employment will be borne by the company.

"The officer charged with the duty of employing men for any of the different classes must reject any candidate who may be seen to possess maimed or deformed hands or limbs, or any other outward evidence of injury which will disqualify, or one who after careful questioning and inspection of outward appearance would fail to pass the required tests.

"Use great care in making examinations, stripping the candidate from head to foot, making careful and painstaking effort to do justice to all concerned.

"Reexaminations of employees will be made at any time when, in the judgment of the superintendent, it is necessary.

"Physical defects, if originating or developing after entering the service, will not disqualify, provided the efficiency of the employee is not impaired.

"Surgeons must be careful to note and record any defect that might impair the usefulness of the applicant, or that would be more or less aggravated by the service, or that would contribute to the prolongation of disability in case of injury.

"In order to prevent fraud in subsequent claims for personal injury, a careful record must be made of defects, even though they do not impair the usefulness of the applicant, or would not be aggravated by, or contribute to the prolongation or disability in case of injury.

"Surgeons must in all cases require signatures of the candidates to the certificate at the bottom of application blank in space provided for same.

"The application blank after being complete, will be returned by the surgeon to the employing officer from whom received.

"In the discretion of the employing officer, applicants may be permitted to enter the service temporarily if accepted by the surgeon, subject to the approval of the superintendent.

"Age limit, 45 years.

"W. H. BOHART, Chief Surgeon.

"Approved:

"W. J. JACKSON, Receiver.

"FEBRUARY 23, 1915."

That system, if accepted on the Chicago & Eastern Illinois, would in substance absolutely nullify every existing agreement on that road as it now exists. There are 13 organizations represented among the various railroad employees on that system. As a result of the action of the company, speaking of the incentive for federation and concerted action, the attempt of this company to introduce that system, resulted in a meeting of 13 representatives in the city of Chicago last Sunday, at which place and time they organized and came together as a federated body representing all classes, transportation, shop, and office employees of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad Co. for the purpose of combating the introduction of this so apparently unjust system.

I have here a list of the system federations that have been organized in the past few years, together with notes referring to the time, and so forth.

The following statement contains information with respect to the organization and recognition of the system federations on various railroads dealing exclusively with the mechanics, apprentices, and helpers, commonly designated as railway shopmen, 98 per cent of whom are members of some one of the following organizations, which constitute what is known as the mechanical section of the railway employees department of the American Federation of Labor [reading]:

"International Association of Machinists; International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, Iron Ship Builders and Helpers of America; International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers; Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America; Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers International Alliance; and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

"1. New York, New Haven & Hartford, organized and recognized January, 1908.

Chairman WALSH, When was it organized?

Mr. WHARTON, Organized January, 1910.

Chairman WALSH, And recognized December, 1910?

Mr. WHARTON, December, 1910.

Chairman WALSH, Have you a brief statement in there with reference to what intervened between the establishment and the recognition, how they approached it, what was done with the existing contract?

Mr. WHARTON, We can explain that.

Chairman WALSH, Then make a memorandum, please, and explain it or have somebody do it—what was done with the existing contracts of the crafts, and what negotiations were had between the officers of the road and the interested unions.

- The question that you asked with reference to the declination of the officials—

Chairman WALSH (Interrupting). Take a few of those: For instance, for one year, or two years, or three years; take the Illinois Central and a few others and briefly state what the negotiations were.

Mr. WEARTON. The general manner of procedure would be the perfection of an organization first—a meeting of the different district organizations of the crafts which were to compose the federation on that system; that is, the representatives of each craft would be called to meet, and at that meeting they would draft a set of laws which would be their governing laws, or govern the actions of the federation from that time on, these laws being subject to their approval. Generally, then, agreements had been so arranged that they all practically had the 30-day clause—the necessary notice of desire to open negotiations by either party. If the business conditions were satisfactory, or rather favorable, from the viewpoint of the men, the question of opening negotiations for new agreements were agreed to, a new schedule embracing a set of general rules which would apply to all trades, including such special rules as applied to the different conditions of each trade, which could not be embodied in a set of general rules, and would be adopted and presented with a 30-day notice to the officials of the company. This notice was for the purpose of securing a conference.

In some instances a notice would be sent in by the secretary and president of the federated board. In other instances it was found inexpedient, and the method adopted of each organization notifying the management, and in practically all cases where the objections were made to treating with the federated committee a conference was held, and instead of there being any result other than that of friendly relations the men would talk the matter over, and in the course of the year that followed a better understanding would have been arrived at, and an agreement or negotiations would later result. Sometimes it might have been, for purely local reasons, that would cause the men to withdraw. I have one case particularly in mind on the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient, where the federation, I think, was organized and in existence something like 18 months, and in first presenting their proposed agreement the company met the joint committee and discussed the matter with them very thoroughly and seemed to satisfy the men at that time that possibly they had been a little hasty in presenting that form of agreement. As a result the men returned to their homes and withdrew the proposed joint agreement and a year later presented a new joint agreement. The negotiations resulting in federated agreement being signed up.

Chairman WALSH. Has there been any case except that of the Illinois Central where they absolutely refused to meet?

Mr. WHARTON. To my personal knowledge, that is absolutely the only case where the officials have refused to discuss the matter with the men.

As a result of the declination of the officials of these systems to either meet or treat with the duly authorized representatives elected by the employees a strike was inaugurated on the 30th day of September, 1911, the immediate purpose of which was to bring about a conference between the officials of these companies and the committee elected by the employees.

The employees on the Pere Marquette Railroad became involved in a strike between the dates of May 17 and 28, 1915. A System Federation was in existence on this road, but the strike resulted from other and specific causes.

St. Louis, Mo., March 9, 1915.

(Important.)

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: A letter from Attorney F. Comerford notifies us that the Harriman and Illinois Central will be heard in Chicago by the Industrial Relations Committee April 5.

While the proposed investigation has principally to deal with the conditions responsible for the strike on the Harriman and Illinois Central lines, brought about by the refusal of the railroad officials to treat with the shopmen as a federated body, it undoubtedly will be far reaching in its scope, and we desire to introduce evidence to prove our case and the necessity of federation for better protection. Many railroads had previously recognized federation and favored this method of dealing with their employees; many others have since adopted the same policy, clearly proving the unwarranted antagonism of the Harriman and Illinois Central officials against this form of organization.

We desire to secure the following information to be presented before the council meeting on March 29, to be used in preparing data for the Industrial Relations Commission.

State cause leading up to the formation of your system federation.

Date of organization and first federated agreement, if any.

Will also appreciate any additional information on this subject.

Please give this matter your earliest possible attention.

Fraternally, yours,

JOHN SCOTT, Secretary-Treasurer
A. O. WHARTON, President.

9784 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

This letter was sent to all these men.

Chairman WALSH. What was the date of the first Federated System organization? That is, commencing in what we might call this later period, of this 52 that you speak of.

Mr. WHARTON. Yes; 1908.

Chairman WALSH. That was signed by the officers of what department?

Mr. WHARTON. Railway employees' department.

Chairman WALSH. American Federation of Labor?

Mr. WHARTON. American Federation of Labor.

M., K. & T. RAILWAY,
Denison, Tex., March 15, 1915.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,
President Railway Department A. F. of L., St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of March 9, in which you inquire as to reasons for forming a system federation of shop trades on the M., K. & T. railways. Many years' experience proved that our craft organization was not effective in securing fair working conditions, or a rate of wages that would compare with that received by the skilled trades outside the railway service, or that was at all adequate for the kind of service required.

The small increases in pay we were able to secure from time to time did not keep pace with the increased cost of living, and they were more than offset by the company's policy of continual retrenchment. We saw the different crafts defeated and crushed in detail on our system and other roads when they made a stand for fair treatment.

We finally became convinced that federation was necessary to secure justice from our highly organized employers. We also believed this form of organization would be an advantage to the company as well as the men on account of the time that could be saved by negotiating agreements jointly.

Our federation was organized April, 1911.

Yours, fraternally,

FRANK MUNIER,
Chairman Board of Adjustment, M., K. & T. System Federation.

M. & I. SYSTEM,
Minneapolis, Minn., March 15, 1915.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,
President Railway Employees' Department, A. F. L., St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of March 9, and the information you ask for, will state that the causes leading to the formation of our System Federation was the unsatisfactory results obtainable by the single-craft method of organization to gain working conditions and wages that we believed we were justly entitled to.

The M. & St. L. and Iowa Central were consolidated in 1912, I believe, and are now known as the Minneapolis and St. Louis Railway.

In 1908 the Iowa Central attempted to abrogate the craft agreements and reduced wages. This resulted in a strike in which all crafts participated, a federation was organized, and on the termination of the strike in 1909, which resulted favorable to the men, a federation agreement was signed up and has since been renewed from time to time to the satisfaction of the men and company.

The federation was extended to include the entire M. & St. L. system on June 1, 1914, but owing to the unsettled industrial conditions no attempt has been made to negotiate a new agreement.

Fraternally, yours,

J. G. LITTLE, Secretary-Treasurer.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RAILWAY AND ALLIED LINES,
Savannah, Ga., March 15, 1915.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,
President Railway Employees' Department, A. F. of L., St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter of March 9, I would state the Seaboard Federation was organized March, 1909, and have since that time been in conference with officials and signed agreements three times, all times agreeing with officials on rules and rates. Previous to 1909 we had four organizations that had agreements with company, and it would take about 30 days for committee of eight machinists, superintendent motor power, master mechanic, clerk and stenographer to come to a settlement for machinists alone, then from two to three weeks for boiler makers, the same for blacksmiths, the same for carmen. This represented about three months' actual time for the officials of the company and the different committees. We had agreements for the four crafts which was very expensive to the men on the system, and also the company. Now the last agreement for machinists, boiler makers, painters, carmen, blacksmiths, and pipemen, we spent about two weeks and accomplished more for the men at about one-fourth the expense. This was one of the main reasons we organized a federation on the S. A. L.

Personally, I believe the company is very glad to have one committee representing all employees at a conference, instead of meeting various committees, about every month of the year, as we formerly had to do.

We have also succeeded in bringing about a satisfactory adjustment of a number of very difficult cases affecting the different crafts, any of which may have resulted in a serious situation, had it not been for the efforts and influence of the federation.

Hoping this information may be of some use to you, I am,

Fraternally, yours,

H. M. FALLON.

Wichita, Kans., March 16, 1915.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,
President Railway Employees' Department, A. F. of L., St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of March 9 will say in this section of the country a separate craft agreement was not worth the paper it was printed on, for the reason that the company would keep cutting things out and by the end of one year the agreements would be no good, and things they had agreed to they would interpret the wrong way to suit the company.

We all got dissatisfied and on October 31, 1911, we called for a meeting of all crafts. At this meeting it was decided that no craft be allowed to ask for separate agreements. We had committees from all the crafts draft a proposed agreement. On February 26, 1912, we met the company, but were refused a federated agreement. The chairman was told that we could get a separate craft agreement; we informed the company that we would meet them the next day at 10.30 a. m., and we were offered the single craft agreement. We informed the company that we would not accept craft agreements. At this they refused to meet our federation, so we went back to work and strengthened our cause in every way possible. We waited until August 3, 1914, when we again met the company. This time we were successful and secured a federated agreement, effective September 1, 1914.

This has been the longest time in the history of the K. C., M. & O. that peace and satisfaction has reigned. The company seems to be just as well pleased as the men.

Fraternally, yours,

J. F. PERRY, Secretary No. 1.

WHEELING & LAKE ERIE RAILWAY,
Massillon, Ohio, March 17, 1915.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,
President Railway Employees' Department, A. F. of L., St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of March 9, our object or cause in forming this federation was the lesson we learned from the efforts of the machinists on the B. & O. & B. & O. S. W. at the time of their strike when they went our single handed and tried to better their conditions. This will show that federations were formed for protection of shop crafts and not to ask for unreasonable demands, as some railroad companies seem to think.

Our first federated agreement was obtained in 1911.

W. & L. E. System Federation, No. 22, was instituted in March 1911, and changed to No. 23 last fall, when we took out a charter from the reorganized department.

In getting our agreements we have had our differences with the railroad officials, but when everything was settled all petty differences were soon forgotten and harmony prevailed between employees and employer.

WABASH RAILROAD,
Decatur, Ill., March 11, 1915.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,
President Railway Employees' Department, A. F. of L.,

St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of March 9 came to hand to-day and contents noted. In reply will give you all the available information I have on the subject. That will be during my connection with the Wabash Railroad.

The first move along the federation line on this road was made in November of 1902. The boiler makers at that time had been out on strike two weeks, when the other crafts saw the necessity of pulling together for their own protection. They walked out in sympathy on November 2, 1902, and were out four weeks. The outcome of this first effort was a 2-cent increase for mechanics and 1½ cents for helpers. It was a joint affair, but the agreements were made between crafts and were mostly verbal. The mechanics received with the increase added a prevailing rate of 28 cents per hour and a 10-hour day. From this time till 1909 the men became involved in several strikes, with the result that their prevailing rate at that time had been raised to 32 cents. It seemed up till this time that either one craft or the other would start something and whoever started seemed to suffer the worst. There was always a strike to get a raise, and the men lost more in the time lost than they gained with their raises obtained. In 1907 the company abrogated all their agreements. Through 1908 the men began talking federation, and in January, 1909, the company called in the blacksmiths' committee and tried to get them to sign up an agreement with them which was absolutely unfair. They notified the management that they were not prepared to negotiate an agreement at this time but would notify them at a later date when they would meet them. The crafts all got busy, and the result was that a federation was organized on March 27, 1909. This federation worked on the case until the latter part of August, when they presented the first joint agreement. This federation was composed of the machinists, boiler makers, blacksmiths, and tanners and pipemen. After the first agreement had been presented the carmen came into the organization and asked to be taken in with the agreement. After about two months of parleying the federation secured recognition for them and the agreement was signed up in December of that year. Since the organization of the federation there has never been a strike. At times different crafts have voted a strike, but have never failed to abide by the federation rules. The result is that the men have been raised till their prevailing rate is now 38 cents per hour. They have as good an agreement as any in the country; they have reduced the working hours to 9 hours for the day. They have made a test of the 8-hour day, and the company is satisfied to grant it when it becomes general. The company would sooner meet the men now as a federation than any other way and have hinted that they would be glad to see all roads in certain territory meet as districts. The federation has been a blessing to the men, an advantage to the company, and has certainly proven its worth to the men on this system. If I can be of any further assistance in this matter kindly let me know.

CHICAGO & NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY,
Chicago, Ill., March 12, 1915.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,
President Railway Employees' Department, A. F. of L.,
St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your request of March 9, the North Western System Federation was organized April, 1909, under charter of railway department, and has been a continuous member of that department since. Causes which led to our organizing as a system federation may be summarized as follows:

Previous to organization as a system federation we found that our agreements were not enforced, only in the larger shops. At smaller shops and isolated points we found that our agreements were either ignored or evaded. Men working at some of these places were ignored altogether. Overtime clauses were in many cases ignored. Jurisdictional disputes were of common occurrence. Each craft was trying to get the best of the other, and the usual bitterness between crafts which follows conditions of this kind prevailed.

The benefits derived since the organization of a system federation may be summarized as follows:

Brought the different crafts closer together.

Less jurisdictional disputes.

More uniform shop conditions. (Overtime rates are the same all over the system where organization prevails.)

Better enforcement of agreements at isolated points.

More uniform rates of pay. (The blacksmiths, boiler makers, and machinists get the same rate, 41 cents all over the system in the M. P. Dept.)

Trusting this information may be of some value, I am,

Fraternally, yours,

J. W. FRANCIS,

Secretary-Treasurer System Federation.

FORT SMITH & WESTERN.

Fort Smith, Ark., March 15, 1915.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,

President Railway Employees' Department, A. F. of L.,

St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Your communication of March 9 duly received, and in reply will say that the employees of the Fort Smith & Western Railroad tried a number of times to get an agreement and an increase in wages as individual crafts, but each time they failed and were told that if they did not like their jobs they could quit. So in 1910, they organized a federation and succeeded in securing a working agreement and a small increase in wages.

In August, 1911, we secured better working conditions, and October 1, 1911, an increase in wages of 5 per cent.

From March to August, 1913, we had a number of conferences with the management regarding shop rules and an increase in pay. During this time all we got was the promise of an increase in pay commencing the 1st of October, 1913.

About the 1st of November, 1913, the agreement was made and the increase in pay granted with back pay for the previous month. Since the signing of the federated agreement everything has seemed to work in harmony. It brings the men of the various crafts closer together, creates more of a brotherly love for one's fellow workmen; also, far easier to settle grievances and disputes which arise in the shop, as we now get together and have them out among ourselves, while before they were taken before the officials of the road.

This also relieves the officials of a great deal of annoyance and trouble.

There are also other reasons why federation organization is superior to the craft organization, which at this time would occupy too much time and space.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,

President Railway Employees' Department, A. F. of L.,

St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Your communication of March 9 duly received, and in reply wish to state that the labor organizations employed on the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad organized into a system federation for the following reasons:

To bring together all organizations on the C. & E. I. Ry.

To prevent the introduction of piecework, bonus systems, physical examination, and unfair efficiency systems.

To shorten the hours of labor and establish a minimum wage scale for the employees in all branches of the railway service.

9788 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

To establish an agreement that will cover all branches of organized labor in the mechanical department that would bring about a more permanent and stable condition acceptable to the employer and employees alike.

By system federation agreements we can prevent strikes and lockouts to a great extent and by concerted actions reap the benefits of our labor.

To urge all members to adopt and carry out a plan of cooperation with all crafts, thereby eliminating strikes of an affiliated organization caused by jurisdictional disputes and the pitting of one craft against another by unfair employers.

The operation of railroads under Government supervision as to standardization of passenger and freight rates calls for the standardization of pay to the employees; this can only be gained by system federation.

Fraternally, yours,

THOMAS J. SHORT, Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. WHARTON. I have a statement here of a man who was one of the general officers of the boiler makers' organization and I believe was present during many of the negotiations and organization of practically all of the southeastern railroads. It is as follows:

PORTSMOUTH, VA., March 18, 1915.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,

President Employees Department, St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your circular of the 9th, requesting information on the important question of system federations on railroads, including the Harri-man and Illinois Central lines, and their possible effect in negotiating agreements between the railroad companies and their shopmen, I desire to say that from close, as well as practical, experience in connection with system federations on the principal railroads of the southeastern district, that such a movement has brought about a condition of affairs most gratifying to capital and labor from an industrial standpoint, as no strike has occurred since the formation of railroad federations in 1908, of serious nature.

I further desire to say that the railroad companies were responsible for the federated craft movement, because of their intense opposition while in conference with single craft organizations in their plea for humane working conditions, as well as fair wages to support those depending on them.

It is also true that some railroad companies favor a federation of their shopmen, as it has a tendency to save time, as well as expense to both parties at issue. In their negotiations with a duly authorized committee representing all the shop crafts affiliated in a federation.

If the railroad corporations of America would only realize the importance of the employees railway department of the American Federation of Labor as a factor in preventing industrial disputes, as well as serious labor complications, that could be avoided when handled with due deliberation and business judgment by both parties at issue. If such was done, investigations by industrial commissions would not be necessary; but just as long as corporations can only look at their own individual interests in the industrial field, labor will continue these efforts for human rights, which every American citizen is entitled to according to the law of self preservation.

Fraternally, yours,

This is the Frisco Railway system, dated Springfield, Mo., March 19, 1915, as follows:

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,

President Railway Employees Department, A. F. of L., St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Yours of March 9, requesting information as to why we organized a system federation received.

Our federation was organized December 12, 1910, for at least four reasons:

First. To reduce the cost of securing agreements.

Second. To keep the company from using one craft to fight another.

Third. To become more closely allied for our mutual protection.

Fourth. Following the example set by our employers in order to meet with them on matters pertaining to our welfare on somewhat of an equal footing.

Our first federated agreement was secured September 15, 1913.
Trusting this will be of some service to you, I remain,
Fraternally, yours,

CHAS. CHUMLEY,
Sec'y-Treas. Frisco System Federation No. 22.

The following is from the Intercolonial and Prince Edwards Island Railways, dated Moncton, New Brunswick, March 18, 1915, as follows:

Mr. A. O. WHARTON, *

President Railway Employees Department, A. F. of L., St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Your communication of March 9 received, and in reply will say that as individual organizations we felt our weakness on many questions of importance to us. Finally, we decided to form a local federation for the purpose of procuring a shorter workday. In this matter we were successful in reducing our hours of labor from 10 to 9 hours per day, receiving the same wages for the 9 hours as we did for the 10 hours, and in cases where there was a fraction of 1 cent per hour we got the benefit; we also received 1 cent per hour over and above what we were receiving for the 10-hour day. We also received a federated schedule with the management, and have been working under such schedule since February 1, 1913, and all matters are now handled by the federation, and we feel that we never could have accomplished what we have in a couple of years in any other way than by federation. You understand our hourly rates have been increased from 3 to 4½ cents per hour, which we consider is alone sufficient to satisfy our membership that federation is an advanced step over the individual organization and the management can now deal with five or six organizations in the same time they used to take to deal with one.

We would not think of giving up our federation, for we see the benefit of it. I remain,

Yours, fraternally,

L. McKINNON, Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. WHARTON. Yes.

The Rock Island Railway, dated Kansas City, Mo., March 24, 1913, as follows:

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,

*President Railway Employees Department, A. F. of L.,
Suite 5-6, Ohio Building, St. Louis, Mo.*

DEAR SIR: Answering your letter of recent date regarding the benefits derived by the men by forming federations of shop crafts on railroads, will say: The machinists, boiler makers, blacksmiths, sheet-metal workers, and carmen, together with their helpers and apprentices on the Rock Island Railroad, formed a federation, and in 1911 negotiated an agreement with the Rock Island Co.

We found this method of organization of benefit to all the men employed.

First. It greatly reduced the cost to the men of obtaining an agreement. Under the old system of craft agreement it was necessary for each craft to send a committee to the company officials and to spend weeks negotiating an agreement. One craft followed another, and although one craft had signed an agreement, the craft following was compelled to again go over the same ground covered by the craft ahead of them. After the formation of the federation a committee, smaller in some instances than the committee representing a single craft, oftentimes negotiated an agreement covering all the men in all crafts in about the same length of time formerly taken by a single craft committee. This greatly reduced the cost to the men and was also of benefit to the railroad company in that it did not take so much of their time when making agreements.

Second. It standardized the rules, and it insured equal treatment to all employees. Previously, under craft agreements, there would be different interpretations of certain rules or, perhaps, different wording in the rules that caused confusion both to the men and to the company, and resulted in more grievances arising to be settled.

Third. We found under the old method of craft agreement that the railroad companies were using one craft against another for the purpose of defeating any betterment of working conditions. The federation of those crafts eliminated this condition.

Fourth. We knew that the railroads were in a manner federated, through associations of general managers, etc.; and if this form was good for them, a similar form of organization became a necessity for the protection of the men.

Fifth. Under the craft form of agreement the company would, by various methods, take certain conditions from one craft. After this was accomplished that fact was then used as an argument against other crafts having a similar rule. The federation form of organization eliminated that condition.

There are other good reasons, aside from those shown above, not the least of which was the absolute necessity of a stronger organization on the part of the men to successfully combat a rapidly growing tendency on the part of the railroad companies, which was the result of organization on their part, to get all crafts on all roads to a common level as regards rules and rates of pay and thereby destroy the argument the men had of showing better rules and rates of pay on other roads.

The shop employees on the Rock Island have been working under a federated agreement for three and one-half years, and we find it efficient and economical. It has greatly reduced the number of grievances arising and has been beneficial to both the employees and the company.

The company at first seemed to greatly fear the federated form of organization. The manner of handling agreements and grievances under the agreement and the rapid manner in which grievances are being eliminated proves their fears groundless.

Yours, fraternally,

H. J. CARR,

Chairman Executive Board R. I. Federation.

New York, Ontario & Western Railway, dated March 25, 1915, as follows:

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,

President Railway Employees' Department, A. F. L., St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Previous to July, 1911, the various crafts on the N. Y., O. & W. R. R. worked for their own individual welfare. This had many drawbacks to the organization, as well as to its members, taken separately. Now, when negotiations were under way for a new agreement, each craft would elect its delegates, and a time would be set with the railroad management for a hearing.

For example, the machinists to-day, boiler makers to-morrow, the blacksmiths the next day after, etc. Now, the delegates of the machinists from all points of the railroad would meet here to-day, and their business could not be completed for various reasons; but as the boiler makers had to-morrow and the blacksmiths the next, the machinists would have to wait until the first vacant day to finish their business. Probably the same would happen to the other crafts, making expense to that individual craft, taking men from their work an unnecessary length of time, besides often keeping men from duties which necessitate their being in their respective stations.

One can readily see how the above is detrimental to the employees, also the railroad company.

Each craft seemed to be working against the others, and matters did not move as smoothly as desired for the benefit of the men. It was also taking a great amount of valuable time from the railroad officials. Hence on July 1, 1911, delegates of the different crafts from all points of the N. Y., O. & W. met to determine if something could not be done to overcome the obstacles. After much careful consideration, it was decided to form a system federation. This body was guided by a set of rules; and while it was not recognized by the heads of the company until later, its cooperation was perfect, and the different crafts could not help but see the benefits derived therefrom.

On July 1, 1914, the N. Y., O. & W. Co. met the System Federation as a whole. The results were beneficial both to the company and the men. This is especially noticeable in the time taken to bring matters to a close. You see all crafts represented have a hearing on the same day at the same time; thus all crafts know what is being done by the others and what is being received by them. It is strikingly noticeable that this eliminates any contention among the men involved and is a great preventive of strikes, because the larger the body of men the less liability of their striking, it being such a simple matter to get them together to reason with them and, if need be, control them.

Thus you will perceive the many advantages of the System Federation on the N. Y., O. & W. according to the men, as well as the management itself.

Fraternally, yours,

CHAS. D. MCCARTHY,
Secretary-Treasurer.

New York, New Haven & Hartford Railway, Roslindale, Mass., March 26, 1915, as follows:

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,
*President Railway Employees' Department, A. of L.,
St. Louis, Mo.*

DEAR SIR: Your favor of March 9 received, requesting information about why we formed our federation, and when.

Our federation was formed as a protest against piecework some time about the month of January, 1908.

I beg to remain,

Yours, fraternally,

ROBT. HENDERSON,
Sec'y-Treas. System Fed. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R.

I will say that the piecework was not introduced as a result of the organization of the federation on that system.

The officials of the Illinois Central and Harriman lines are on record to the effect that they were unalterably opposed to the recognition of the System Federation. We herewith quote from a printed circular issued October 12, 1911, by General Manager W. L. Park, of the Illinois Central:

"So far as the System Federation is concerned, the Illinois Central management makes no secret of its opposition for the reasons already mentioned. It refuses to be placed in the position of giving any encouragement, even by inference, that will lead its employees to believe it will recognize the federation."

Mr. J. Kruttschnitt, chairman of the executive committee, speaking for the Harriman lines in a conference held with the general officers of the organizations in San Francisco early in September, 1911, made a similar statement, although couched in different language.

As a matter of fact, we desire to state that there has never been an authorized strike on any railroad system, where a federated committee has been recognized and a federated agreement signed up. This statement refers to federated agreements signed and in effect since early in 1908. There has been but one unauthorized strike. This occurred on the Missouri, Oklahoma & Gulf, a very small road, and if the railroad officials had been willing to permit the men to return to work under their old agreement, the general officers would have ordered the men back. This the company refused to do, and the strike was then declared to be a legal one.

We believe this record, together with the fact that many railroads admit that they prefer to deal with a federated committee, speaks for itself and places the responsibility for the Illinois Central and Harriman lines strike on the shoulders of those who declined to meet or treat with a federated committee. Knowing the men as we do, it has always been our opinion that by giving the committee a hearing the railroad officials would have paved the way for a peaceful and mutually satisfactory adjustment of the existing differences.

The reorganization of the railway employees' department not being consummated until some time after this trouble occurred, others more familiar with the details of these strikes will no doubt be called again.

The following letters were exchanged between the railway department and the Association of Western Railways, and are introduced as evidence of one of the many efforts put forth by the organization to bring about a settlement.

Mr. W. A. GARRETT,
Chairman General Managers' Association of Western Railroads, Heiser Building, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: The officers whose signatures and titles appear attached hereto, acting for the membership of their respective organizations and by the authority of a convention held in Kansas City, Mo., April 15 to 23, inclusive, desire to enter into arrangements for a conference between the General Managers' Association of Western Railroads or the duly authorized representatives of said association.

9792 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

The object of this conference to be the bringing about of a settlement of the strikes now in effect on the M., K. & T., Illinois Central, and the roads generally designated as the Harriman lines.

If it be the disposition of the railway managers or those whom they represent to enter into negotiations for this purpose, we are of the opinion that the first great step will have been taken in establishing a more universal and permanent peace between the railroads and the men employed by them, which result will be of mutual benefit to all concerned.

Back of this request there is a real desire on our part to be of such service as we can in bringing about a complete understanding, and an understanding that will practically eliminate strikes and their attendant losses.

We believe that the time has arrived when employer and employee must recognize that each have rights which must be respected.

Trusting that your association will see the possibilities of a meeting of this character and that this communication will receive your serious and favorable consideration, we remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

Wm. H. Johnston, President Machinists and Helpers; J. W. Kline, President Blacksmiths and Helpers; M. F. Ryan, President Railway Carmen; Jno. J. Carrigan, President Railway Clerks; Geo. F. Hedrick, President Painters and Decorators; J. A. Franklin, President Boiler Makers and Helpers; M. O'Sullivan, President Sheet Metal Workers; James Wilson, President Pattern Makers; J. T. Kinsella, President Steam Fitters and Helpers; A. O. Wharton, Chairman.

P. S.—Address all communications to A. O. Wharton, Room 305 Howard Building, St. Louis, Mo.

Under date of May 21, 1912, the following reply was received, addressed to the officers named previously:

THE ASSOCIATION OF WESTERN RAILWAYS,

Hedrick, president Painters and Decorators, La Fayette, Ind.; Mr. A. O. Wharton, Room 305 Howard Building, St. Louis, Mo.

GENTLEMEN: Acknowledging receipt of and in reply to yours of the 8th instant advising your desire to bring about a conference between the General Managers' Association of Western Railways, or their duly authorized representatives, and the officers of the various organizations to whom this letter is addressed, for the purpose of "bringing about of a settlement of the strikes now in effect on the M., K. & T., Illinois Central, and the roads generally designated as the Harriman lines."

This association is entirely without knowledge of, jurisdiction, or authority in the matter referred to and can take no action in the controversy between the railroads mentioned in your letter and their former employees.

By order of the executive committee,

Respectfully, yours,

W. A. GARRETT, Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a strike on the M. K. & T. before this agreement was entered into?

Mr. WHARTON. That was one of the roads on which we had craft troubles; at the time the carmen were on strike on the M., K. & T. system.

Chairman WALSH. Was the strike over the question of introducing the Federation System?

Mr. WHARTON. No; It was a case of pitting one craft against another and denying rights to carmen that were granted to others.

Chairman WALSH. Was the Federation System introduced on the M., K. & T. after this strike?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes. (Reading:)

St. Louis, Mo., June 26, 1912.

Mr. W. A. GARRETT,

Chairman General Managers Association of Western Railways,

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Acknowledging receipt of your favor dated May 21, which was in reply to a communication sent you under date of May 8, by the undersigned officers, we have duly noted contents, and regret that the Association of Western Railways assumes to be without knowledge of, jurisdiction, or authority to arrange a conference for the purpose as outlined in communication previously sent you.

Since the exchange of the communications above referred to, we find ourselves in a position which, to us at least, appears to have altered the situation to the extent of warranting that another effort be made to arrange a conference with the object in view of bringing about a peaceful solution of the labor disputes now going on, and the maintenance of peace in the future.

We believe that a conference will at least prove beneficial, even though we may be unable to accomplish all that we have in mind. It is our desire to place a number of matters squarely before the Association of Western Railways, matters that have to do with the future as well as the present.

A desire exists on our part to bring about a more permanent and stable condition of affairs. We believe that the Association of Western Railways should be interested in this proposition to the extent of meeting the undersigned in conference, if not, then they must be considered responsible for any subsequent action on the part of the employees, who have been thus denied an opportunity of presenting their side of the question.

Trusting this communication will receive your favorable consideration, we remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

Wm. H. Johnston, president Machinists and Helpers; J. W. Kline, president Blacksmiths and Helpers; M. F. Ryan, president Railway Carmen; Jno. J. Carrigan, Railway Clerks; Geo. Hedrick, president Painters and Decorators; J. A. Franklin, president Boiler Makers and Helpers; M. O'Sullivan, president Sheet Metal Workers; James Wilson, president Pattern Makers; J. T. Kinsella, president Steam Fitters and Helpers; A. O. Wharton, chairman.

P. S.—Address all communications to A. O. Wharton, Room 305, Howard Building, St. Louis, Mo.

The reply to it was as follows [reading]:

9794 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

GENTLEMEN: In reply to your favor of the 26th ultimo, asking for conference with a view of "bringing about a peaceful solution of the labor disputes now going on and maintenance of peace in the future."

The Association of Western Railways can not undertake to hold such a conference, being without knowledge of, jurisdiction, or authority in the matter referred to, as stated in my letter to you of May 21, 1912. The association has no original jurisdiction, and can not negotiate differences between its members and their employees, nor can it undertake to act in the capacity of arbitrator or mediator, as suggested in your letter, or to in any way enter into a dispute existing between the employees of any railways and their employing companies unless all parties to such dispute should agree and request that the matter be so handled.

By order of the executive committee.

Respectfully, yours,

W. A. GARRETT, Chairman.

As a matter of information, we herewith submit copies of federated agreements last signed up on the Southern Railroad and allied lines; the Wabash Railroad; the Missouri Pacific-St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern; the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, and the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railways. These we believe to be fair samples of the 52 federated agreements now in effect.

In outlining these agreements, I want simply to draw attention to some of the principal features of them, which simplifies the work of the agreements. They are practically headed in the same manner, starting out with "general rules" governing the crafts.

I desire to state that the general rules embodied in these federated agreements are practically a repetition of the same rules that existed in each one of the crafts' agreement prior to the signing of the federated agreement. This change resulted in standard rules for all the shopmen.

The men all work, or mostly work, in one shop under the supervision of the same authorities, and they were naturally very much controlled by any decision that would be arrived at by that management in handling the affairs of the shops.

But we found there were conditions that would creep in under the same management, different things; we found men working seven, eight, and nine hours a day in the same shop. And this brought about the greatest of dissatisfaction on the part of the men. The general rules in the federated agreement stopped or rather removed this cause of complaint.

We have also been placed in the rather peculiar position of being compelled to practically demand the most simple of sanitary regulations, even to the point of securing pure drinking water, and things of that kind. We were denied, sometimes in one department, because the other department had not made a demand for such a condition where the health of the employees was absolutely at stake, those requests were denied.

I have in mind one shop in particular in Little Rock, Ark., on the Missouri Pacific and Iron Mountain & Southern Railroad, the employees numbering hundreds under this one roof, the locomotive shop, possibly 700 or 800 men. The average number of men prior to about 1905 and 1906 that was in the hospital from that shop would run close to an average of 20 per day from malarial fever and chills, and kindred diseases, conditions native to that climate.

After we got purified water in there that number decreased pretty nearly 75 per cent in the next two years, the reduction in the average number of men laying off from those causes resulted in their reducing the number of men on their pay roll by a very large number. In other words, they used to have to carry 20 to 30 per cent more men than they actually needed in order to keep up the full complement of men who were able to work.

A committee—it took over two years to establish a condition in the shop whereby pure drinking water would be furnished, and it was the result of two negotiation periods of all the crafts, and in some instances as a result of one craft asking for a thing to be furnished, and the fact that the other crafts did not have it or had not asked for this particular thing would be used as a basis for refusal.

I do not desire to burden you with all the details. There are 52 of these.

Chairman WALSH. You may turn them in, if you will.

Mr. WHARTON. I will leave them with the commission.

(Witness submitted pamphlets referred to in printed form. They are entitled: "Agreement and General Shop Rules of the Machinists, Boiler Makers, Blacksmiths, Pipe Fitters, and Tanners and Helpers and Apprentices and the Wabash Railroad Co.; In Effect Apr. 17, 1914. Agreement Between the Following Organizations: Boiler Makers, Blacksmiths, Sheet Metal Workers, Machinists, Carmen, Painters, their Helpers and Apprentices, and the Missouri Pacific Railway Co., St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Co.; Effective Apr. 1, 1913. Joint Agreement Between the Rock Island Federated Trades and the C., R. I. & P. Railway and C., R. I. & G. Railway; Effective Mar. 1, 1913. Agreement Entered into Between the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railroad Co. and Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Co. of Texas and the Following Organizations: Machinists, Boiler Makers, Blacksmiths, Carmen, Sheet Metal Workers, their Helpers and Apprentices; Effective Sept. 1, 1914. Agreement Between the Federation of Railway Employees and the Southern Railway and Allied Lines. Also By-Laws and Names and Addresses of Delegates to Fifth Annual Convention, held in Birmingham, Ala., Feb. 24 to Mar. 1, 1913.")

We also submit a copy of the constitution of the railway employees department of the American Federation of Labor.

(Witness submitted printed pamphlet entitled "Constitution and By-Laws of the Railroad Employees Department of the American Federation of Labor.")

In connection with this we desire to state that the aims and objects of this department are primarily and fundamentally—

- (a) To federate all recognized railway craft organizations.
- (b) To shorten the hours of labor to a maximum of eight hours per day.
- (c) To establish a minimum wage scale for all employees in all branches of railway service, in conformity with the principle that all who perform a useful or necessary service are entitled to earn a wage that will insure a decent living for themselves and those dependent upon them.
- (d) To enter into agreements that will establish conditions of employment, beneficial to the moral, physical, and mental development of all railroad employees.
- (e) To abolish the abuses connected with the physical examination and personal record systems, wherever established.
- (f) To reduce strikes and lockouts to a minimum, the department being pledged to a policy of mediation, conciliation, or voluntary arbitration as a means of adjusting questions which can not be settled otherwise.

We believe that the following questions come properly under the purview of the Commission on Industrial Relations:

The hospital service: To which employees are required to contribute their financial support, and on a vast majority of the railroads are denied representation on the managing board, have no voice in selecting the physicians and surgeons, and no financial accounting is ever made to them, showing how and to whom and for what purpose the funds collected are expended.

Insurance: A number of railroads have put into effect a plan of insurance. Employees who can pass the necessary physical examination are compelled to accept this insurance, payment for same being deducted from their earnings.

The old-age-pension plan, as well as the insurance plan, has a direct bearing on the question of employment and in a measure has been responsible for the adoption of rules precluding the employment of men physically and mentally in their prime.

The personal record and physical examination systems, their relationship and effect on the workmen in connection with the so-called scientific management, insurance, and old-age pensions.

Chairman WALSH. I have a question or two I would like to ask you?

I understood you to read from your statement there that there has been no strike, sympathetic or otherwise, on any of these systems, on which the Federated System has been recognized?

Mr. WHARTON. There has been none, excepting the M. O. & G., which I previously explained; only about 250 men being involved.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Markham made a suggestion here to the effect that this would produce an influence upon the industries that were not within your own craft. You got that, I believe.

I want to ask you this: Has the question ever come up—in how many instances where the railway had objected to, for instance, the use of material which came from outside industries where they claimed the conditions were not fair to union labor?

Mr. WHARTON. There has never been a case come to my attention.

Chairman WALSH. Has the boycott been used in that or any other way through this system?

Mr. WHARTON. There has never been any such matters referred to this department, there has not been any such thing discussed or contemplated. In connection with the statement made by Mr. Markham I would like to explain, as an answer to the objection he made to our mechanical organization because of the nature of their membership, it is true that the organizations affiliated with this department have members working in the various industries of the country, but they are separate and distinct organizations, being of diversified character. Their laws are adapted so they will apply to the different industries in which their members are employed.

For instance, in the railroad industry the railroad men absolutely handle the railroad business, subject to the general laws of the organization and the general officers of the organization. It has its executive council and international president. Right in line with that, the laws of this department recognize the laws of each affiliated organization, and in turn the general presidents of these organizations compose the executive council of the department.

If we desire, for instance, to inaugurate a strike on the railroads, it would be necessary for the members of the organization affiliated to this department to take a vote. The grand lodge officers haven't got the authority that Mr. Markham said they had. He said that the grand lodge officers would order a strike, and he went on in a detailed explanation of one man power, and so forth. All of the organizations affiliated to this department, their constitution and laws require that the men must vote for a strike. The majority required by all of them except one is two-thirds. It requires a two-thirds majority of the vote in five of the organizations recognized by this department, and a three-fourths vote of the members of one of the organizations. No question of strike can be taken up by the departments until that power has been given by this affiliated membership. It then becomes a question for decision of the council, and the matter is referred to it for consideration, for conciliation, and every other method or means that might be considered as practical in avoiding a strike.

Mr. Markham spoke, I think, without absolutely any knowledge of this department or its affiliated organizations or its laws when he made the statement that he did.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Markham drew a parallel between what might happen to this organization and with the trouble known as the A. R. U. Why could not that be so?

Mr. WHARTON. Because of the very nature of its formation, the A. R. U.—

Chairman WALSH. Briefly give us, then, if you can, the difference between the formation of the A. R. U. and this organization.

Mr. WHARTON. The A. R. U. was an organization holding as eligible to membership any man that worked on a railroad. It held its meetings in general assembly. Every man of every type, possibly 20 to 25 different classes of men that might be specifically mentioned, craftsmen, transportation employees, and so forth. These men who met in one hall would discuss matters generally. There was no system in their method. For instance, every particular line of work was concerned. It brought about confusion among the men. It brought about a situation where, if by accident a majority of one craft, we will say, as an illustration, there would be a meeting held at which there might be a hundred of one craft attending and something that would come up at that meeting which would be of importance to members of another craft of which there were possibly only 10 men attending, due to the fact there were only 10 of those men there that night, and the question came up did not interest the hundred in the other craft, they would overrule and override the request of those 10 men, and it brought about a feeling that the men could not secure justice within their own organization, resulting in a gradual separating of the men, and brought about a confusion and dissatisfaction within their own ranks. It was exactly the reverse effect of what its proponents claimed for it. And not only in the case of the A. R. U., but in several other organizations of a similar character that have been since and before started, everyone of them dissolved because of this and similar reasons they broke up because of internal dissension, and the absolute inability to control their own affairs to the satisfaction of the majority.

The difference between this form of organization and the organization as now represented in this department is that the department provides for the autonomy of each organization; the craft organization has autonomy over all of its own affairs. It makes its own laws. If it has a grievance, that grievance would be handled by members of that organization. If through the failure of the regular plan of handling grievances an organization fails to secure a satisfactory adjustment, they would then be in a position to refer that matter to the joint board composed of all the board members represented in the federation on that system. It would then become the duty of the federation to pass upon that grievance, and that board after reviewing the evidence in the case and in some instances quite a number of them, we have found that through the advice of this advisory board, that the craft, where the personal feeling entered into the case, had been in the wrong, because of the advice and influence of the members of the other organization looking at it from a more impartial viewpoint the question in dispute would be withdrawn.

On the other hand, if it was decided that the grievance was a just one, the representatives of all the crafts would seek an adjustment by conference with the higher officials, and on up possibly to the highest official of the company who treated with committees.

Our experience in that respect has been to bring about harmony within our organizations by eliminating, to a very large degree, what might be termed "lapping over" of the jurisdiction of the various organizations.

These things I think have been settled more satisfactory to the men and to the company, avoiding what we might term disorganization in their shop organization from the employers' viewpoint.

I do not know of a single instance, and I am quite conversant with the conditions, generally speaking, in that respect, where the employer has regretted having made an agreement with the organizations as organized in this department. That is, generally speaking, the difference in the handling of the business is that we recognize the right of the craft organization itself in this department, but that organization, because of its affiliation with this department has a right to appeal to the department to secure its assistance in adjusting any grievance that may arise.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate for us the mileage of the 52 systems in which this has already been inaugurated?

Mr. WHARTON. Well, it would be a rather hazy approximation. I could give you the information, approximately.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would give us the information, and submit it, will you, please?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes; I can easily give it to you.

(See Wharton exhibit at end of this subject.)

Chairman WALSH. Now, getting down to a few more details in this particular matter here: I will ask you, first, in the 52 systems where this form of organization exists, are the railway clerks in each one of them?

Mr. WHARTON. No.

Chairman WALSH. How many of them?

Mr. WHARTON. The railway clerks is an organization that has had a rather stormy career. They are now passing through practically the same experience that all the rest of the organizations of railway employees have passed through possibly 25 to 35 years ago.

Their efforts to secure recognition are being just as vigorously fought by the railroads as were those of the craft organizations, which have since secured recognition by reason of their persistency. They are being discriminated against in every section of the country where they attempt to organize.

There have been a number of cases referred to the Labor Bureau, the Department of Labor. And I believe that they have had representatives out on the Southern Railway; also on the Pere Marquette, and one or two other roads that I am not just sure of.

I believe that on the Illinois Central Mr. Markham mentioned the fact that the clerks struck at Memphis on September 25. That would be 5 days prior to the date that the strike order was issued, September 30. I understand that there were some 25 or 30 clerks summarily dismissed from the service down there for no other reason than the men could assign than that they were members of the organization. That resulted in the walkouts referred to.

The Boston & Maine and the New Haven & Hartford are two roads on which the clerks have agreements, I believe.

There are several others; this department has been divided into what is called two sections, the mechanical section and the transportation section.

The six organizations that we have named herein form the mechanical section at the present time, the Switchmen's Union of North America, the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, and the International Brotherhood of Steam Shovel and Dredgemen represents the organization that constitutes the transportation department. The formation of this department as it is reorganized resulted from a desire to avoid unnecessary complications, reserving at the same time the right to protect its affiliated membership. I do not think that all of the organizations were entirely in harmony with recognizing every organization that might desire to become affiliated with this department, and as a result of that, at the last convention held in April, 1914, it was decided to establish the department on a basis recognizing what might be considered the basic trades in the railway industry. And that is the reason that the organizations in the mechanical section were limited to those organizations that are now recognized.

Chairman WALSH. Does your organization keep any statistics showing the trend of wages from which could be obtained any definite and reliable data as to the pay of railway clerks? That is, the trend of the pay of railway clerks?

Mr. WHARTON. No; we have no such department as that in the organization.

Chairman WALSH. You heard the comment of Mr. Markham upon that particular subject in which he said one demand was that the railway clerks be recognized in this system and that it was inadvisable to do so on account of the intimate relations existing between the clerks in many instances and the officers of the company. Have you any comment to make upon that?

Mr. WHARTON. Nothing; except I think it was absolutely unfounded. Our relation with the clerks so far as any connection with the service never, in my experience, has had a tendency to prove the statements made by Mr. Markham.

Chairman WALSH. Is it akin to the same question, or is it not akin to the same question that arises with reference to the acceptance of foremen of outside industries into the union? A line seems to be drawn, I notice in many places, by employers—and very fair ones it seems to me—between the class of employees that have intimate relations with the administration of the business from the employers' standpoint.

Mr. WHARTON. Well, I think that might be true to a certain extent in the clerical departments. There are some of the men that might now be eligible to membership in a clerical organization that might be holding or be employed in an official or semiofficial capacity; but the large percentage of the clerks are normally engaged in the performance of assigned duties. They themselves work under chief or assistant chief clerks, and that official relationship I do not believe extends to that class of men. You have one class, and a large number of men, who work upon the timebooks and work like that, in which sense I do not see how they could be considered working in any official capacity.

Chairman WALSH. Where could information be obtained as to the general trend of wages among railway clerks as compared with those of operatives?

Mr. WHARTON. I think that the best information in that line could be obtained from the officers of a railroad company who have the pay rolls on file covering a number of years. My opinion is, and I state it with some little knowledge of this, that the railway clerks' salaries have not gone up nor even been increased to any extent in comparison with the increased cost of living.

Chairman WALSH. You heard Mr. Markham's statement with reference to the general action that was taken really being in substantial violation of the clause in the contracts with the crafts that they should have 30 days' notice. What comment have you to make on that?

Mr. WHARTON. I think that was simply a subterfuge on the part of the company—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Well, what were the facts in regard to it, regardless of motive?

Mr. WHARTON. The facts are that the men in authority did notify the company over the signatures of their selected representatives. If we assume that the employer has the right to dictate to us the form of organization which we deem necessary to protect our interests, then, of course, we would assume that he had the right to say to us whom we should select to represent us.

Chairman WALSH. You mean for notification purposes?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes, sir; also for other business matters.

Chairman WALSH. Well, it seemed to me, the way I gathered it, that certain forms and certain clauses of the agreement were contained in the separate craft agreements in regard to that matter, and that action was taken without recognizing or properly recognizing that provision of the separate contracts. Am I correct about that?

Mr. WHARTON. Well, they had separate craft agreements—that is true; but there was nothing in the agreement, say, a machinist agreement, that would require a machinist to serve a notice. It said that the company should be served with a 30-day notice. It does not say by whom, and giving notice of the changes proposed in the agreement. But, of course, that agreement being made with the machinists, the machinists naturally would handle that.

Chairman WALSH. Wasn't that the chief or one of the impelling motives probably for entering into the agreement, that they were doing it separately? You see this gentleman at least has strong opposition to the confederated system, and according to his statement he has a strong predilection toward the craft system, and no objection to it. Wasn't that, perhaps, one of the moving reasons why he entered into the contract in the first instance, and had a right to expect the notice from the separate crafts?

Mr. WHARTON. Well, I hardly think so. I don't think that was in mind at the time they entered into the agreement with the craft organizations. I do not believe they had that condition or a movement of this kind in mind at all. I don't believe there was any cause for any such reason for refusal to make a system agreement at that time.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you have given the commission many reasons why the federated system was good for both sides. Now, you heard Mr. Markham's statement that public opinion was with them practically unanimously; and he submitted certain editorial comments from the press. What means did you have, if any, or what means did you have, for instance, of getting these facts which have been adduced before this commission before the public who were not in the railway business, so that an intelligent opinion might be formed relative to these matters?

Mr. WHARTON. I think, rather unfortunately for the organizations of the men, they are handicapped in securing sufficient finances to go into the market and purchase the publicity that the employer is able to secure by paying for the information to be circulated through the daily press. Our means of communication are practically nil so far as the public is concerned. We often went to the daily papers published in all the cities and met Associated Press men, and we have found many very fine people among them, and they would promise to do this or that; but when the paper was issued the next day there was nothing in the paper in regard to our position.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Markham did not seem to have the information himself as to the number of railway systems that had entered into this sort of an agreement. Is any direct effort made on the part of your organization to inform the public generally, or even the railway officials themselves, as to the extent to which it has been entered into and the results?

Mr. WHARTON. Well, generally speaking, I think the attitude of the officials on the Illinois Central and the Harriman lines have denied the men from communicating to them that these other agreements were in effect at that time. They refused to meet the men. That, however, would not debar them from having knowledge that these agreements were in effect, because, in my experience in making agreements, I found that the members of the various railroads associated with the managers' associations of this country are pretty well informed as to what the conditions are on every other road.

Chairman WALSH. Well, he said he knew there were such agreements, but that he was not able to give us information as to the extent of them. It seems to me possibly that might have something to do with his making up his mind.

Mr. WHARTON. I think if there had been the same interest shown in the welfare of the men as there was, possibly, for the company, that he could have had that information, as they have always had it in the past in dealing with craft organizations. Any craft committee, in attempting to negotiate an agreement, would be confronted with the fact that such and such conditions existed on all or certain railroads, and that information would be there by simply touching a button, demonstrating that the railroad could easily secure information as to the conditions of employment on every other railroad in what might be termed competitive territory.

Chairman WALSH. At this point, Mr. Wharton, we will adjourn until 2 o'clock, and then you will please resume the stand. Some of the other commissioners may wish to ask you some questions.

(A recess was here taken until 2 p. m. of Thursday, Apr. 8, 1915.)

9800. REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Wharton, will you please resume the stand. Commissioner Ballard has a few questions to ask of you.

Commissioner BALLARD. I understood you to say that there were 52 railroads that had effected agreements with the organizations you are interested in. How many systems of railroads are there that do not treat with them?

Mr. WHARTON. The question of defining that in the form in which you put it would be rather difficult. A system sometimes embraces several different roads. We are in an agreement—that is, the organizations we represent are in agreement with approximately 108 different railroads in the United States and Canada. These systems, as they are divided, and the territory covered by these agreements represent about two—this is approximately—I think about 210,000 or 215,000 miles of railroad.

Commissioner BALLARD. What proportion is that of the whole mileage?

Mr. WHARTON. The proportion to the whole mileage is in the neighborhood of 85 per cent; that is, 85 per cent of all of the railroads are in agreement with some one or other of our organizations. Fifty-two of them recognize the federation.

Commissioner BALLARD. You spoke of the physical examination and enumerated a great many different kinds of ailments, and I am frank to say to you that I am not familiar with them all; but you said that some barred a man from the first class and others barred him from the second class; what do you mean by that reference to first class and second class?

Mr. WHARTON. That definition would have to be answered by the gentleman who drew that circular, as the matter was entirely one of his own invention and subject only to his own interpretation. We are not consulted in any manner with respect to the drafting of such rules. They are forced upon us, not because of our willingness to accept them, but only where we are unable to resist the introduction of such unfair regulations.

Commissioner BALLARD. I gathered while you were reading that—it spoke of some positions in which those persons might work, perhaps depot clerks, or something of that kind, that they might work in such a capacity, but they could not work as first class?

Mr. WHARTON. Generally speaking, I think that would be true, that there is certain classes of service which a man might fill acceptably, while he might be absolutely unfitted for other classes of service.

Commissioner BALLARD. You think, then, it is wrong for the railroad company to bar men who have those diseases from certain classes of service?

Mr. WHARTON. We do not think it is wrong to bar any man from performing a certain service which he is incapable of performing, but we do believe we ought to have some voice and be consulted; and reason and justice should prevail and be practiced toward all concerned, and there should be no arbitrary rule fixed by the employer alone.

Commissioner BALLARD. I noticed, too, that the fee where the man was accepted was $2 and where he was rejected it was $1?

Mr. WHARTON. Possibly the company is poorer than the men; they have made the burden of $2 on the fellow who has to work for a living, but the company, if he is rejected, only has to pay $1. That is another of their regulations over which we have absolutely no control.

Commissioner BALLARD. Perhaps the fact that the doctor gets $2 for those he passes and only a dollar for those who are not passed would have a tendency to make him pass the men?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes; but if he failed to pass a man there would be another man for examination in his place, and he might continue that indefinitely, and make considerably more by turning down the men.

Commissioner BALLARD. In that way he might have the privilege of seeing and turning down many sick men.

Mr. WHARTON. No end to it, and they could be called in and examined as often as the officer who had charge of that determined they should be examined.

Commissioner BALLARD. They spoke of a judge and read some of his remarks, a judge from Texas, I think it was, and he spoke of a good many troubles or complaints. I listened rather attentively, but I could not see where this judge made any recommendations which could be accepted as ameliorating these troubles. Do you remember that he gave any principles that could be adopted to remedy them?

Chairman WALSH. That was in Australia.

Mr. WHARTON. I believe he made his position clear that nothing should be permitted that would have a tendency to, you might say, lower the standard of humanity in any sense, based upon the moral principle that the citizens were entitled to consideration first over and above any mercenary motive.

Commissioner BALLARD. There were a great many "don'ts." Now, what should be done rather than avoided? I could not gather that he gave us any constructive suggestions at all.

Mr. WHARTON. I think he pointed out some of the evils which the principle does not correct, and offered as a basis of an adjudication of that question that all dealings with those questions should be on the broad principle of protecting human life.

Commissioner BALLARD. Yes; that is true, and everybody should deal with it on the principle of protecting human life and bettering conditions of the worker; but he did not tell just how to do it, or I could not gather that he did.

Mr. WHARTON. I should think that that would be a problem that no one man would be in a position to decide. He might point out the way by which conditions in certain industries could be alleviated and a standard established which would, as a whole, bring about the least possible injustice to any in that given industry.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is it.

Mr. WHARTON. I believe that back of his position was the invitation for the employers to recognize and deal with the employees and for them together to work out a system which would be in a sense one that would bring justice in the greatest possible measure without injury to anyone, as far as possible.

Commissioner BALLARD. Our commission is specifically instructed to make some recommendations toward the removal of the existing discontent and troubles in the industrial world. Then, you would say that our commission should recommend that the best way to avoid it would be to suggest that the employers and employees meet together and agree on mutual plans for that purpose?

Mr. WHARTON. I think that could be worked fairly and satisfactorily, provided the same recommendation would carry with it a medium of adjudication in the event that the interested parties failed to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion that would be equally fair to the public and to the employees themselves. There is no desire on the part of the trade-union movement to invoke any system that would be detrimental to the public in so far as safety is concerned. I do not think there is any movement in existence to-day that has been more prominent in its effort to safeguard the interests of human life and limb.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Wharton, I want to get in the record, or in my mind, at least, the question of the influence mentioned by Mr. Markham, of the influence of the railroad, the operation of the membership of these organizations. You heard his statement to the effect that the organizations were composed of members not wholly confined to railroad employment, and that there would be an influence of those in railway employment to dictate the policy of an employer. As a general rule the organizations of railway employees holding membership in these international organizations have their membership into local lodges composed of railway members and contract, commercial members employed in commercial shops outside of the railway service?

Mr. WHARTON. That is the general practice. It is done to avoid misunderstanding between the men working in the various industries. There are some of them that even go further than that, that specialize because of the special nature of the work; these men are granted charters because they are best able to handle the particular class of work in which they are engaged. That is the policy of the organizations. None of these separate and distinct bodies have any voice or control in the matters that do not directly concern them, and these various local lodges and districts as they are formed. Each one has the right to handle its own business.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. For instance, the trouble on the Illinois Central Railroad; the machinists on that road are organized into local unions of machinists; holding membership in these unions are the machinists employed on the Illinois Central Railroad?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And there are not in these unions men who may be employed in building of stationary engines?

Mr. WHARTON. Only isolated cases, just a man here or there. They are what we call railroad locals.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That applies to the other organizations, the boiler makers and blacksmiths?

Mr. WHARTON. Absolutely.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, suppose the members on a railway system were looking toward reduction in hours or increase in wages or some improved condition of employment. Only the members of the organization that are employed on that railway system would vote upon the proposition of the wages or the hours or the conditions in which they were dealing?

Mr. WHARTON. That is absolutely correct. The system has been worked out and in effect for years that only those that were directly concerned would be permitted to participate.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Those employed in other shops, holding membership in the same international organization, would have no say whatsoever?

Mr. WHARTON. Absolutely none.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So that the machinists and the boiler makers and the blacksmiths and other organizations in railway employment are as separate for the purpose of dealing with railway companies as is the brotherhoods?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Or transportation men.

Mr. WHARTON. Exactly the same, as far as their railroad affairs are concerned.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It is the policy of these organizations that only those men who are to be directly affected by a question that might involve them in a strike, for instance, only the men who were directly affected by such strike are permitted to vote upon it?

Mr. WHARTON. That is absolutely true.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And in the case of the machinists, for instance, requiring that they shall by a three-fourths vote, a majority of three-fourths for the privilege to take action?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And after they have that vote taken, they then haven't the power of striking without they have the permission and sanction of their international officers?

Mr. WHARTON. That is correct.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And substantially they have no power to order a strike unless the membership have decided by a 75 per cent or a majority of at least 75 per cent that they want to strike?

Mr. WHARTON. That is true.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the officers are only empowered to give their sanction to a strike, not to order it?

Mr. WHARTON. That is correct.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The matter originally of bringing about, as I recall it in my experience, the matter of the necessity of federations or joint handling of grievances by the organization was in a way brought out by you. I want, for my own benefit, to have it straightened out in the record.

In former years when the organizations were dealing independently, I will cite an instance: The machinists, as a rule, have the largest membership of any of the several crafts employed in the railway service; there are a larger number of machinists—I mean the shop trades?

Mr. WHARTON. Excepting only one, I believe.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is, you refer to the carmen?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The locomotive men. Their membership would probably be about three to one of the other organizations?

Mr. WHARTON. From that to five.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In dealing with the individual trades ordinarily the machinists would be the first organization that would be brought up for an adjustment of their schedule?

Mr. WHARTON. I believe in a majority of the cases that was the rule.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then the adjustment reached with the machinists in that schedule, if it was a question of hours or overtime rates, all those things that would uniformly apply to these trade agreements being made with the machinists, that then would be a criterion that the company would require all other organizations to bring their contracts to agree to that?

Mr. WHARTON. Except to this point, that the weaker organization would be discriminated against to the extent of forcing them possibly to accept some things not as good as that secured by the machinists, and using the fact that the machinists had signed up and were bound by their agreement to bring about that very condition.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The point I make is that the other trades could not hope to get any better conditions than the machinists had agreed upon.

Mr. WHARTON. That is true.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If they secured or agreed upon nine hours, the other trades could not expect to come in there and ask for eight hours.

Mr. WHARTON. That is correct.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Because they could not secure them. And for the further reason that a great number of violations of individual contracts were taking place, resulting in either the separate organization accepting the violation or resisting it on some occasions to the extent of a strike, that being purely an individual case. Now, by the system of federation contract being, as you have indicated in your statement, similar with all, where they applied alike, there would be less opportunity of violation because of the more thorough understanding of all in charge as to what they meant?

Mr. WHARTON. That has been demonstrated and they have proven eminently satisfactory to those operating under federated agreements.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is, the superintendent of the machine shop would have the same understanding of it as the superintendent in the car shop?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And would not be liable to have one of several constructions placed upon it by the several superintendents having charge of the different agreements?

Mr. WHARTON. That is true.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So that by avoiding that opportunity for misunderstandings you have reduced very materially the number of misunderstandings occurring and very largely the necessity of strikes?

Mr. WHARTON. The record speaks for itself. Since 1908 there has been no strike on roads where the federation was recognized.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In answer to a question asked by Mr. Ballard, you stated that while there were conferences held, and so on, there was no adjustment; that there should be some other method, then, by which an agreement might be reached. A number of witnesses before this commission have indicated that it might be possible to have some sort of department or bureau in which the Government itself would be directly interested. Has the railway employees' department or its officials given thought to whether the Government might create a board for the purpose of mediation and conciliation and, where requested, voluntary arbitration? That is, if differences between the companies and their employees might be had?

Mr. WHARTON. The executive council of the department of the railway employees department have gone on record, and I stand instructed to advise the ment wherever complications arise which they are unable to adjust of their own efforts or through the officers who are appointed to look after the matter; that in that event they appeal to the Department of Labor and ask for a conciliation or mediation committee to be appointed to act in an effort to bring about a peaceable adjustment of the trouble.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And personally would you think it would be a good thing for this commission to recommend to Congress that a board with those authorities, with this authority, without having compulsory power, avoiding anything like compulsory arbitration, but having in mind purely the point of getting the people together and using the good offices of the Government for the purposes of mediating would be a good thing?

Mr. WHARTON. I do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon wishes to ask you a few questions.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Wharton, can you tell us—I ask this question because of some things that were read and that I had heard yesterday. Can you tell us what efforts were made by the department to bring about mediation, conciliation, or arbitration in connection with the Illinois Central and Harriman lines at first?

Mr. WHARTON. I might say that this department, as it is now reorganized, did not come into existence until after the inception of the strikes on the Harriman and Illinois Central lines. We therefore did not have the opportunity prior to the strike of using our offices in connection therewith. Since that time there have been efforts made by the department, which will be fully explained by other officers of the department.

Commissioner LENNON. Are you aware as to whether the separate organizations made any effort in that direction prior to the strike or at its very beginning?

Mr. WHARTON. I am not in a position to answer what was done by the officers prior to the time I took charge of the department, or accepted the present position to which I have been elected.

Commissioner LENNON. I want to ask one question on the line which Mr. O'Connell asked. Suppose you have an agreement with a company—your department—and the machinists working for the Baldwin Locomotive Works became involved in a strike, have the machinists who are in your federation the power to interfere, under the laws of your federation system, if those engines were brought to a road where you were employed—

Mr. WHARTON (interrupting). I do not—

Commissioner LENNON (continuing). Would your federation rules permit the machinists to take independent action?

Mr. WHARTON. Under our laws there can be no independent action on a matter that jointly affects the men affiliated to the department.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, the machinists could not go on a strike without affecting the whole department, could they?

Mr. WHARTON. Not very well.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, then, your rules would forbid a single organization taking action in a case of that character?

Mr. WHARTON. Under those conditions.

Commissioner LENNON. Now, in your statement regarding the A. R. U., I don't know whether it is quite clear in the record or not. Your federation is not an organization for the ultimate purpose of dissolving the craft organizations.

Mr. WHARTON. On the other hand, it is for the purpose of strengthening the craft organizations.

Commissioner LENNON. And protecting them?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner LENNON. And the A. R. U. started in with the proposition that they were to dissolve them?

Mr. WHARTON. I believe that was their claim to popularity.

Commissioner LENNON. I believe that is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Garretson would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In regard to the physical examination, Mr. Wharton, has your experience given you any line as to how that is applied on men trying to secure positions with the average company, as well as on those who are in the service?

Mr. WHARTON. Well, our experience has been that so far as it has been worked out it has been a detriment to the men, going and coming.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Either returning to the service or attempting to enter it?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you come against an instance where, say, a company crippled a man, say, to the extent of the loss of a finger joint, we will say, and settled with him for the ordinary dollar clearance, and where a reduction in service, we will say, took that man out, have you ever known of an instance where that same injury was used to debar him from reentering the service of that company on the grounds that he was unfit?

Mr. WHARTON. I think, speaking generally—and we can verify the statement—that that has happened in hundreds of cases.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The sum total of the amount received was possibly his doctor bills and $1?

Mr. WHARTON. I don't say that he received his doctor bills, because the employees in the service of that company paid for that doctor through their contributions to the hospital fund, but if he was not wise he signed the release and the doctor pocketed the dollar.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And he was debarred from following that vocation with that employer for and on account of the injury which it had done him, and for which it had not reimbursed him.

Mr. WHARTON. I believe that is true; and in a good many cases, if they refer to that road in seeking employment, on any other road they will be rejected on account of that fact.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That would occur only on roads where the physical examination is rigidly applied?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. There are others where it is not done?

Mr. WHARTON. That is true.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Speaking of the statement made by Mr. Markham yesterday in regard to the railway clerks, that there was an intimate and confidential relation existing between the clerk and the company that made it undesirable for him to be organized or affiliated with other organizations. Has your experience taught you that the class of clerks that join organizations have any intimate relation with the company, any more than any other employee, except those employed in direct contact with the officials of the company in the various departments? Wasn't that claim even more rigidly made against operators on the ground of the intimate relations in the transmission of officials' messages, and therefore ought to be barred from organization?

Mr. WHARTON. That is true; and in going further back I think they applied it to conductors who handled the cash for the company.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then in your opinion that claim is not well founded?

Mr. WHARTON. Absolutely not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Under the federation form which you represent where there is the joint agreement covering—what did it embrace, seven crafts?

Mr. WHARTON. Six.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Six crafts?

Mr. WHARTON. That is in the mechanical section.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes. If a member of one of those crafts considered that he had been unfairly dealt with by his employer under the terms of the agreement, and he brought his claim to the organization to which he belonged which, I suppose, would be the method of procedure—

Mr. WHARTON. That is correct.

Commissioner GARRETSON (continuing). Would that organization be at perfect liberty to take up by itself the adjustment of that claim, if they so desired, before taking it to the federation?

Mr. WHARTON. That is required.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It is not only optional but necessary?

Mr. WHARTON. Necessary.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And if they can effect an adjustment alone, it never goes to the federation?

Mr. WHARTON. That is the manner in which we carry out all business of that kind.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The complete autonomy of that organization is maintained in the federation?

Mr. WHARTON. Not only maintained but guaranteed.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And the federation is not invoked until the organization aggrieved, or to which the aggrieved member belongs, has exhausted its own resources?

Mr. WHARTON. That is correct.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Aishton would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Wharton, Commissioner O'Connell asked a question about a Federal board of conciliation and mediation, and as to what your attitude would be to that. I understood you to say that you were in favor of a proposition of that kind.

Mr. WHARTON. Of a voluntary board of mediation and conciliation.

Commissioner AISHTON. A voluntary board, but not an appointed board—

Mr. WHARTON (interrupting). Well, let me qualify that. We would be opposed to any law being enacted that would bring into existence a commission that would have authority to compel us to accept arbitration against our wishes.

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes; I understood that to be your reply.

You are familiar—I am just asking you for the information of the board of commissioners—with the Canadian act, known as the Canadian labor act? I believe it provides, in a way, for investigation, conciliation, mediation, publicity, and for the suspension of any strike order for some certain period.

Mr. WHARTON. To a limited degree, I am.

Commissioner AISHTON. Do you think that would help to solve some of these problems we are all confronted with?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes; but on the other hand there are some very objectionable features to the Lemieux law, I believe it is called.

Commissioner AISHTON. I am not very familiar with it myself.

Mr. WHARTON. I am satisfied that one of the objectionable features of that law is based upon the fact that it gives an opportunity to the employer which it does not give to the members of the trade-union. There have been cases where it worked out, I believe, in connection with the miners in Canada, where the miners' organization was practically put out of existence because of the employer taking advantage of the law, which permitted him to make all the preparations for a strike—securing strike breakers, and all. The law gives 90 days, and this 90 days would be used by the employer absolutely with the object in view that at the end of 90 days he would so conduct his end of the negotiations that it would be impossible for a settlement to be reached, and he would have—in the 90 days gone by—gathered forces of men to enable him to fight the men that were asking for what they thought they were entitled to. That has been one of the objections to the Lemieux act, I have heard.

Commissioner AISHTON. The objection comes from delay.

Mr. WHARTON. From delay and the opportunity.

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes; which would be taken advantage of.

Mr. WHARTON. Yes; which has been taken advantage of.

Commissioner AISHTON. You said, Mr. Wharton, there were 52 railways in which this federation system had been given recognition?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. Have you any objection to giving the commission a list of the crafts in each one of those 52 roads for our information, and which you—

Mr. WHARTON (interrupting). We can get that information. I haven't got it.

Commissioner AISHTON. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that at any convenient time—

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Just let the record show that the statement has been called for from Mr. Wharton as to the number of crafts that constitute the federation upon each system of the 52 roads mentioned by him, as well as the total mileage of the systems.

Commissioner AISHTON. And would there be any objection to the number of men engaged in each of the crafts?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; the number of men also engaged in each of the crafts.

Mr. WHARTON. I can only give that approximately, as the only place it can be secured accurately is from the companies' pay rolls.

Chairman WALSH. Well, do it as closely as you can. It does not need to be exact.

(See Wharton exhibit.)

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Wharton, you read into the record this morning some 12 or 14 letters from different railroads, referring to the operation of the federation and the reasons leading up to the federation on those railways. Those letters were, I believe, written by secretaries and treasurers or the officers of the federation on those roads?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. There was no evidence submitted directly from the railroads or from the railroad officers as to the operation of that arrangement?

Mr. WHARTON. That is a matter which we have no control over. We were simply gathering information as to what the experience of our members had been on the roads where these agreements were entered into, and these opinions generally—the information sent to us would be based upon the experience and the expressions of the officials with whom they dealt. I can say that personally there were at least five or six roads that were represented by some of the members of our organization in the system where the officials had stated a preference for dealing with a single committee for all crafts.

Commissioner AISHTON. Those roads represented about 35,700 miles, did they not? I believe I looked that up.

Mr. WHARTON. On the other hand, I think they represented far more than that. I can name about five roads that represent about 35,000 miles of mileage on but five of those roads, I believe.

Commissioner AISHTON. Well, the M., K. & T. has how many?

Mr. WHARTON. Well, I will name the ones that I am familiar with. If you want to—or I can give it to you now—

Commissioner AISHTON. Oh, it is not very important, but if you have it handy there—was the B. & O. one of the—

Mr. WHARTON (interrupting). No; I did not say anything about the B. & O. Commissioner AISHTON. I thought there was a letter there from the B. & O.

Mr. WHARTON. C. & O., I think—the Chesapeake & Ohio.

Commissioner AISHTON. Wasn't it the B. & O. boiler makers—

Mr. WHARTON (interrupting). No; I referred to a strike on the B. & O., and that the New York, Ontario & Western cited that as the reason why they should organize a federation of the New York, Ontario & Western. And the other case you mentioned was from Mr. Nolen, representing the boiler makers, I believe, who spoke of similar conditions in the Southeast. We can give you the mileage—

Commissioner AISHTON. Well, it is immaterial; you can submit that. If you please, with the other statement.

Chairman WALSH. I might make a suggestion that, as long as you are submitting that, you can give us the mileage and the approximate number of employees on each one and add the total at the end, and then we can look at the record and see how much mileage—

Mr. WHARTON (interrupting). Yes. For instance, I might state one road I was connected with a number of years, which might perhaps give a basis—the Missouri Pacific system. That has a mileage of 7,250 miles, and I find there are between 6,500 and 7,000 men employed in the trades represented in the federation, and we can arrive at the average number of men based on the mileage. We can give an approximate figure on it, but we have no access to the exact figures.

Chairman WALSH. I understand, but you can give us the mileage and give us approximately the number.

Commissioner AISHTON. We do not expect to be accurate, but you have a pretty fair idea.

Mr. WHARTON. Yes; we have a pretty fair idea and will be pleased to do it. (See Wharton exhibit.)

Commissioner AISHTON. At the time these agreements were entered into, were some of these roads then in the hands of receivers?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes; I believe—I recall to mind that particularly one road, a small road, the Missouri & North Arkansas—a small road.

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes; and that was also true of other roads you mentioned this morning, was it not? I think there are five roads in the hands of receivers—I didn't get interested and didn't get time to look that up, how long they have been in the hands of receivers.

Mr. WHARTON. Well, the Missouri & North Arkansas is one of the roads mentioned in the hands of receivers at the time it recognized the federation, and the strange thing was that the officials declined to make the agreement and the judge overruled them.

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Wharton, among the reasons for federation was given the fact that agreements were not lived up to and enforced. Take the separate craft agreements, generally speaking, there are certain instances in which they are not—but, generally speaking, are not agreements as between transportation companies and separate crafts lived up to?

Mr. WHARTON. Well, I prefer that the representatives of the transportation organizations should speak for the transportation organizations; I am not representing any of those organizations.

Commissioner AISHTON. I am speaking about the shop crafts, machinists and boiler makers; it was advanced by you as a reason why a federation was advisable and necessary for the protection of the men that those agreements were not lived up to.

Mr. WHARTON. That is true; that is one of the reasons advanced, among others. We have in mind the organization of a system of railroads where there are possibly 15 or 20 per cent of the men employed at isolated or small division points, intermediate division points. They are not located where they have the benefit of the organization, and the men are not in a lodge where committees can be regularly appointed and so forth, and where the interpretation of agreements might not be understood, because those points did not have representation in the conference where the agreement was made, consequently the men at those points are working at a disadvantage; and I want to qualify this with the idea of placing the general officials in the right light. We have found that the local officials take advantage of the conditions, and when we take these cases up eventually, if they come to our notice, the general officials would rectify the causes of complaint. But it worked out in this way: that unless we put a man on the road and got these men in touch with the situation and sent men directly there to investigate the conditions, that the local officials continued to take advantage and that possibly 20 per cent of the men on the system would not be getting the benefits they were entitled to under the agreement; that the most of the large points would have the benefit of the cooperation of the men, but the small points would be in the condition I have described until some one was sent to such points to see that the agreement was complied with as entered into.

Commissioner AISHTON. Would it actually work out that way, in your opinion, at the present time if a schedule was entered into with the machinists and we take the ordinary railroad of 12 or 14 divisions, possibly 500 miles to a division, two or three points on each division where there are men in that craft located; in the making of a schedule at the present time is it not the usual practice for a delegate from each division to be present at a conference, at a meeting, and the negotiation with the officers of the company, and to agree on the rules; and when those rules are agreed to, are they not printed in book form ordinarily, and if not, in typewritten form, and the employees all have a copy of them; and the officers, subofficers, and the officials who have to do that, don't they also have copies of that, and is there such a wide diversity in the interpretation of that thing as you fear might take place? Now, this is more in the nature of a chat about it. With the federation idea, how—what would be the difference? How would you make a schedule with a railroad of that character and arrive at the rules and compensation? What would be the machinery used to do it?

Mr. WHARTON. The system of procedure would be that each organization affiliated with the System Federation would hold a district convention of their respective crafts. That generally occurs at what we call annual or biennial meetings, at which they transact the routine business of their organizations and at that time each craft would draw up what they considered a preliminary form of schedule for negotiations. Each one of these craft organizations selects from among the members of their district a delegation of from three to five members who compose what is known as an advisory board of the members of their respective organizations.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is, three to five advisory members; that is, on the division?

Mr. WHARTON. No; that is for the entire system; that is selected from the division representatives; these 3 to 5 are selected to act on the advisory board of the federation. The federation with 6 crafts would have a representation of 30 men. Those 30 men select an executive board, a president, and a secretary.

Commissioner AISHTON. Of the employees?

Mr. WHARTON. All employees—we are only speaking of employees now. So those committees or advisory boards of five each, would bring the proposed craft agreements together and they would eliminate all the differences that existed, and they would present one set of general rules instead of having what they formerly had, six sets of general rules. I mean rules covering overtime, hours, and so forth, and those things that can be standardized and apply equally to all trades.

The duty of this advisory board is to draw up the general rules, representing as near as possible the requests of the various trades. That is the principle on which we would work out the general rules.

Then each of the crafts present what they call their special rules dealing with the specific questions differing from the other crafts.

Commissioner AISHTON. Questions pertaining to their craft alone?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes, sir. It seems to me that it is an advantage to the employer for the men generally to iron out their differences in that way without any expense whatever to the company. Then when they go before the company they have already ironed out their differences and have come to a mutual understanding as to jurisdiction and various other matters that bring about dissension, such as existed under the old system. And when they go before the management they are in a position to negotiate an agreement based on what they have agreed on between themselves, and if it is acceptable to the company they have established a condition which removes, in my opinion, many objections to the craft agreements and brings about a better relationship between employers and employees in the shop trades on railroads.

Commissioner AISHTON. Has there been many jurisdictional disputes as between the different crafts?

Mr. WHARTON. Quite a number.

Commissioner AISHTON. From your experience you ought to know.

Mr. WHARTON. I will give you an illustration of one thing that has been instrumental in causing a great many that have arisen in the last two or three years, the introduction of doing work by acetylene or electrical welders, a form of machine that does the work of all of the crafts, for instance, and takes work out of the blacksmith shop, and takes work out of the boiler shop, and so forth. Through that system of doing work it brought about a feeling, you might say, of strife between the various organizations, and it became necessary for them to get together and devise a line of demarcation as to the line of work they would perform. That is one thing that has, within the last few years, brought about a number of jurisdictional disputes which have assumed serious proportions in some of the shops in different portions of the country.

Commissioner AISHTON. I never heard of anything of that kind in a railroad shop and I did not know how serious it was.

Mr. WHARTON. I would like to be in your happy position, but, unfortunately, we know those things come before us and evolution and the introduction of new methods of doing work has been one of the most difficult problems that we have been confronted with in endeavoring to bring about peaceful and harmonious relations between employers and employees.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There have been several organizations claiming jurisdiction over the pipe trade?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes; and we have attempted to establish a condition which would relieve both our organization and the companies from any trouble because of that jurisdiction.

Commissioner AISHTON. Have you been successful in removing those causes for jurisdictional disputes where the federation had contracts?

Mr. WHARTON. Generally speaking, I don't know of any case that has come to us where we have not succeeded in protecting the interests of the employer and brought about a satisfactory arrangement without cost to the employer.

Commissioner AISHTON. Take Mr. Markham's illustration of yesterday as to the Baldwin Locomotive Works; I was not clear, in your reply to Commissioner O'Connell, about the avoidance or the lack of mutual interest in a matter affecting the locomotive works. Take the Baldwin Locomotive Works and suppose they had a strike and for some reason or other they put in nonunion labor in the shops and some railroad had a contract for locomotives and they came on the road. Am I to understand that there would be no question as to the roads right to use those locomotives or repair them or do any work that might be necessary on them that would arise with the machinists in your organization?

Mr. WHARTON. As far as I am acquainted with that, there have been several strikes in the Baldwin Locomotive Works and other locomotive works, and there has never been that question injected into it in this department, but there has been no strikes since this department was organized.

Commissioner AISHTON. Has the question ever arisen as to the use of non-union locomotives on a road on which your federation had a contract?

Mr. WHARTON. I think in some individual crafts, organizations acting independently; I do not believe the department was in operation—that there was a case or two where an effort was made on the part of that craft organization to protect its membership to the extent of bringing up a possible adjustment of the strike, but not to the extent of refusing to work on the locomotives that had been contracted for, but they used what I termed legitimate efforts in trying to induce the railroad companies to which their members and workers belonged to place their contracts with contractors who were fair to the members of their organization.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The Baldwin Locomotive Works at the present time are still nonunion?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And there is no trouble about the locomotives on the road?

Mr. WHARTON. No, sir; there has not been since I have been connected with this department. However, I can show you, and I believe this is as good a place to make this point as any, that the Baldwin Locomotive Works in 1904, I think it was, during the Santa Fe strike, sent possibly several hundred men to the Santa Fe Railroad to take the places of striking machinists on that road under a leave of absence for 90 days, transportation both ways—were loaned to the Santa Fe Railroad, to defeat the union machinists who were on strike at that time. The same Baldwin Locomotive Works during the period of this strike, for the life of this strike, which existed about 4 years, sent in carload lots of material made from a standard form and assisted the Santa Fe Railroad in every way possible.

Now, if we imagined that that condition would arise again and we had the organization to protect the interests of the people we represent we would certainly exercise our fullest power to protect our members.

Commissioner AISHTON. I should think so.

Mr. WHARTON. We want to be absolutely candid about that. That is our position.

Commissioner AISHTON. You could not hardly forecast, however, what might be done in a case of Baldwin locomotives coming to any railroad with which your federation had a contract?

Mr. WHARTON. The only thing I can say is that they come and we have never made—the fact we have made no objection speaks for itself. That is self-evident. We are receiving engines from the Baldwin Locomotive Works to-day on the various roads on which we have practically union-shop conditions and there has been no objection to working on the Baldwin locomotives or anybody else's when they come to this company and were owned by this company. But I say this: That we would object to working on a locomotive that came from a road on which our members were involved in a strike. We would not permit the employer to use our organization in one section of the country to defeat the members of our organization in another section of the country, not if we knew it.

Commissioner AISHTON. In this discussion in your paper this morning, Mr. Wharton, with regard to these detective agencies, you said something that I did not just catch the drift of, that there was no objection to the Federal Government using detectives' service, I believe it was?

Mr. WHARTON. I said that we believed that was necessary—that that was a function of government, pure and simple.

Commissioner AISHTON. You think detective agencies ought to be under the supervision of the Government or do you think the Government ought to really operate any detective agency?

Mr. WHARTON. Well, I do not presume to answer for the Government on a matter of that sort. As a matter of fact, there is not a government in existence of any description that has not found it apparently necessary to maintain what they term a secret service. And, I presume, legitimately used, it has served a very useful and necessary service in connection with the Government. There is certainly no desire on the part of labor organizations to be opposed to anything that is necessary and useful.

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes; you want to handle it as peacefully as possible?

Mr. WHARTON. Absolutely.

Commissioner AISHTON. Which is perfectly right.

You said, I believe, in answer to some inquiry here a while ago, that in your railroad department there were six crafts?

Mr. WHARTON. That is in the mechanical section.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is in the mechanical section?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes. Do you want the names?

Commissioner AISHTON. No. I do not care about that. That point was not in my mind. The point that was in my mind was this: It was testified, I believe, yesterday, that in this demand of the federation of the Illinois Central that there were nine crafts?

Mr. WHARTON. That is true.

Commissioner AISHTON. There must have been, then, other than these six shop crafts in your railway department interested in that Illinois Central Railroad matter?

Mr. WHARTON. In answering that question I will have to explain some things that this department has tried to do. There are in the American Federation of Labor, I believe, 110 international unions affiliated to that body. Each one of these organizations has a jurisdiction, so called, governing the work presumably that their members are supposed to do. Take it in a railroad. We find there is what we term the overlapping of jurisdiction of a trade. We find, for instance, in the car department of a railroad that there are painters employed and possibly several other trades. And in the car department as the organization is composed of strictly, purely, and simply railroad men, that embraces all the men working in the car department, so to speak; they have painters in their organization. But on the Illinois Central painters, decorators, and paper hangers, which is one organization that Mr. Markham mentioned, had some members on that road, and they had been recognized by the company themselves.

They also recognized the steam fitters, an organization which has since been, through amalgamation—is not now in existence. That made two organizations that would be represented in the six organizations that we have represented in this mechanical section. The other organization that he mentioned, which we do not mention, is a federal labor union, composed of laborers and helpers, and so forth. The jurisdiction of the organizations affiliated to this department take in all their helpers now. There was a time when they did not. It has practically removed the necessity of the formation of a federal labor union, which embraces men and is a plan of the American Federation of Labor of offering, you might say, protection of an organization to men who are not eligible to any craft organization. That is what brought the so-called federal labor union into existence.

With this form of organization that we have, as I have said before, the men who are actually eligible to the federal labor union are now as helpers eligible to the various organizations represented in this mechanical section. That removes the necessity of the federal labor union. And the amalgamation of these other trades, the jurisdiction of car men covering the painters, eliminates two other trades that were represented over there.

Now, in connection with the railway clerks, and I presume, because of the attitude, the hostile attitude of the railroad managers, and because we did not feel ourselves in a position to assume a burden which might mean disruption to us, involving us in fights which we were possibly illy prepared to carry on, we have simply adjusted ourselves to a condition not because we did not believe we were right, but because we desired to conform as near as possible with the condition which we were forced to meet and had no control over.

I think if there is any set of men in this country that needs the beneficent protection of a trade union, I believe that that man is the railway clerk. And certainly we would like to assist them even more than we are assisting them in the interest of humanity. But, as I say, we have drawn up this plan of organization here trying to outline a plan on a practical basis, one which will meet with the least possible objection from the men whom we have got to deal with, and which at the same time offers to us that degree of protection to which we believe we are entitled.

Commissioner AUSTON. There is a certain amount of overlapping, Mr. Wharton, of the different crafts—that is to say, these six in your railroad department in the shop and railroad department.

Now, your federation is not limited to these six you say overlap into other organizations, and in that way don't you get mixed up with interests outside of railroad interests?

Mr. WHARTON. I think it is just the reverse of that. I think we prevent your railroad companies from becoming involved in trouble with an organization who might have a few men working in your shops, which if we did not have control over them would use the influence of the other organizations to start a possible strike in a shop when they only had less than 5 or 6 per cent of the men employed there.

This they can't do under our system of organization, because we control the situation. If there is going to be any strike on a railroad where the federation is in existence, it has got to be in accordance with law, by the two-thirds or three-fourths majority vote as described earlier, and also the fact that they have got to have the sanction of the executive council of this department. I think if the employers want to do something for universal peace and something that will be mutually beneficial both to the employer and to the employees and the public in general they would encourage the form of organization which we have established.

Commissioner AUSTON. The general practice on railroads in making contracts to-day outside of the roads that you have contracts with is that the machinists make contracts for machinists, and the boiler makers make contracts for boiler makers, and the blacksmiths make contracts for blacksmiths, and so on?

Mr. WHARTON. We do the same thing in the federation. I thought I explained that. If you will permit me, I will make that clear.

Commissioner AISHTON. I didn't understand that.

Mr. WHARTON. I thought I made that clear. I said this advisory board which had the authority to negotiate was composed of three to five men from each craft. These men are elected by the machinists, the boiler makers, the blacksmiths, and so on, and these men represent their organization in negotiating for the agreement.

Commissioner AISHTON. Now, the advisory committee is three men out of each craft?

Mr. WHARTON. Three to five.

Commissioner AISHTON. Three to five?

Mr. WHARTON. Yes; optional with the System Federation.

Commissioner AISHTON. At the present time the difference lies in this: That at the present time in negotiating the contract you have a representative from every division familiar with every condition on the entire railroad, haven't you?

Mr. WHARTON. Not necessarily so.

Commissioner AISHTON. But isn't that the way it generally works out?

Mr. WHARTON. No, I can't say that it does. I tried to explain that here once before—that the smaller points on the system were absolutely not represented, and the agreement that was adopted was not put into effect, because under that form of organization the men didn't get out over the road and protect the small points. Just the reverse of that exists in the organization of the federation, because we appoint these men at the smaller points, and therefore establish a system of handling that does away with that condition, once it is signed up.

Commissioner AISHTON. I think that is all, Mr. Chairman.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You were asked a question regarding the Lemieux Act a few moments ago. You are reasonably familiar with its workings in Canada, what is known as the compulsory investigation act?

Mr. WHARTON. Something of it; yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a fact that at the time the Lemieux Act was originally proposed that it was supported by almost the entire Trades Labor Congress of Canada, and that the coal miners were its most enthusiastic supporters?

Mr. WHARTON. That is correct.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And is it not true that it has been broken oftener by the coal miners than by any other interests, and that the trades labor assemblies that formerly approved it, after experience with it, denounce it the most widely?

Mr. WHARTON. I think if the miners had not broken it the miners would have been broken.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Therefore, the very people that advocated it now denounce it, after being familiar with its workings?

Mr. WHARTON. They denounce it—the manner in which it has been used and the manner in which it has been drawn, because they have found the weaknesses in it, and in an effort to get that made right, after it was once enacted into law, as they have been absolutely defeated, and because of that they have been compelled to take the bit in their teeth and tell the Government to put them into jail if they want to put them all in jail.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And are you aware as to whether or not it has been testified to before this commission by representatives of the Canadian Government that there were not enough jails in the Dominion to hold the people that had violated it?

Mr. WHARTON. That was the only safety the men had, was in their numbers—the fact they had not built enough jails to take care of them.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. You will be excused.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JAMES J. MEAGHER.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your full name.

Mr. MEAGHER. James J. Meagher.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. MEAGHER. Clinton, Ill.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. MEAGHER. Machinist.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you followed that occupation?

Mr. MEAGHER. About 18 years.

Chairman WALSH. Are you connected with any labor organization?

Mr. MEAGHER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What one?

Mr. MEAGHER. The machinists'.

Chairman WALSH. Are you connected with it in any official capacity?

Mr. MEAGHER. I have been president of Local No. 641, International Association of Machinists, ever since, well, I presume a year or a year and a half prior to the walkout in September, 1911.

Chairman WALSH. Are you still connected with it?

Mr. MEAGHER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. In what capacity?

Mr. MEAGHER. Well, the lodge has since sent in its charter, because of the few remaining in the strike zone. I am still a member of the machinists' organization.

Chairman WALSH. Were you involved, were you a defendant in any of the injunction proceedings testified to by Mr. Markham yesterday?

Mr. MEAGHER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. West has advised me that you desire to make a statement that might throw light upon that situation, and especially upon a certain portion of it in which you were involved yourself?

Mr. MEAGHER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would, as briefly and concisely as possible, give the history of that litigation.

Mr. MEAGHER. I will. Thank you. A portion of Mr. Markham's testimony on yesterday refers to James T. McCloskey, James Meagher, and Fred Irwin for violations of the injunction, alleged to have been committed at Clinton. Mr. Markham further states the case was heard by the Federal judge and the parties dismissed with a warning.

This is a slander on me—

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would just state the facts in connection with it.

Mr. MEAGHER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. We try to conduct our examinations under a rule that no matter what anyone tells he is not to be characterized either personally or in his motives, so just state the contrary facts if they appear there.

Mr. MEAGHER. I would like to tell you a few of the incidents leading to my arrest, if you please.

Chairman WALSH. That is perfectly all right, but just observe the rule that you are not to characterize the motives of the person. Just state what occurred.

Mr. MEAGHER. In 1911, in October, 1911, a restraining order was issued from Judge Humphrey's court of the southern district of the State of Illinois restraining the men from doing picket duty in and about Clinton. I was named as one of the defendants. A special train conveyed a United States deputy marshal and his aid to Clinton to serve the papers.

Chairman WALSH. Excuse me. Where was the court sitting—the southern district of Illinois—at Cairo?

Mr. MEAGHER. At Springfield, Ill. I beg pardon. I forgot to mention that.

The sheriff of Dewitt County met Carl Person and myself on the street and said, "There is a United States deputy marshal up in the Illinois Central office who wants to see you." We went up to the Illinois Central office to meet the United States deputy marshal and he served me with a copy of the restraining order—temporary restraining order. When he handed it to me he said, "Take it home and read it carefully, because it means everything it says." I read it over in the office there and I said, "I will save you the trouble going around to these men and looking them up individually. You call at the federation headquarters in the morning and you can serve all of these men at once."

Chairman WALSH. How many were mentioned in the restraining order, if you remember?

Mr. MEAGHER. Oh, I would say maybe 300.

Chairman WALSH. Generally, it was against what—committing acts of violence?

Mr. MEAGHER. The bill of complaint which was filed in Judge Humphrey's court asked that an injunction be served, claimed these men had committed acts of violence, and I will state there before I go any further that up until that time and after there had been no acts of violence committed in the vicinity of Clinton and the issuance of the restraining order was unwarranted. But why they happened to send for me in particular I do not just exactly understand, but they did.

At a meeting in the morning after the United States marshal had served the papers, I warned the men against doing anything contrary to the order.

I believe that we were all asked to appear in court at Springfield, Ill., on November 6, and show reason, if any, why the injunction prayed for should not issue.

We appeared. We filed an answer to the bill of complaint denying the charges contained in the bill of complaint and Judge Humphrey made some modifications in the order. Judge Humphrey's words were: "There are many things these men can do, and very few things they can't do. They can picket. They can persuade peacefully the employees of the Illinois Central to leave their work if they wish."

I conveyed that message to the men on strike at Clinton, and again advised them against committing any violence whatsoever.

In December, about the 29th, a United States marshal came to my room and placed me under arrest. When I asked him what the charge was, he said: "Violation of restraining order." I said, "Well, what is the specific nature of the charge?" He said, "Violation of restraining order."

I was brought to Springfield, Ill., with three others. However, the fourth man is not mentioned in Mr. Markham's paper. I will give you the reason later on why this man is not mentioned in this paper.

We were brought to Springfield and asked for a bond in order that we might be able to prepare our case; and after an attorney representing us had learned the specific nature of the charge, Mr. Drennon, who was the prosecutor for the Illinois Central Railroad, told our attorney that there were many more arrests to be made at Clinton, Ill. However, this man who was arrested with us, by the name of Harry Andrews, said, "Well, there isn't any occasion for me to wait. I will just stand trial." And he was sent to the workhouse for 30 days. When we came to trial it appeared that a man by the name of Chenoweth had been responsible for my arrest, having filed an affidavit in court to the effect that I had intimidated and threatened him. On the witness stand the same Chenoweth was forced to admit that he had been coached by the Illinois Central attorneys. Just about two weeks before that there had been a shooting affray in the city of Clinton. Three strikebreakers were arrested for having shot at some strikers, and were placed in jail. On the day of our trial at Springfield these men were taken out of the county jail at Clinton and brought to Springfield and testified on behalf of the Illinois Central.

About the only thing that developed was that two of them had been carrying guns around Clinton and for some reason had deposited them in a saloon on one particular evening. A saloonkeeper by the name of Frye testified to the same thing, and another by the name of Moore, he said that on one occasion the strikers had approached him to talk to him about the strike, and he said that if they did not leave him he would show daylight through them. Three gunmen, if your honor please, testified in behalf of the Illinois Central, in an effort to convict three men, strikers, on the charge of having violated the injunction.

Mr. Drennon then got into a dispute or argument with the other attorneys who were local to Clinton. The name of the firm is Lennon & Lennon. They got in an argument, and Drennon says, "Why, Meagher is all right with us yet." He arose and he said, "Your Honor, I move that you dismiss these cases." And Judge Humphrey said, "It seems to me as though some one should be prosecuted for perjury." And he immediately ordered his bailiff to telephone to Peoria and have Harry Andrews released.

Mr. Markham said yesterday that advertising the strike, from their point of view, had been paid for at the usual advertising rates, and when the cases were dismissed at Springfield there wasn't any mention made of it at all. We could not pay the advertising rate.

Now, Mr. Markham comes and testifies into this record about me and said that the judge dismissed me with a warning, which means I was probably guilty, but he let me off with a warning. A man of Mr. Markham's character, the president of a railroad, carries weight when he makes a reckless slander of a man's character, and especially in front of a public hearing. My character is even more to me than his, because it is collateral to me in securing a job.

He also read into the record what Justice Wright had to say about strikers and the strike; but he fails to tell of an important thing that Judge Humphrey told in the court at Springfield; and I repeat that Judge Humphrey was thoroughly disgusted and said that some one should be prosecuted for perjury. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. What was the record in your case? Were you dismissed from the charge of contempt?

Mr. MEAGHER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Mr. Meagher.

Mr. MEAGHER. I thank you.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. McCreery.

TESTIMONY OF MR. J. S. McCREERY.

Chairman WALSH. Your name, please?

Mr. McCREERY. J. S. McCreery.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside, Mr. McCreery?

Mr. McCREERY. Paducah, Ky.

Chairman WALSH. And your business, please?

Mr. McCREERY. I am general vice president of the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen.

Chairman WALSH. Are you connected with this System Federation or with the department of the American Federation of Labor having to do with the railways?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes; I am president of the Illinois Central System Federation.

Chairman WALSH. President of the Illinois Central System Federation; that is the one involved in this matter?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would sketch, beginning at this time and going back, what your business has been—that is, your connection with any trade organizations, of any sort, and your private employment since you have been employed.

Mr. McCREERY. Going back to the beginning, my connection with the railroad work?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. McCREERY. I began work for the Illinois Central in 1901—January 2, 1901—and was in their employment until the time of the calling of the strike, September 30, 1911. I began work for the Illinois Central at the rate of 12½ cents an hour and worked my way up and learned the trade, and, in fact, worked at mighty near all the different lines of work in the car department—that is, along the line of handling tools—until the strike. And during that time, and for about six years previous to the strike, I was a member of the general grievance board, or general joint protective board of my organization.

Chairman WALSH. What was the general joint protective board?

Mr. McCREERY. The joint protective board is the board made up of men representing each local upon the system of the organization, with a chairman and secretary and vice chairman.

Commissioner ARSHTON. Composed of carmen exclusively?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Are you familiar with the conditions which obtained in the Illinois Central shops prior to the organization of the System Federation?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Would you be kind enough to please give us now a concise statement of the character of agreements that the crafts had with the organization, the working of them, and violation or nonviolation of the agreements which you had, and all those matters which might have a bearing upon this question which led up to the difficulty?

Mr. McCREERY. Well, I will go into details in regard to the contracts with my organization, and I will dwell upon the other contracts so far as my knowledge will permit.

The organization that I represent, the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, we had contracts with the Illinois Central officials and have had for as long as I have been a member of the organization—that is, when I first went to work—and previous to the change of management here a year or so ago we were able at all times to negotiate very fair conditions to work under. At least, we had no trouble in arranging audiences with the management and negotiating conditions, shop rules, and rates of pay. True, we were not always able to secure the amount of increase in salary we thought we were entitled to, but there was very little friction between the management and the men.

But beginning with the change in management of the Illinois Central, the attitude of the officials of the company toward our organization and especially the other shop crafts seemed to be altogether different from the old management. They began to introduce piecework in the car department. Nevertheless Mr. Markham said, in his statement here, that they had not.

Chairman WALSH. Perhaps, now, then, if that is the case, you had better give us the details, briefly, of the facts leading up to the introduction of piecework.

Mr. McCREERY. Well, we had a contract with the management based upon an hourly rate of pay—hourly and monthly rate of pay—and so specified in the contract.

Chairman WALSH. That was in your own craft?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes; and the management, without any notice whatever to the men of a desire to change the method of performing the work or the pay, they began to install piecework upon the system in the different shops.

Chairman WALSH. Well, at what shops and what did they install?

Mr. McCREERY. Well, I will use the shop I worked in as an example, and what I will say in regard to that will apply to the other points on the system. That is Paducah, Ky. They began putting in this system and having the material stacked up along the line of tracks where the cars were to be repaired, upon certain tracks, and men were put over there without any knowledge as to what they were going to do, as far as their duties from the railway company, and the work was checked up after them. They were required to go ahead and do the necessary repairs, rebuilding of the cars, and the material was furnished—something that had not been done before. The material was brought right to the job. Previous to that whenever the men wanted material for a car or a job they would have to go to the bins or storeroom, wherever it was, to get it, and lose that time running back and forth. As soon as they began this system, why, they began to deliver the material to the cars and to the job where the men were at work. Then the appointed men—clerks out of the offices and men without any experience whatever or any knowledge whatever of the repairs or construction of a railroad car—to check this work up after the men. They would get along—they were supposed to go along and see what the man had done and record it in the book, but they were unable to do that, and they had to depend entirely upon the statements of the men themselves as to what quantities and character of work was performed upon the job.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was that the "rip" work or building.

Mr. McCREERY. Repairing and rebuilding. And this began to raise a general stir among the men. It was a new method of performing the work, and they did not know what it was. They did not know whether they wanted it or not, and they began to ask the officers for a price list, so they would know what they were paying for such jobs. These price lists were repeatedly denied the men. The men did not even know what they were receiving for the different classes of work until the end of the month. After the first month the piecework checker would come around with his book and he would say, "You have made $10 or $20 or $30 more than your rate. Do you want it?" Well, if he said he wanted it, he marked it down. His partner—the men generally worked in partners—his partner, he would tell him, "Why, you have earned so much. Do you want it?" And if he said "No," why, in the future he never made very much over his rate, if any. Now, that is my experience along that line.

Furthermore, after we had made repeated requests upon the company to discontinue their efforts to establish piecework, claiming that it was in violation of our agreement, based upon the 30 days' notice to be given us if they desired to make a change in the method of performing the work or pay, which they had not done. They ignored our appeals, and we were unable to cause them to rectify matters, and eventually all the men were checked up after that regardless of whether they were accepting piecework or not and were required to make their rate—their hourly rate—whatever that might be, according to piecework price; and they knew not what those prices were. In fact, at the end of the month they came around to this man employed on piecework and wanted to know if he wanted to take that, and he would say, "No; I don't want that piecework. I don't want it, and I don't like it, and I don't believe that is a fair method of performing the work, and I won't accept it." And the other man accepts it, and he will come around at the end of the month and say to him, "Well, you have not made your rate according to our prices." And he will say, "I don't care if I didn't; I have done as much work as my partner." "Well, you have not made your rate, and you will have to do better." And the result was that when lay offs came some of these men were laid off that according to the checking of the company had not made their rate, regardless of the fact that they had a clause in their contract giving them seniority rights in regard to laying off.

And we further, in fighting this introduction of piecework, we made investigations and we found that men who were anxious to make this extra money, they would accept it; they were in the minority though—a very small number compared with the full crew. Those men who were anxious to accept this work in instances we cited to the officials, we showed where they had turned in work that really had not been performed; that they had turned in, in one instance that I have in mind, where a man repaired and put in 18 inches of decking. Now, decking is the bottom of the car—the floor—18 inches running lengthwise of the car; it goes clear across to the other side; you are paid so much a foot. They claimed this man repaired 18 inches of it the running length of the car, and he turned in 18 feet; and it went on for two weeks before we found it out, that is, before we got it before the officials. We took it before the local officials, and at that time they just took the information and that is about all they did at that time. Later on, about two weeks or a matter like that afterwards, this man was let out for some reason; I don't know, but the checker, the man supposed to check up this work, that put this down there, was retained.

We have also found where men had turned in draft-rigging, drawbars, springs, and trucks as being applied, when in fact the rust upon the nuts showed they had not been touched. It showed they had not been removed and replaced. I know that from personal observation of the cars that I found the checking on, and I went out and made the investigation.

Now, in putting this matter up to the officers of the company, they waved us off when we told them that we should have had 30 days' notice and given an opportunity to come in and discuss this matter and to show them our objections to it. They just waved us off; and the times were such and our organization was such that we were not in a position to rebuff them in their effort to establish that method of work.

The other crafts began to see that if this was established in the car department it would be established in the other departments—the machinery department. They finally issued slips to all of the crafts. When a man went to check in in the morning, you go by the check window and you are handed out—this is before 7 o'clock—you are handed out a brass check, and at noon you turn that brass check in. Each man has a number, and when you go there and call for the number he gives you the check, and at noon you turn that back in, and before 1 o'clock you go and get it again, and then you turn it in at quitting time in the evening. And when a man in the morning would go to work he was handed out a slip, a little slip about as big as the face of this [indicating] that said at the top of it, "Piecework slip," and on that it was spaced off and a man was required to put down the amount of hours work on each job. This matter was taken up under protest by the different organizations before the officers of the company, and they says, "Oh, no; that is just a system to find out how much it is costing us to do the different classes of work, and in order to know just exactly whether to charge your work to freight work or to charge it to passenger work."

I will say, in explanation of that, that a man working on a passenger engine, why, his work is charged to passenger work, and a man working on a freight engine, his time is charged to freight work; and they claimed this was just in order to keep the record of that.

But the stronger organizations, they put up the hardest fight, each organization working for itself; and the stronger organizations were able to get that discontinued; but the weaker organizations had to continue. The men especially in the car department had to continue doing that, even those that were not accepting the piecework; and the piecework, the stand that the men took against piecework was this: The officers of the organization—myself for one—had studied the piecework question previous to this. I knew a little about it when they started to install it there, and our position was that the establishment of piecework would eventually weed out the old employees of the company—weed them out entirely, because they would be unable to keep pace with the younger ones. It would also make old men out of young men before they reached middle age. And another thing that the men had no question—had no voice in the making of the rate or in the method of performing their work in any way; they had no voice in the question at all. That, and a good many other things.

After the new management had taken hold, certain rules in the contract were abrogated to a certain extent. Now, for instance, I have, or we have in ours, a rule that is applied—that is, it is in use or is the same in several different contracts outside of our own organization. The machinists have the same contract, and I believe the boiler makers and the blacksmiths, where a man working at night or day, as the case may be, is transferred to take the place of another on another shift, he shall be entitled to time and a half for the first 15 days or nights, whatever the case may be. That had been allowed right along. Those rules were made—well, away back in 1909, I believe, was the first time that we got that rule. And that had been in effect and had been complied with. But all at once we were told that at certain points on the system, "We can not afford to give you that. We can only give the man time and a half for the first night." I will state one specific case that I took up, in order to illustrate. I took up a grievance from Paducah, where the man was working in the day, at regular work in the day, in the roundhouse as engine carpenter, and the night man happened to be sick, or laid off for some cause, and one of the day men was required to go on at night and work in his place. That man worked for about a month. When he got his time it showed that he had received only time and one-half for the first night, when our contract says that he shall receive time and a half for the first 15 days, as the case may be. In taking that up with local officials, they said they could not grant that, and being unable to adjust it with the local officers, I took it up with the superintendent of the car department in the general offices at Chicago, making a trip of about 400 miles to Chicago, and taking it up with the superintendent of the car department; and this is the exact words, the best I can remember, that he said in his answer to my contention for the clause. He didn't raise any question as to the contract giving it to us. He says, "Why, we can't afford to comply with that." "Well," I says, "Mr. Barsdale, this rule is made here. This contract is made by the officers of the company and the representatives of the men, and signed up by them, and bears their signatures;" and I says, "It is still in effect." He says, "I can't help that. The company can't afford to pay the men 15 nights or days overtime, filling another man's place temporarily." He says, "We just can't afford it."

Now, I am telling you this in order to show you the attitude of some of the officers toward the men. Not only was that the case—that case was adjusted, eventually, when it was appealed to the higher officials—but it cost us five times more money than it amounted to the man to get it adjusted. No more probably would we get that case adjusted and returned to our homes, when the same thing would occur at some other point on the system, maybe 900 or 1,000 miles away, and our laws required us never to take up a grievance without going first to the place of the grievance and investigating to find out if the grievance is justified, or if there is sufficient evidence to justify the grievance—if we have sufficient grounds to take it up and handle it. And a great many times we go to a place like that and are called where the grievance occurs, and go there and investigate it, which would take us two or three days in order to get the evidence, and then go before the officials with it, and maybe fight it out for a week or ten days, sometimes two or three days—different times. Sometimes we would be able to get a meeting right away, and sometimes have to wait; and sometimes we would get it adjusted, and sometimes we would not. All these things tended to bring about a general dissatisfaction.

Another thing to my knowledge in other crafts was the introduction of the speed-up system. They gave orders there all at once at my local point, to my knowledge, to speed and gear the machines up higher, which resulted in burning up tools—the burning up of tools that were not tempered high enough to stand the increased speed. It raised a complaint from the men. There were a good many things of that kind that showed the men that the company was, it looked like, trying to disrupt them. It would work one organization against the other, too, in negotiating agreements. I have been up there after the machinists have been up or the boiler makers, or some other craft, and was told, "Now, we can't afford to give you any more than we have given them." Or, "We can't afford to give you this, because if we do, when the boiler makers come in they will want it or somebody else will want it." I man accepts it, and he will come around at the end of the month and say to him, "Well, you have not made your rate according to our prices." And he will say, "I don't care if I didn't; I have done as much work as my partner." "Well, you have not made your rate, and you will have to do better." And the result was that when lay offs came some of these men were laid off that according to the checking of the company had not made their rate, regardless of the fact that they had a clause in their contract giving them seniority rights in regard to laying off.

And we further, in fighting this introduction of piecework, we made investigations and we found that men who were anxious to make this extra money, they would accept it; they were in the minority though—a very small number compared with the full crew. Those men who were anxious to accept this work in instances we cited to the officials, we showed where they had turned in work that really had not been performed; that they had turned in, in one instance that I have in mind, where a man repaired and put in 18 inches of decking. We have also found where men had turned in draft-rigging, drawbars, springs, and trucks as being applied, when in fact the rust upon the nuts showed they had not been touched. It showed they had not been removed and replaced. I know that from personal observation of the cars that I found the checking on, and I went out and made the investigation.

Now, in putting this matter up to the officers of the company, they waved us off when we told them that we should have had 30 days' notice and given an opportunity to come in and discuss this matter and to show them our objections to it. They just waved us off; and the times were such and our organization was such that we were not in a position to rebuff them in their effort to establish that method of work.

The other crafts began to see that if this was established in the car department it would be established in the other departments—the machinery department. They finally issued slips to all of the crafts. When a man went to check in in the morning, you go by the check window and you are handed out—this is before 7 o'clock—you are handed out a brass check, and at noon you turn that brass check in. Each man has a number, and when you go there and call for the number he gives you the check, and at noon you turn that back in, and before 1 o'clock you go and get it again, and then you turn it in at quitting time in the evening. And when a man in the morning would go to work he was handed out a slip, a little slip about as big as the face of this [indicating] that said at the top of it, "Piecework slip," and on that it was spaced off and a man was required to put down the amount of hours work on each job. This matter was taken up under protest by the different organizations before the officers of the company, and they says, "Oh, no; that is just a system to find out how much it is costing us to do the different classes of work, and in order to know just exactly whether to charge your work to freight work or to charge it to passenger work."

I will say, in explanation of that, that a man working on a passenger engine, why, his work is charged to passenger work, and a man working on a freight engine, his time is charged to freight work; and they claimed this was just in order to keep the record of that.

But the stronger organizations, they put up the hardest fight, each organization working for itself; and the stronger organizations were able to get that discontinued; but the weaker organizations had to continue. The men especially in the car department had to continue doing that, even those that were not accepting the piecework; and the piecework, the stand that the men took against piecework was this: The officers of the organization—myself for one—had studied the piecework question previous to this. I knew a little about it when they started to install it there, and our position was that the establishment of piecework would eventually weed out the old employees of the company—weed them out entirely, because they would be unable to keep not gone into this other, of course, as to who gave the company the right, or who sold it to the company, or turned it over to the company; I don't know. I don't say for sure that those are the facts, but that has always been my knowledge, and it is public knowledge. It is generally understood by the employees, especially at Paducah, that that was the way that property was given to the employees. We paid over monthly—it was taken out of our wages, rather, monthly, whether we wanted it or not. We were not asked anything about it. And when I went there to work they sent me to the hospital to be examined, and they didn't ask me if I wanted to pay the hospital fees or join the association.

I went over and was examined and came back and went to work, and as long as I worked there so much money was taken out; it was on a percentage basis and was taken out of my wages as long as I worked there, every month. We did, eventually, after continuous complaints, get representatives on the board. We only had two men out of the shop crafts and one or two out of the transportation organizations, and the rest of them were made up of company officials, and I will state—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). Was that when it was the Newport News & Mississippi Valley?

Mr. McCREERY. No; the Illinois Central.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then you had representation on the hospital board all that time?

Mr. McCREERY. No, sir; we never got it until the last six or eight years.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You have representation now?

Mr. McCREERY. They did before the strike.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I mean other employees?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes; the transportation. I understand that since the strike—shortly after the strike—these new men who were brought into the shops were presented with a vote, to vote this property into the hands of this new hospital association, and it carried.

Commissioner LENNON. What percentage did you pay out of your wages before we leave that point?

Mr. McCREERY. I will state that if you made $50 or less, 50 cents was taken out of your wages; if you made $50 or more and up to $75, 75 cents was taken out of your wages; and if you made between $75 and $100, then you paid $1.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You heard the testimony on that subject yesterday?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And the representation also that the company did not have any representation?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes, sir. Well, I will tell you; I will give you a little of my experience about that representation. I was asked one time by the officers of the road, the superintendent of the Louisville division, to submit my name, that he wanted me on that board. After we had got the requests granted to give us representation they said, "Well, you shop crafts pick out your men; we would suggest that you pick one from the car department and one from the metal crafts"; and that was submitted to the men to select their own men. I being the chairman of our department over there, I was told by the superintendent, he says, "Here, Mac, put your name on that, we want you on that board." If he did that to me he might have done it to some one else; he might have picked his own men everywhere he went.

So, coming down to the time of the formation of the federation, I want to state we felt it was our best interest to unite our interests to offset these policies of the company to establish piecework on the system—numerous reasons and numerous things that caused us to get this federation idea in our heads. So the men at Paducah and Burnside and Memphis, Tenn., who had all got together locally and had been working that way on different questions that pertained to the interests of all of the employees combined with the different local officers as a joint local committee of the federation.

I will say that at Paducah, my home town, that the master mechanic for some time and the general foreman had received a federation committee of all of the shop crafts at that point and adjusted grievances with them until he had orders from headquarters to break it off, and he did break it off rapidly and refused to meet us any more.

I will state that the efforts that were made to organize the federation—the minute Memphis was organizing a federation and wanted to get it organized right and in harmony with and along the lines we hoped to organize, they wrote a letter to Paducah requesting that we send a man down there to teach them and give them an idea how to operate, as we had been organized locally for some time; and a committee was appointed by the different crafts there, through the local federation, and I was one of that committee that went to Memphis and told those fellows how we had formed our local federation and assisted them in organizing their local federation, composed of three men from each shop craft.

After we had organized that local federation we decided that we would ask the men at Paducah, Ky., and the men at Memphis, of all of the crafts, to levy a voluntary assessment on the men of 25 cents in order to raise sufficient funds to send a couple of men over the road to organize local federations of the men at the different points. Well, we were successful in that and it was taken before each organization and ratified and they appointed a committee to go out and solicit a voluntary contribution of 25 cents, and that fund was raised at Paducah and Memphis and was spent for two men, one to go north and one to go south, and get the men of the crafts together and organize an association by taking it up before the men in a big, general meeting, to see if they were in favor of forming any such federation, and, if so, to select a delegate from each local and instruct them to come to Memphis on May 1, 1911, for the purpose of organizing themselves into a System Federation.

I will state that when the men convened at Memphis, we found out that all of those men who had asked for transportation were flatfootedly denied transportation although they had agreements with the company to furnish transportation; they were denied transportation when it was found that they were going to Memphis for the purpose of forming a federation. That was in strict violation of our contract with the company.

After the formation of the federation at Memphis, the representation of which was made up of one man from each local organization on each system, we drew up laws, rules, and regulations to govern that organization, and we selected—each craft did—an advisory board composed of three men from each craft all over the system. For instance, the carmen selected three men to represent them on this advisory board, the machinists selected three men to represent them on this advisory board, and the boiler makers selected three men, and so on all down the line, so that our board was composed of 27 members, the president, vice president, the secretary, and treasurer being included in that 27 men.

So, after the convention at Memphis, we returned to our respective homes with the understanding that each craft was to draw up their respective rules. I will state in connection with that that it is necessary for each craft to have special rules, because the men of one craft can not be governed by the rules of another craft; the work is so different that it requires different rules. But there were rules which we embodied in one general set of rules known as "general rules," asking that the men of all the crafts be given the same consideration as to rules that would apply to all of the men alike, such as transportation and such as overtime, and we instructed the different organizations to draw up these special rules and recommendations for general rules and to have it ready and for the board to meet at Paducah at a later date on the call of the president. As I said, I was elected president of that meeting. Later on, I called the board together in Paducah, Ky., and at that meeting we took the different contracts—special rules, rather—that were handed in by the different organizations, and after going through them and compiling them and compiling our general rules, we drew them up in a form and sent them to a printer and had them printed in this form. Here is the general rule that comes first, that pertains to the hours of work and to the overtime and to transportation, drinking water, sanitary conditions, and such as that, that apply to all men alike. Then it comes on down with general rules covering the different crafts, special rules covering the machinists, special rules covering the boiler makers, blacksmiths, carmen, painters, clerks, and so forth—federal labor union. We drew them up, and those rules and those special rules from the different crafts are based upon the contracts in effect at that time with very few changes in the special rules. We thought—we had in view the idea that if we were recognized—if we could get recognition as a federation, with some few concessions, we would do well that year, and we did not insert or inject anything in there that we thought would prevent us from being recognized; we were very particular about that.

So, after these rules were drawn up, or at the time, just after these rules were drawn up, I was instructed by the board to send Mr. Foley—I mean to send the officers of the railroad, the superintendents of the different departments—a letter telling him of the formation of the federation and of our desire to meet them, and I heard Mr. Markham make the statement yesterday—he read a letter where he was notified of the formation of the federation and on being asked if that was the only communication that passed, he said yes, that he had no record of any other. I have some letters here and I want to read them into the record of this investigation. Here is a letter—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Before you get to that, I want to see if I can straighten out something in my mind. In talking about this hospital association, what you said about representation on the board applied to the hospital at Paducah, Ky.?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes; to that alone.

Chairman WALSH. As to the general association, the general hospital association, the employees had no representation on the board, just as Mr. Markham said; that is correct?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes; to the best of my knowledge.

Commissioner ASHTON. Beg pardon; this charge of 50 cents against those who received under $50, and of 75 cents against those who received $50 and up to $75, and of $1 against those who received $100, applied to Paducah alone?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Commissioner ASHTON. And not to the general situation?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes. This letter was drafted and sent to Mr. Foley after the rules were drawn up and compiled.

Commissioner LENNON. Give the date.

Mr. McCREERY. June 10, 1911. It was as follows (reading):

PADUCAH, KY., June 10, 1911.

MR. T. J. FOLEY,

Assistant General Manager Illinois Central Railroad, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: The following organizations, International Association of Machinists, International Association of Steam Fitters, Brotherhood Railway Carmen of America, International Association of Sheet Metal Workers, Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers, Painters and Decorators, Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron-Ship Builders of America, and Federal Labor Union, representing employees of the Illinois Central Railroad and allied lines, have formed a Federation of Railway Employees of the Illinois Central Railroad and allied lines and have, through the executive board representing all of the above organizations formulated rules and special agreements covering working conditions and wage scale, and we desire to inform you that these rules and agreements are now in the hands of the printer and will be ready within a week and will be submitted to you. It is the desire of the executive board, representing these federations, that an audience be granted them at the earliest possible opportunity for the purpose of discussing and adopting these agreements, and to notify the undersigned of date set for conference, allowing time to arrange for transportation to reach Chicago on date assigned by you.

Yours, truly,

J. F. McCREERY,
President.

W. E. BOWEN,
Secretary.

A copy of this letter was sent to R. W. Bell, superintendent of machinery; W. A. Summerhays, superintendent store department; M. K. Barnum, general superintendent of machinery, and to J. M. Barrodale, superintendent car department.

In reply to that, I got a letter from Mr. Foley's office, signed by the chief clerk, dated June 27, 1911.

Chairman WALSH. Was that letter put in the record yesterday by Mr. Markham?

Mr. McCREERY. The first was, but the rest of them were not. Not receiving any reply from Mr. Foley—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). What have you read heretofore that was not put in the record yesterday in the statement of Mr. Markham?

Mr. McCREERY. Nothing; I just read that first letter.

Chairman WALSH. That first letter was in Mr. Markham's statement?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What are you going to call attention to which you say was not in his statement—that his statement furnished no correspondence in regard to?

Mr. McCREERY. I am going to give you the correspondence.

Chairman WALSH. There seems to be a conflict now between you, and what are you going to claim he did not submit?

Mr. McCREERY. I am going to submit a letter from Mr. Foley's office setting forth the fact or setting forth the information that Mr. Foley was out of the office and that upon his return—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Go ahead, I think it will show for itself when you get it in.

Mr. McCREERY. That was June 10, the letter I have read to Mr. Foley, and we were patient in waiting until July 10 before taking the matter up with him again. No; I beg your pardon—yes; on July 10 I wrote this letter; we never received any reply to that [reading]:

PADUCAH, KY., July 10, 1911.

Mr. T. J. FOLEY,

Assistant General Manager, Illinois Central Railroad Co.

DEAR SIR: On June 10 I sent you and subordinate officers a letter telling you of the formation of this system, of the different organizations, into a System Federation, and of our desire of meeting you in conference on proposed agreements covering all organizations affiliated as shown in headlines; and on June 21 I also forwarded yourself and subordinate officers copies of general rules and special agreements, and as yet have received no reply.

Now, as the men over the system are getting very restless and are crowding me for information along this line, I would ask that you let me know as soon as possible as to time of audience with our committee, in order that I may be able to appease the men, a great many of them not being able to understand why there should be such a delay.

Again asking you for as early a reply as possible.

Respectfully,

J. F. McCREERY,

President.

Now, then, in answer to that I received this letter [reading]:

CHICAGO, July 13, 1911.

Mr. J. F. McCREERY,

1246 North Thirteenth Street, Paducah, Ky.

DEAR SIR: Your letter July 10 calling attention to your letter June 10 remaining unanswered has just reached me.

I was out of the city the greater part of June, and since my return Mr. Barnum, general superintendent of motive power, has been absent and is leaving to-day for a couple of weeks. I have not had an opportunity to confer with Mr. Barnum relative to the matters brought out in your letter, and for that reason same can not be given consideration until his return, at which time I will write you further.

Yours, truly,

T. J. FOLEY,

Assistant General Manager.

On July 24 I wrote Mr. Foley [reading]:

"Your letter of July 13 at hand and contents noted, and replying beg to inform you that I can not, after a careful perusal of it, consider that it conveys anything definite regarding the proposition at issue.

"When I consider you were notified June 10 of the desired meeting of all of the crafts on the system you represent, and later, June 21, in conformity with my letter of June 10, the proposed agreements were forwarded to you, it seems to us that the proper consideration has not been given the matter.

"After waiting what in my opinion was a reasonable length of time, I wrote you July 10, requesting an audience; your reply to the letter states that you will have to confer with Mr. Barnum, who is to be absent two weeks from the date of your letter, and for that reason same can not be given consideration until his return, at which time I will write you further."

"Experience has taught me that there is too much valuable time consumed in long-distance correspondence, and furthermore the constant demand made upon me by the different crafts all over the system to take some action which will result in an audience being granted to the committee, and in tones which indicate that they are more than impatient, constrains me to inform you that a better understanding can be arrived at by a personal interview than by correspondence and have so advised Mr. Knox, vice president, and Mr. W. E. Bowen, secretary-treasurer, who with myself will compose a committee for this purpose.

"By this method we can ascertain just when the audience is to be granted, thereby placing me in a position to convey something definite to the men on the system; to this end I beg to inform you that the committee mentioned will visit you July 28, and I sincerely trust that there will be no delay in granting us an audience, and furnishing us with the desired information.

"Respectfully, yours

"J. F. McCREERY,
President.

Now, I will state I waited upon Mr.—I mean I came into Chicago; on account of the expense I did not call Mr. Bowen, secretary-treasurer, from New Orleans; it had been so expensive. I came into Chicago and had the vice president, Mr. Knox, who lives in Chicago, to accompany me. And we waited upon Mr. Foley in his office to secure an audience, and we appeared at the office. As stated in the letter, we were being crowded by the men for some definite answer and we wanted to know just what the company's attitude was going to be. Mr. Foley questioned us in regard to why break the relations that existed now in dealing with individual organizations, and questioned that to some extent, but he never did say nor he never has said yet that it was necessary; he never had said up until the time of that circular letter that it was in violation of the 30-day notice, or they could not recognize the federation or they would not recognize the federation. I was led to believe in that audience that an audience would be arranged and granted by Mr. Park and Mr. Barnum on their return to the office; and I went away from that convention thinking that that would be—I mean from that hearing—thinking that would be arranged. I went from Chicago down to New Orleans, the office of the secretary-treasurer, and we sent out a circular letter over the system telling the men of the efforts made to secure an audience, and that I believed that just as soon as these officers would return that an audience would be granted. At that time no question was raised at all about the 30-day notice.

Well, after that we waited in vain until August 1. On August 4 the circular letter was sent out by Mr. Barnum which was read into the record yesterday, and I do not suppose it will be necessary for me to repeat it, giving the company's side or the company's reason for not granting an audience to this committee. Of course he goes on, says "certain individuals styling themselves of the 'federation of railways' asked to have an audience." He raised the question of 30 days' notice.

Then in order to appease the men over the system and to come to a better understanding as to what our attitude would be, I called the entire federated board or the federated board, advisory board, into Chicago, and after arriving here why I wrote Mr. Foley another letter and sent it over to him. I first rang him up on the telephone, right in the meeting where our board was meeting. I rang him up at his office and I told him I had the board in there, and that we would like to have an audience with him. And he said that the company had taken the stand they would not meet this federation. I told him to grant an audience and let us get together and talk over the matter and see if something could not be arrived at. He said, no; that their letter fully answered everything, I mean the federation stand in the matter. Then I wrote a letter to him which is as follows (reading):

"The committee representing the above federation is now here and desire an audience with you for the purpose of ascertaining when the agreements presented to you some time ago may be discussed.

"From telephone conversation with your office to-day, we can only infer that it is evidently your intention not to comply with requests made upon you for an audience; if our deductions are correct we will be pleased to have you confirm them, in which event we will submit the matter to the grand lodge officers, who are now here for their consideration and future action.

"Please acknowledge receipt by bearer, and your reply can be made to me at room 506 New Southern Hotel.

"Respectfully, yours,

"J. F. McCREERY, President."

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock. Please resume the stand at that time, Mr. McCreery. (Thereupon, at 4.30 of this Thursday, April 8, 1915, an adjournment was taken until to-morrow, Friday, April 9, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

CHICAGO, ILL., Friday, April 9, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners Lennon, Aishton, O'Connell, Ballard, Garretson.

Chairman WALSH. We will proceed. Mr. McCreery, please resume where you left off yesterday evening.

TESTIMONY OF MR. McCREERY—Continued.

Mr. McCREERY. I believe that I had reached the point where I stated we had sent a communication and I read a letter that was sent to Mr. Foley after the advisory board had reached Chicago. In answer to that he sent a copy of a letter that was sent out over the system to the individual employees by Mr. Barnum with an inclosed attached note.

Chairman WALSH. Please pitch your voice a little higher, Mr. McCreery, as the room is large, and some have difficulty in hearing you distinctly.

Mr. McCREERY (reading):

"DEAR SIR: Attached hereto copy of circular letter issued to-day. It very concisely states our views on the subject discussed therein.

"Yours, truly,

"J. T. FOLEY."

The circular referred to was the letter of Mr. Barnum's. Then, at that stage, we turned matters over to the general officers, and I will read you a report that was sent out to the men over the line giving the efforts made by the board and the general officers to secure an audience (reading):

To all brothers:

In connection with my duties as president of the federation I desire to inform you of the ultimate result of the attempt of the executive board to secure an audience with Mr. Foley for the purpose of discussing the merits of the proposed agreements submitted to him from the various craft composing this federation.

In the reports of the grand lodge officers, submitted herewith, everything subsequent to the refusal of Mr. Foley to meet the executive board is detailed and submitted to you for your consideration and final action.

I believe, however, that the attitude of the executive board in connection with the matter should be submitted to you in order that you may intelligently decide what your decision will be.

In connection with our endeavors to secure the audience with Mr. Foley we used every available argument we possibly could through correspondence to secure the audience and to move the officials from their arbitrary stand but without avail; we at no time intimated to the officials that the proposed agreements were our ultimatum; we were prepared and are yet to modify them where it could be shown that any part of them were unreasonable or unjust to the company; they at no time maintained that they were, yet they arbitrarily refuse to grant us an audience for the purpose of giving us an opportunity of discussing the merits of them.

We are not unmindful of the magnitude of the proposition, neither is it our desire to place upon the company a burden too heavy to bear, but we do maintain that no valid reason has been advanced by the officials why they refuse to grant us an audience.

Mr. Barnum's letter embodies the very principles against which the crafts protest, and which caused the birth of the federation, realizing from experience that very little could be secured through the efforts of any one organization, hence the necessity of collective efforts to secure what they believed they are entitled to, and if you are of the same opinion now as you were when assisting in the formation of this federation then your duty is clear. It is my desire that you consider this question calmly but firmly, our duty is to explain the conditions as we see them, yours to decide how far you will go in order to secure conditions which you maintained were desired when this federation was formed, and to that end the grand lodge officers have submitted to you for your final action the history of the proceedings up to the present time.

Whatever decision you may arrive at is expected to be in the hands of your district chairman or secretary-treasurer, W. E. Bowen, before August 25.

Forward all votes to W. E. Bowen, general delivery, Paducah, Ky.

Fraternally, yours,

J. F. McCREERY,
Chairman.

"To the officers and members of the Federation of Railway Employees.

"DEAR SIR: The executive board of the federation, after having exhausted all honorable means in their power to secure a conference with the proper officials of the Illinois Central Railway system, and being unsuccessful in their efforts, they referred the entire matter to the grand lodge officers representing the organization affiliated with the federation.

"The undersigned grand lodge officers met at the Southern Hotel August 9, and after considerable discussion the matter was thoroughly gone into. A letter was drafted and sent to Assistant General Manager Mr. J. T. Foley, a copy of which is attached hereto:

"CHICAGO, ILL., August 9, 1911.

"MR. J. T. FOLEY,

"Assistant General Manager Illinois Central Allied Lines, City.

"DEAR SIR: The undersigned grand lodge officers, representing the various organizations in the Federation of Railway Employees Illinois Central System, Allied Lines, respectfully request that you grant us an audience for the purpose of talking over the matter of granting a conference to the committee representing the various organizations in the federation.

"We would like to be granted this conference not later than 4 p. m. to-day.

"Hoping you will give this your immediate attention and oblige,

"International Vice President Machinists,

"Room 506 New Southern Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

"DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of this date, the attached circular letter, sent out to the employees, clearly states our position. A conference could only result in our reiterating the statements contained therein.

"J. T. FOLEY,
"Assistant General Manager."

"We regarded this reply an evasive one, and deemed it advisable to again write him defining our attitude in the matter which we did and drafted the following letter:

"CHICAGO, ILL., August 9, 1911.

"Mr. T. J. FOLEY,

"Assistant General Manager Illinois Central Railway, Chicago, Ill.

"DEAR SIR: The grand lodge officers, representing the machinists, boiler makers and helpers, blacksmiths and helpers, carmen, painters, steam fitters, sheet-metal workers, railway clerks, and Federal labor union, who are employed on the Illinois Central Railway, which road you are in charge of as assistant general manager, asked for a conference for the purpose of arranging a meeting for the men we represent, who are employed on the said Illinois Central Railroad, of which road you are the legal representative. Having refused said grand lodge officers a conference by referring us to a circular letter, that you had gotten out and forwarded to all of your employees, that are a part of the present controversy. The circular letter attached to your letter of even date in no way answers our letter.

"We beg to advise that after giving this matter due consideration we have decided that inasmuch as this is a matter in which all are equally interested, we must insist that you meet the international officers in a body to discuss the matter of a meeting for the representatives of the Federation of the Railway Employees, with the proper officials of the Illinois Central Railroad Co.

"A refusal on your part to meet this committee as a whole will be considered sufficient cause for the international officers to take such action as we deem advisable.

"Any reply you may desire to make to this will reach us at the New Southern Hotel until 2 o'clock p. m., Thursday, August 10.

"Respectfully submitted.

"In reply to the above communication we received the following reply from Mr. Foley, as follows:

"CHICAGO, ILL., August 10, 1911.

"Mr. J. D. BUCKALEW,

"Room 506, New Southern Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

"DEAR SIR: Replying to your communication of August 9, the circular letter, issued August 4, 1911, by this company, addressed to its employees in the mechanical department, clearly defines our position and fully answers your communication of August 9, 1911.

"Yours, truly,

"T. J. FOLEY,

"Assistant General Manager."

"You will note from the above reply that Mr. Foley again reiterated his previous attitude in the matter, again calling our attention to the circular issued by the company on August 4, the meaning of which as we interpret it—the company will meet the individual organizations, but will not meet the federation—therefore we are submitting this to you for your consideration, and request that each and every member affiliated with this federation indicate by his vote whether he will cease work until such time as the Illinois Central Railway Co. shall agree to meet the committee of the federated railway employees.

"There are 11 railroads which have met the Federation of Railway Employees, have signed contracts, granted increases in salary of not less than 2 cents an hour to all employees represented by the federation within the past 10 months.

"In addition to this, the Missouri Pacific strike was settled by the federation, and at the present time there is not a single strike breaker on the system. The Rock Island, one of the largest roads running out of Chicago, will go into conference with the Rock Island System Federation on August 15.

"This conference was secured after several months negotiations with the management of that system, and after a strike vote had been taken which was practically unanimous in sustaining the committee.

"In addition to the above, there are nine other railroads which contemplate conferences with system federations in the near future.

"Therefore, we are of the opinion that the general manager of the different Harriman lines have decided to fight the system federation, and refuse to meet more than one trade at a time.

"We know from experience that if we submit to this we can not hope to secure increases in wages and better working conditions; therefore we are placing the matter in your hands in order that each individual can voice his sentiment, after which time we propose to carry out the wishes of the men we represent.

"We would suggest that where it is possible to do so, you hold mass meetings, secure the services of some good speakers for the purpose of explaining to the membership the benefits of system federation, and the imperative necessity of cooperation at this time.

"The grand lodge officers hereby request all the lodges of the respective organizations to hold special meetings immediately and take a strike vote according to your respective constitutions, sending result of your vote to your international or national officers and the secretary of the system federation.

"All votes must be in the hands of the secretary of the system federation not later than August 25, 1911.

"If you are not willing to strike and want to meet the company as a separate trade, vote No.

"If you are willing to strike and force the management to meet the federation, vote Yes.

That communication was sent with the strike vote when we submitted the question to the men for a vote, and the return from that vote we received, the result of which is 96½ per cent of the men on the system. I have the exact vote here that I would like to submit to the commission. I do not find it at the moment, and will submit that later to be necessary.

That concludes our effort up to the time the matter was turned over to the general officers. I am not exactly in a position to give you the results of the general officers' efforts to secure an audience after the strike vote was taken. That will be covered by some of the international officers.

Chairman WALSH. What had been your experience with strikes on the Illinois Central prior to the strike of 1911? I think there had been one at Paducah in 1910?

Mr. McCREERY. At Paducah in 1910. We had formed a local federation there of the different crafts and had been dealing with the local management for some time on conditions around the shops there, and grievances, and the men in the car department had several grievances that they were denied any redress from by the officers. We had been trying to get a meeting with the master mechanic. He kept putting us off on the question. So we asked that he meet the federation committee. He refused to do so, stating that he had orders from the general office not to meet the men as a federated committee.

The men were pretty well worked up over not being able to get their conditions adjusted, and the result was that they walked out. They were out three or four days, when the officers came down, and they asked the men to meet them, separate committees at a time. They would call on the machinists, the carmen, the sheet-metal workers, the boiler makers, the blacksmiths, and one and another. But they all refused to meet the officers unless they would meet the committee as a whole.

Eventually they met the committee as a whole, and we adjusted our differences by agreeing to take up the matters of these grievances with those officials later on.

Chairman WALSH. That was at Paducah?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did you have a strike at other points on the line?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And if so, give, as concisely as you can, what led up to the strike at Clinton, the strike at Memphis, the strike at New Orleans.

Mr. McCREERY. I am not in a position to give you the details of that.

Chairman WALSH. All right. Did you ever have any trouble prior to this time as a committeeman from your own craft organization in meeting with the officials and taking up the differences you had?

Mr. McCREERY. We had a good deal of trouble by delays being caused on account of the officials putting us off, causing us to spend a good deal of money in going from one place to another.

Chairman WALSH. What do you have in mind that you can give us information on regarding the importation of the workmen to take the places of strikers?

Mr. McCREERY. The importation of what?

Chairman WALSH. The importation of workmen to take the places of the strikers—strikebreakers?

Mr. McCREERY. What methods did they use to get these men?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; what information they used; what methods they used; the character of the men, and everything of that sort.

Mr. McCREERY. Well, I was in Chicago during the conference just previous to the strike. I was told that they were recruiting men over on Wabash Avenue, and I went over there and walked into the building where they were hiring men. They said they were hiring men for duty on southern and western roads, and I stood there and seen them hire several men, or, that is, take their names down and tell them to report the next morning. That is as far as I know about their hiring men. I have talked with men that came down over the road to work for the company, that after they landed on the job they refused to go to work, after finding out there was a strike on. I have had men tell me they knew nothing about the strike being on.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know what the conditions were after the strike started inside of the stockade—how they were managed, and whether liquor was allowed to come in?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes; it was general knowledge in my home town of Paducah, Ky., that liquor was furnished to the men in the stockades. Furthermore, I have general rumor all over in that city at that time that a good deal of trouble in the shops of men fighting among themselves. There were police calls where the police had to go out. I know several instances where the police came in contact with these fellows and had a good deal of trouble, and had to slug some of them.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would state, if you know, your observation concerning injunctions, and state just as briefly as you can the effect these injunctions had on the men and the attitude of the men toward the injunctive processes and the men that issued them.

Mr. McCREERY. Yes; the strikers—I myself—was served with about four or five injunctions. In fact, every injunction served in the different States, a copy was served on me as president of the federation. And I will state that it had a very demoralizing effect on the men. It enjoined them from doing almost anything except breathing. They could not even speak to a man that was working for the Illinois Central Railroad, according to the terms of the injunction; they were very effective upon the men.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, in regard to the substance of it, did it cause the men in large numbers to have disrespect for the courts that issued them, and was that disrespect voiced?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes; I have heard the courts condemned repeatedly on that.

Chairman WALSH. What effect did the arrest of these men for violation of injunctive processes have upon them in the community? Did it give them the reputation such as an ordinary arrest would do, or how was it?

Mr. McCREERY. Why, there was a good deal of publicity given the men arrested for certain crimes, but not as much publicity given to the fact that they were not convicted. I have some letters here from the city attorney at Paducah, Ky., as well as from several other attorneys there, as to the court records of that city during the strike, which speak for themselves; and I would like to read one if you will allow me.

Chairman WALSH. Read one and submit the others into the record, if you please, Mr. McCreery.

Mr. McCREERY (reading):

"F. E. GRAVES, ATTORNEY AT LAW.

"PADUCAH, KY., July 17, 1911.

"Mr. J. F. McCREERY, Paducah, Ky.

"DEAR SIR: Having been requested by you to make a statement in regard to the effects of the "shopmen strike" on the Illinois Central Railroad here in Paducah on and since September 30, 1911, I beg to state to you the full effects, as far as I can, in so far as they have affected local conditions.

"There was, immediately afterwards, and since said time a general depression in business, locally, and as the direct result of the strike I have known of several business men forced to the wall and some of whom were forced into bankruptcy. This city has never fully recovered, and probably never will, from the effects of the strike from a financial and also social standpoint, as the men formerly employed by the company before the strike were, as a rule, lifelong citizens of this community, interested in the progress and development of the city and adjoining territory, and owners of their own homes and made good and respectable citizens. Since the strike a great many of them, in fact a majority of them, have left Paducah, broke up their homes, and sought employment elsewhere. Their places were filled at the time by some of the most desperate characters this country produces."

Chairman WALSH. Excuse me. What are you reading now?

Mr. McCREERY. Now, I am getting down to the point, as to the court records.

Chairman WALSH. Well, is that letter from the city attorney, that you spoke of?

Mr. McCREERY. This is a letter from an attorney, Mr. Graves. I can give you the city attorney's letter, if you want it.

Chairman WALSH. Who is Mr. Graves?

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. Graves is an attorney there.

Chairman WALSH. Did he represent any interests involved in the controversy?

Mr. McCREERY. Well, he in a good many instances served the strikers gratis for the work performed for them, he says here in his letter.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead.

Mr. McCREERY (reading): "Their places were filled at the time by some of the most desperate characters this country produces. In fact, two of the strike breakers murdered in cold blood one of the saloon keepers of the town in an attempt to rob him in the presence of several persons that were in the saloon at the time and made good their escape and have never been captured. This was on pay day night and this saloon keeper had been in the habit of cashing the checks of the Illinois Central employees and generally kept several hundred dollars on hand on such occasions for that purpose. In addition to that, immediately following the advent of the strike breakers into Paducah, we 'enjoyed' the greatest carnival of crime this city ever experienced. All sorts of crime immediately made its appearance in Paducah, and the emissaries of the railroad began an undercurrent of suspicion that the strikers were responsible for it.

"However, soon after the police and detectives of the city ran down some of the crimes and criminals, and in every instance the strike breakers were the ones responsible, and not the strikers. Several of them were convicted and sent to the penitentiary and one or two 'jumped' their bonds and left their bondsmen for the bag to hold.

"Immediately after the strike begun several of the strikers were arrested by complaint made by the I. C.'s private detectives, charged with various crimes of violence, and I had the pleasure of defending them, some for hire and some gratis, unable to pay, and not an instance was any one of them found guilty by the courts. In fact, some of the charges were so flimsy and chimerical that the courts gave an instruction to find for the defendant upon the evidence of the prosecution alone—not requiring the defense to introduce any evidence at all.

"I hope this statement will be of some service to you and to your friends and cause, and in the future if I can be of further service to you kindly let me know.

"Yours, very truly,

"F. E. GRAVES."

I have also a statement of a similar character from the prosecuting attorney. I will submit one more letter that I would like to read to the commission, and then submit the whole bunch for the record.

Chairman WALSH. All right. Very good.

Mr. McCREERY. One letter I have here from a real estate man.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Mr. McCREERY (reading):

WHITTEMORE REAL ESTATE AGENCY,

Paducah, Ky., July 18, 1914.

FRANK COMERFORD, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: In reference to the effect of the strike of the nearly 1,000 I. C. R. R. shopmen in Paducah in 1911 on the general business conditions in Paducah, I will state that it was wholly demoralizing in every way, and its bad effects are here to-day.

It was demoralizing financially because it brought about strained credits, not only on account of the men, but on account of the merchants and banks that were doing business with them. It brought about loss of property to the men, both on personal property partly paid for and on homes on which they had made payments.

It brought about strained conditions in neighborhoods, churches, and lodges. Out of it came no good to anyone.

It was a fitting example to call attention to the need of a court of arbitration, where the interests of both labor and capital would be given honest consideration, and all differences speedily adjusted, and for the best interests of all concerned. I remain,

Respectfully, yours,

EDEAN W. WHITTEMORE.

I have here a good many letters of similar character, and also a statement here—an affidavit from the city solicitor of Paducah, Ky., as to the amount of bankruptcies since the Illinois Central strike. I will state that of my own knowledge previous to the strike that a man taking the bankruptcy law was discharged, unless we got things straightened up pretty quick. If a man was garnisheed three times the third time he lost his job. Whenever he was garnisheed he had to lay off from work until it was adjusted. If he was garnisheed three times he lost his job. Since the strike of 1911, up until this time—this was gotten out in 1914, May 20—and it is a short one and I would like to read it [reading]:

STATE OF KENTUCKY,

County of McCracken, ss.

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned notary public, A. Y. Martin, who, being duly sworn, upon his oath states that he has made a careful examination of the docket in bankruptcy of the United States District Court for the Western District of Kentucky, from September 1, 1911, to May 20, 1914, and examined each case for the purpose of ascertaining how many Illinois Central Railroad employees at Paducah, Ky., have availed themselves of the

9832 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

United States congressional act, 1898, relative to bankruptcy, and finds that during such period of time there have been eighty-seven (87) cases in bankruptcy in said court, filed by persons at the time in the employ of said Illinois Central Railroad Co.

A. Y. MARTIN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this the 27th day of May, 1914.
My commission as notary public expires on the 22d day of January, 1918.

KATE NUNEMACHER,
Notary Public, McCracken Co., Ky.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would give us, as briefly as you can, your knowledge of any violence that was committed during the strike.

Mr. McCREERY. Well, I do know that—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I would like you to preface that, if you will, please, with instructions, if any—first, with the extent of picketing down there and the instructions, if any, given to the pickets.

Mr. McCREERY. I am glad you asked that question, because immediately after the strike I sent out letters over the system to the different local secretaries of the local federation warning them against violating the injunctions; that they might be thrown into jail, and, moreover, warning them to tell their pickets to peaceably picket the lines by gathering information as to what was going on and report, so we would be able to get out a bulletin and see the men that came in to work and tell them the conditions and try to persuade them from going into the shops. And I know in a good many cases that our men were pulled up and arrested for violating the law, by supposedly beating up some of the strike breakers, but we have no record of any convictions of my own knowledge, and I do know that some of our pickets were beaten up by so-called strike breakers and gunmen.

Chairman WALSH. What was the membership of the federation at the beginning of the strike?

Mr. McCREERY. The membership was something along about between—well, 7,000 men, to the best of my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. How was the federation financed during the strike?

Mr. McCREERY. How was that?

Chairman WALSH. How was the federation financed? Where did you get your money from?

Mr. McCREERY. Well, when we found ourselves on strike we found that we had no money. We immediately began to raise money in every way possible; by donation, solicitations, and one thing and another.

Chairman WALSH. Did you pay strike benefits to those out of work?

Mr. McCREERY. The different international organizations paid strike benefits to their members.

Chairman WALSH. I interrupted you. What were you going to say?

Mr. McCREERY. I started to say that at each local point the men used different methods to raise money. We established commissaries and when the men became in desperate straits, needed assistance such as coal, wood, or clothing, groceries, such as that, we would take donations from merchants or farmers or anybody else, and we would distribute this among our most needy people. We would solicit money by raffles, balls, and any kind of entertainment to raise money.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate the actual expense of the strike to the federation and to the different crafts that you say paid strike benefits?

Mr. McCREERY. Well, I could not, only in just a general way. I might say it would not be surprising but what it was over two or three million dollars.

Chairman WALSH. How many injunctions do you say were served upon you?

Mr. McCREERY. Well, I do not know. I do not exactly remember. I think some four or five.

Chairman WALSH. Were you made a defendant in any of the cases in which injunctions were issued?

Mr. McCREERY. No.

Chairman WALSH. For alleged violations.

Mr. McCREERY. No. I had a notice to appear before a court, but on advice of my attorney, he said it was not necessary.

Chairman WALSH. If you care to answer—were you ever arrested for any violation of law?

Mr. McCREERY. No; I never was.

Chairman WALSH. How many men after the strike began left the union and went back to work?

Mr. McCREERY. I have no record. Up until January of 1914—up until that time something less than 10 per cent.

Chairman WALSH. That is January, 1914?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. There has been no record kept since?

Mr. McCREERY. Well, I am not in possession of it.

Chairman WALSH. Could information be given to the Commission by some other individual?

Mr. McCREERY. Well, I would not say for sure, but I believe it could.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would describe briefly the status of the situation at the present time. Is it claimed that the strike is still on? Are there any benefits being paid? I would like you to describe the status of the matter to-day.

Mr. McCREERY. Well, there are benefits being paid. The international organizations have about gone their limit and unable to pay any further benefits. But benefits are being raised in different ways in different States, different names throughout the country, different men volunteer donations, and we are keeping men on the job.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any statement you would care to submit covering any subject about which I have not interrogated you?

Mr. McCREERY. How is that?

Chairman WALSH. Is there any statement you would care to submit upon any subject about which I have not interrogated you?

Mr. McCREERY. No; not that I know of.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ashton wishes to ask you a question or two.

Commissioner ASHTON. I just want to ask a question about that schedule, Mr. McCreery, that you submitted yesterday, with rates.

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Commissioner ASHTON. That covered the carmen's craft alone, did it not?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Commissioner ASHTON. That was negotiated originally between some of the officers of the company and representatives of the carmen?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Commissioner ASHTON. Were you a party to those negotiations?

Mr. McCREERY. No, sir. I will explain my absence off of that committee.

Commissioner ASHTON. It does not make any particular difference; what I was trying to get at is whether it was negotiated by a committee.

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Commissioner ASHTON. A committee elected by the carmen to represent them?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Commissioner ASHTON. And it was agreed to on their behalf?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Commissioner ASHTON. And that schedule you had was the last one that was negotiated with the Illinois Central Railroad?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Commissioner ASHTON. Who generally, on behalf of the company, negotiated or signed those schedules?

Mr. McCREERY. The superintendent of the car department, and the superintendent of motive power.

Commissioner ASHTON. Under that schedule, the principal difficulty you had was in delay, was it, in reaching those officers to negotiate new schedules or to reach an adjustment under the old ones?

Mr. McCREERY. How is that?

Commissioner ASHTON. Under that schedule—you said there were objections to the schedule and the method of negotiation, because of delay, that there was a good deal of delay in reaching the officers of the company in cases of grievance or of disputes about rates, or anything of that kind?

Mr. McCREERY. No; I could not say that in regard to the negotiation of agreements but as to the adjustment of grievances.

Commissioner ASHTON. But, ordinarily, the grievances were adjusted with more or less satisfaction, with more or less satisfaction on either side after a lapse of time?

9834 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. McCREERY. Not so much of late, but previous to the strike, we had a lot of difficulty, and we were unable to adjust our grievances; we were able to adjust some of them.

Commissioner AISHTON. But could not reach a conclusion as to others?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. That schedule you read there was in effect up until the time of the strike?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. I think that is all; thank you.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. You will be excused permanently, Mr. McCreery.

Mr. McCREERY. I wish to state one thing, that my organization notified the management and gave them the 30 days' notice. It was stated we had not.

Commissioner AISHTON. Have you a copy of that notice?

Mr. McCREERY. No, sir; it was personal; the notice was personal, and has been for years. Our chairman would simply notify the management that we wanted a meeting on a certain date.

Commissioner AISHTON. Who was the chairman?

Mr. McCREERY. O. L. Sanborn.

Commissioner AISHTON. And he can furnish such evidence as may be necessary to show that?

Mr. McCREERY. Yes; I will give it to you.

(Under date of April 22, 1915, Mr. McCreery wrote the commission as follows:

"In regard to the 30 days' notice I stated in answer to Commissioner Aishton's question on that matter that my organization had given the 30-day notice through the system chairman, Mr. O. L. Sanborn, and that it was given verbally and not in writing; therefore am not able to furnish a copy. I have endeavored to get in touch with Mr. Sanborn in order to get a statement from him in regard to the matter, but have been unable to locate him.")

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you, Mr. McCreery. You will be permanently excused.

Mr. R. W. Bell.

TESTIMONY OF MR. R. W. BELL.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your name?

Mr. BELL. R. W. Bell.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. BELL. General superintendent of motive power of the Illinois Central Railroad Co.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you occupied that position?

Mr. BELL. Since June 1, 1913.

Chairman WALSH. Since June 1, 1913?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What was your position at the time the strike began, in 1911?

Mr. BELL. Superintendent of machinery.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would please give your connection with the Illinois Central Railroad Co., and with railroads generally, your general railroad experience, and the positions you have held.

Mr. BELL. Well, I have been connected with the Illinois Central in the capacity of locomotive engineer, traveling engineer, roundhouse foreman, general foreman, master mechanic, assistant superintendent of machinery, superintendent of machinery, and general superintendent of motive power.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have personal charge of the negotiations with craft unions representing shop employees prior to the strike?

Mr. BELL. Well, some of them, I did; with the metal trades.

Chairman WALSH. That would include what?

Mr. BELL. Machinists, boiler makers, blacksmiths, pipe fitters, tanners, and coppersmiths.

Chairman WALSH. Any others?

Mr. BELL. The common labor in the locomotive department.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any organization among the common laborers?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What was that called?

Mr. BELL. Well, it was simply called—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Called the Federal Union?

Mr. BELL. Yes; the Federal Union.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please give us, as briefly as you can, the modus operandi of making the annual contracts with those organizations?

Mr. BELL. The representatives of each craft would require a meeting, and on the first convenient date we would arrange for a meeting, and there and then make a contract covering the working conditions and rates of pay.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe how these committees were organized by the men.

Mr. BELL. I presume they were elected or appointed by the men.

Chairman WALSH. How many of them were there on the committee?

Mr. BELL. Well, there was usually one man from each division point.

Chairman WALSH. How much of your time was spent in negotiations with shop committees?

Mr. BELL. Oh, possibly six weeks of each year.

Chairman WALSH. Six weeks of each year?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any complaint of any sort from the committees that they were not given sufficient time or that the time was not so ordered as to be convenient and effective for them?

Mr. BELL. Yes; there was. We generally tried to make the time as convenient for them as possible. At all times we were not able to meet them just when they wanted to be met, but we arranged it as soon as we could.

Chairman WALSH. What form did the complaint take? Was it a serious complaint, or just a sort of objection?

Mr. BELL. Oh, a sort of objection; I never heard of any serious complaint.

Chairman WALSH. You were present yesterday, Mr. Bell, and heard the discussion of the objection that the men had to the piecework, the bonus system, and time studies used in the company's shops?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Please give us your comment upon that without specific questions; what the effort of the company was in that direction, the purpose of it, and the attitude of the men toward it.

Mr. BELL. I was not in charge of the car department at that time. I was merely in charge of the locomotive department.

Chairman WALSH. What did you have to do with the bonus system or time studies, or anything of that sort?

Mr. BELL. Nothing; we had no piecework system in the locomotive department.

Chairman WALSH. Were the seniority clauses in the contracts with the craft unions always complied with in reducing forces?

Mr. BELL. Generally it was.

Chairman WALSH. Was there complaint in regard to that from the men? That is, to violation of the clause? And in the instances in which it was not strictly adhered to, what was the reason therefor?

Mr. BELL. I believe, so far as the locomotive side was concerned, it was adhere to.

Chairman WALSH. Would that include all of the departments of which you had knowledge?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I am going to go through the list, and anything you are familiar with please tell about it. What were the wages paid to carmen?

Mr. BELL. Well, they varied in different localities. We generally paid the going rate of wage in that locality.

Chairman WALSH. Please give the rate.

Mr. BELL. I could not, offhand.

Chairman WALSH. Could you, offhand, give the rate of the blacksmiths?

Mr. BELL. No; I could not; I would have to refer to the list of the rates.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would give us those that you can recall now, in any particular locality; that is, the wages paid to blacksmiths.

Mr. BELL. Well, in Burnside, that is our Chicago shop, we paid the going rate of wages to blacksmiths, to machinists, boiler makers, blacksmith helpers, pipe fitters, and tinners.

Chairman WALSH. What were the wages paid?

Mr. BELL. Machinists, 39 cents an hour; boiler makers, 40 cents.

Chairman WALSH. What were the wages paid to blacksmiths?

Mr. BELL. They ran from 36 to 42 cents an hour, according to the importance of the work. The pipefitters, I do not remember just exactly what we paid them, or the tinners, or coppersmiths.

Chairman WALSH. What were the wages paid to the painters?

Mr. BELL. Or as to the painters.

Chairman WALSH. What were the wages paid to decorators?

Mr. BELL. We had no decorators in the locomotive department.

Chairman WALSH. What wages were paid to the shop clerks?

Mr. BELL. We paid the going rate of wage.

Chairman WALSH. What do you mean by "going rate of wage"?

Mr. BELL. The rate paid by other railroads in the same locality.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a variation in the duties of shop clerks?

Mr. BELL. Oh, yes; there is. There are some that their duties are very important, and there are others that their duties are of minor importance.

Chairman WALSH. How did the wages range, of the shop clerks?

Mr. BELL. Possibly from $55 to $105.

Chairman WALSH. Unless it has been called for from some other witness, will you please furnish us with the wages paid—I will put it in the record so it will be given to you, at the different points on your system—that were paid at the time of this strike, and at the present time to carmen, blacksmiths, boiler makers, machinists, sheet-metal workers, steam fitters, painters, decorators, paper hangers, helpers, and shop clerks.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

(The matter above referred to will be found printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as Bell Exhibit.)

Chairman WALSH. Were the helpers and shop clerks organized in the unions?

Mr. BELL. In some localities; at Centralia, Paducah, Waterloo, Burnside, and Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. In what unions were they organized?

Mr. BELL. I believe they were affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

Chairman WALSH. Were the shop clerks also?

Mr. BELL. No; there was no organization of the shop clerks.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have contracts with the Helpers' Union?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have a conference at times with the Federal Labor Union as a labor union?

Mr. BELL. Yes; we had from the different localities.

Chairman WALSH. Were you ever asked to have conferences with the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks?

Mr. BELL. No; I never was.

Chairman WALSH. You are not aware of the fact, if it be a fact, that that request—that they requested a conference and it was denied?

(No answer.)

Chairman WALSH. I say, are you aware of that fact, if it be a fact?

Mr. BELL. No; I am not aware of that fact.

Chairman WALSH. What part did you take in obtaining men to take the places of strikers?

Mr. BELL. Our strike breakers for the first year, we obtained generally through employment agencies, but there were a great many men who applied individually, and as they applied individually, we passed upon them and put them at work.

Chairman WALSH. What class of men were obtained from the Pinkerton Agency and the Hannon and the other agencies as to personally character and habits? Were they furnished good men, as good men as were ordinarily employed by you?

Mr. BELL. Oh, they furnished good, bad, and indifferent.

Chairman WALSH. About how did those range?

Mr. BELL. Well, some of them were satisfactory and some of them were not satisfactory.

Chairman WALSH. How did their efficiency generally compare with that of the men who had gone on the strike?

Mr. BELL. Well, it was not as good.

Chairman WALSH. How does the efficiency of your present force compare with that of the force prior to the strike?

Mr. BELL. Very favorably.

Chairman WALSH. How many men have you hired since the strike began?

Mr. BELL. Oh, I couldn't answer that off-hand. We hired, the first year, several thousand.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it a little closer than that, how many thousand?

Mr. BELL. Well, we had 8,500 men go out on strike, and we possibly hired 15,000.

Chairman WALSH. Could you give us an estimate as to how long and for what length of time these men remained in the service during the first year?

Mr. BELL. No; I could not give you that information.

Chairman WALSH. Sir?

Mr. BELL. I could not give you that information.

Chairman WALSH. Do your master mechanics and other subordinate officers report—what kind of a report do you get from your master mechanics and other subordinate officers as to the class of men that were furnished by the employment agencies?

Mr. BELL. We get no reports from the master mechanics.

Chairman WALSH. When did you cease to get men through these employment agencies?

Mr. BELL. I believe that we stopped employing men through the agencies about February, 1912.

Chairman WALSH. How many men do you think were employed that way altogether?

Mr. BELL. Oh, I have no idea.

Chairman WALSH. Could you tell what proportion of them remained with the company?

Mr. BELL. We have to-day about 2,500 men with the company who came to us between September 30, 1911, and September 30, 1912.

Chairman WALSH. And September 30, 1912?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. But you quit employing them through these detective agencies at what time?

Mr. BELL. About February, 1912.

Chairman WALSH. And do you know how many of those men that came to you through that means are still with the company?

Mr. BELL. No; I do not. That would have to be checked up from the records.

Chairman WALSH. How many strikers have you had returned to work?

Mr. BELL. I think about 2,000 men.

Chairman WALSH. Have wages been increased or reduced since 1911?

Mr. BELL. Wages are practically the same as they were September 30, 1911, with few exceptions where they have been increased.

Chairman WALSH. And in what departments have they been increased and what was the extent of the increase?

Mr. BELL. Well, that would refer to the common labor. We have in some cases increased the wages of the common laborer.

Chairman WALSH. From what point to what point, what sum?

Mr. BELL. Possibly we would increase 2 cents an hour.

Chairman WALSH. What were they getting before the increase?

Mr. BELL. Well, they were getting all the way from 18 to 22 cents an hour.

Chairman WALSH. Has the piece system been extended since the strike?

Mr. BELL. We have no piecework system in the locomotive department.

Chairman WALSH. What is your knowledge as to the piece system in any other department of your company?

Mr. BELL. We have piecework system in the car department at 10 shops.

Chairman WALSH. Where?

Mr. BELL. At 10 of our shops.

Chairman WALSH. What shops are they? [Witness examines book.] I will let you furnish it. We must hurry along.

Mr. BELL. Just a moment. I have it here.

Chairman WALSH. Have you?

Mr. BELL. Yes. We have Burnside, Clinton, Mattoon, Centralia, Mounds, Paducah, Birmingham, Harahan, East St. Louis, and McComb.

Chairman WALSH. Has the piecework system been extended to your knowledge since the strike?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I believe we have put the piecework system in a few of the points since the strike.

Chairman WALSH. Has it been made compulsory in any instance where it was not compulsory prior to the strike?

Mr. BELL. No. It was put in at the request of the men at the points that it was instituted.

Chairman WALSH. In what way was the request communicated to the company?

Mr. BELL. Verbally, a verbal request by the men on the division officers.

Chairman WALSH. That is, did the men come in conference, send a representative to the division officers?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any record made of that?

Mr. BELL. No.

Chairman WALSH. What official had charge of the special officers and guards in the shops during the strike?

Mr. BELL. Mr. Kelliher, who was our chief special agent.

Chairman WALSH. Describe in what manner you cooperated with Mr. Kelliher in assigning these guards.

Mr. BELL. I had nothing to do with the assignment of guards whatever.

Chairman WALSH. And what official cooperated? Who did?

Mr. BELL. Mr. Kelliher assigned all the guards.

Chairman WALSH. Did he have any cooperation with any official of the company whatsoever?

Mr. BELL. No, sir. He put the guards in, I believe, on his own judgment at different points.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know what instructions were given to the guards with reference to picketing by strikers?

Mr. BELL. No; I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Was there no person connected with the company that took up the questions of policy as to the conduct of these guards with Mr. Kelliher?

Mr. BELL. Well, it was generally understood that the guards were there to protect our property.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any instances where members of the shop crafts were asked to send their representatives in the form of a federated committee to the legislature or the governor or the Chicago Civic Council in the interests of legislation desired or opposed by the company?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I believe there was a request made when the freight rates were being requested. I believe they requested some of the representatives of labor to go to Springfield; that is, I heard that. I have no personal knowledge of it.

Chairman WALSH. And you had no personal contact with that?

Mr. BELL. No.

Chairman WALSH. What is your opinion from your experience as a railroad man with reference to the practicability and desirability or not of dealing with your shop employees as a federation? I wish you would give your comment upon it.

Mr. BELL. Well, I believe—I am not in favor of it.

Chairman WALSH. Please give your reasons.

Mr. BELL. Because I believe that they are too hard to handle in case of the federation. I believe it is more satisfactory to handle the men individually; that is, by crafts.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would be a little more definite, if you will, please, Mr. Bell, as to what you mean by, "too hard to handle." Do you mean too hard to deal with, to establish contractual relations with?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Too powerful and too insistent upon demands?

Mr. BELL. No; not too powerful, but too insistent and unreasonable.

Chairman WALSH. Any other reason that you have in mind for being opposed to it?

Mr. BELL. No. Those are about the reasons I have.

Chairman WALSH. Upon what do you base that statement, please, Mr. Bell, as to their being unreasonable? Is it on account of their potential strength by being added together, or is it from some experience that you have had where there has been a federation?

Mr. BELL. The employees of the mechanical department, who are all the skilled help, are in the minority; and my impression is that the unskilled help, being in the majority, would outvote the men who are in the minority.

Chairman WALSH. Is your opinion based upon any experience either that you have had or that you gathered from other railway officials with respect to this matter?

Mr. BELL. No; we had one experience with federated crafts at Paducah, Ky., in 1910. Our master mechanic was in the habit of receiving representatives from each of the crafts on shop matters. It occurred in the summer of 1910 that one of our subforemen in the car department laid off for a few days to go to a camp meeting.

Chairman WALSH. What?

Mr. BELL. To go to a camp meeting. And there was a man appointed to take his place temporarily who did not suit the men. The result was all of the employees at Paducah went out on strike. And they were out several days. I went to Paducah. While I did not have charge of the car department at that time, I was deputized to settle it. I went to Paducah and received representatives of the car department and representatives of other crafts; they were allowed to sit in and listen to the proceedings, and we came to an understanding, and the men went back to work.

Now, there was absolutely no reason for those men going out on strike about a trivial matter like that.

Their contract required that they should appeal to the higher officers before they would go out on a strike.

Chairman WALSH. Over what period of time did those negotiations extend; that is, the settlement of this strike?

Mr. BELL. About two or three days.

Chairman WALSH. About two or three days?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did all the men go back?

Mr. BELL. Yes; they all went back to work.

Chairman WALSH. What was the disposition of the matter? Did the foreman remain?

Mr. BELL. Yes; he remained; that is, the foreman who left to attend the camp meeting came back and went to work.

Chairman WALSH. It was only a temporary matter?

Mr. BELL. That is all. My impression from that occurrence was that the federation was not a very good thing.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any other experiences or any other facts?

Mr. BELL. No; I have had no other experience with federated trades.

Chairman WALSH. Since this strike came up, have you had any communications with any other companies, either that opposed this scheme of organization or upon whose systems it was in force?

Mr. BELL. No; I have not. I only hear in a general way. They are only rumors that they don't get along very well.

Chairman WALSH. You have no special instances you could give?

Mr. BELL. No.

Chairman WALSH. To what extent does the strike effect the efficiency of your shop?

Mr. BELL. Well, in the first year to considerable extent.

Chairman WALSH. What was its effect as to increasing the number of engine failures, accidents, wrecks on the road?

Mr. BELL. Well, the engine failures, of course, a little; but did not increase the wrecks.

Chairman WALSH. Were there any wrecks that could be directly attributable either to the conduct of the men that were in your employ or to the failure on account of either the character of the men or the number of them to keep up the equipment properly?

Mr. BELL. No more than ordinarily.

Chairman WALSH. Did you personally go over the system prior to the calling of the strike and call on the local committees of the craft unions, particularly the metal trades, to withdraw from the federation?

Mr. BELL. I never requested them to withdraw from the federation; but I advised them against joining the federation.

Chairman WALSH. That was how long prior to the strike?

Mr. BELL. That was possibly two months prior to the strike.

Chairman WALSH. Did you give them the reasons why you thought they should refrain from joining the organization?

Mr. BELL. Yes, I believe I told them that I thought it was to their interest to remain a metal-trades craft and not affiliate with the car department side of the mechanical department.

Chairman WALSH. Did you give them the same reasons that you have given here as your objection to federated organizations?

Mr. BELL. No; I just simply gave them the reasons I have explained.

Chairman WALSH. After the strike was called, did you have anything to do with the publicity and the creation of what you might say public sentiment upon the question?

Mr. BELL. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you arrange for meetings of business men or shippers, urging them to influence the men to go back to work?

Mr. BELL. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know anything about any such thing having been done?

Mr. BELL. No, sir; I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Did the clergy take the position in some instances—I notice a communication read from a bishop and some other suggestions of that kind in the statement made by Mr. Markham. Do you know anything about any person urging upon ministers to use their influence upon the men and ask them to return to work?

Mr. BELL. No; I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Who would know about that now? For instance, there was a communication read here from a bishop, in which he told the men that they ought to go back to work and desist from their efforts to organize in the way they were doing. Do you know how that came about? Was there any pressure brought to have that done?

Mr. BELL. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. To your knowledge?

Mr. BELL. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know by hearsay?

Mr. BELL. No; I just saw the statement at the time, but I know nothing further about it.

Chairman WALSH. Is your present attitude as it has been expressed here as in the past with reference to dealing with craft unions or federated unions?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You have not changed your position on that?

Mr. BELL. I have not changed my mind on it.

Chairman WALSH. You have not changed your position on it?

Mr. BELL. Nor my position.

Chairman WALSH. What experience did you have that you could enlighten us upon with reference to violence during the strike by either side?

Mr. BELL. Well, there were a great many fights. I paid no particular attention to the fighting that was going on.

Chairman WALSH. What actual experience did you have that you could give this commission with reference to the interference of the orderly conduct of the business in your shops during the strike?

Mr. BELL. Why, there was some interference. I do not know who did it. I could not say it was the strikers.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe what that was, this interference that interfered with the orderly conduct of the business of the company?

Mr. BELL. Well, an engine started away from Burnside and collided with a train on a crossing. Another engine was started away from Waterloo by some unknown person and collided with a train on the main line. Another engine was started away—

Chairman WALSH. That is Waterloo, Ill.?

Mr. BELL. Waterloo, Iowa. Another engine was started away at Paducah and collided with an engine in the yards.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a loss of life in either case?

Mr. BELL. No; I believe there was somebody injured.

Chairman WALSH. Was the property destroyed or the equipment broken up?

Mr. BELL. Yes; there was.

Chairman WALSH. Was there anything else of that sort?

Mr. BELL. Equipment was destroyed.

Chairman WALSH. Now, any other instances, other than those you have mentioned?

Mr. BELL. No; I can not recall any particular instances.

Chairman WALSH. Now, would that include—we would like to get from you, if you could, Mr. Bell, a concise but an exhaustive statement of just what occurred in the way of violence that interfered with the operation of your business?

Mr. BELL. We could compile a statement for you.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I would like if you could give it offhand.

Mr. BELL. Oh, I don't remember just offhand.

Chairman WALSH. Well, any that you do remember offhand.

Mr. BELL. Well, those three were about the cases.

(The information above referred to will be found printed among the exhibits at end of this subject as 'Bell exhibit.')

Chairman WALSH. Now, is there any other statement that you desire to make upon any subject that I have not interrogated you upon, Mr. Bell?

Mr. BELL. No.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell has some questions he would like to ask you, please.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understood you to say, Mr. Bell, that ordinarily it would require about five weeks to adjust the various contracts with the metal-trades organizations during the year?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If I recall, I think that in 1908 the question of the reduction of hours and of the increase of wages was under consideration. That required several months at that time to bring about an adjustment of these questions, with the machinists first. I think they met around, well, in the fall of the year, in September, and were in session several weeks with you, and then the hour-question was adjusted, and the wage-question went over and was not settled until several months later—the next spring?

Mr. BELL. Possibly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Must have gone along for several months?

Mr. BELL. Well, that may have been so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the other organizations in the meantime had received no adjustment of their affairs, and when the contract was finally made with the machinists as to hours, it had the effect of making the other organizations agree to the arrangement made with the machinists' organization? In other words, the dealing with one organization first practically set the rule for all others to comply with. They were simply called in and given those contracts?

Mr. BELL. No; not necessarily. We generally met the first organization that made the first request.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, at that time, in 1908, wasn't there a much greater period of time occupied in entering into an agreement?

Mr. BELL. Well, there may have been. I would have to refresh my memory on that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The committee met, I think, in 1908—one organization alone I speak of. In that case, weren't you in session with them several weeks, and were not adjournments taken, and finally an adjustment was reached in the latter part of that year, covering—in which the nine-hour day was agreed upon, and the wage question was put over, and conferences held innumerable times, and it was not finally adjusted until about May or June, 1910—1909. So that they were running conferences for practically six or seven months in that instance?

Mr. BELL. No; I don't believe that is so. I do not believe they were running—well, they may have been running conferences, but I believe the conferences were closed.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The question of wages not having been adjusted, as I recall it—having been somewhat interested in the matter at that time—the wage question was not adjusted until May or June of the following year?

Mr. BELL. 1909.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. 1910.

Mr. BELL. 1910—possibly that is so. We were adjusting wages all the time with different crafts.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, now, the manner of federation and the bringing about of an understanding whereby the federation—whereby all the organizations would be dealt with as a federation—the purpose being to avoid that delay of an adjustment of their annual contracts, would that not be preferable, to that these running—this expenditure of time and expense would be avoided? The men in the shops would know that there was a settlement; there would be a settling down of the men to the work; not a continuous arguing among the men and loss of time, as regarding the contracts.

Mr. BELL. No; I do not believe that we would settle with the men any quicker jointly than we would separately. The matter of the adjustment of wages and the adjustment of grievances is subject to considerable negotiation.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, if you brought in one organization and discussed the question of a reduction of hours—say the largest organization on the system, and you agreed upon a certain number of hours which would constitute a day's work, and that was signed up, now it is not possible, is it, that the other organizations when they came in would be given any different—any longer or shorter period?

Mr. BELL. If they requested it and it was thought feasible.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If the machinists had been given a nine-hour day, and the boiler makers and blacksmiths should come in and ask for an eight-hour day, they might be given an eight-hour day?

Mr. BELL. No. If they asked for a 10-hour day—which the boiler makers did in some instances.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Came in and asked for a longer day?

Mr. BELL. Came in and asked for a 10-hour day—or night.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Night?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What were they formerly working?

Mr. BELL. Nine hours.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you know whether you heard the contract read here the other day in which the men hired to take the place of the strikers agreed if they did not stay in the employ of the company for 30 days, but left of their own accord, they would not be entitled to any compensation—do you know whether that was carried out in any case?

Mr. BELL. No; I never saw any of those contracts, but I believe the men were paid for all the time they worked. I never knew of a case where a man was not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you know of any bonuses or special considerations being given to strike breakers when they were brought in at any time?

Mr. BELL. I do not believe any were ever given.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was piecework introduced at the car shops since the strike took place, except upon the request of the men?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Might that be considered a bonus of some kind for their having remained in the service of the company?

Mr. BELL. I don't think so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What extra compensation did these men make after piecework was introduced over that formerly received by them?

Mr. BELL. Well, they made all the way from $10 to $40 a month over and above their day rate. If they do not make it they are paid their day rate.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What was their day rate?

Mr. BELL. Well, it varied in different localities; for the men in the car department, possibly an average would be about 22 cents for car repairing—22 cents per hour—and 25 cents for a car carpenter.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was the production where they increased it greater than it had been in the other shops formerly? With reference to the output?

Mr. BELL. You mean after the piecework was introduced?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes.

Mr. BELL. Yes; it was.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. About what per cent?

Mr. BELL. Oh, possibly 10 or 15 per cent, and in some instances 20 per cent.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. On an increase of 15 or 20 per cent it would increase their wage rate $30 or $40 a month?

Mr. BELL. Well, from $10 to $40.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. From $10 to $40?

Mr. BELL. It ranged between those figures.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there any assurance to the men that that rate will continue indefinitely?

Mr. BELL. Is there any assurance to the men?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes.

Mr. BELL. We have established a piecework rate in the car department, and there is no reason why it should not continue indefinitely. It is fair and reasonable.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you the right to readjust it?

Mr. BELL. Yes; we have, with the consent of the men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. With the consent of the men?

Mr. BELL. Yes. We would not readjust the piecework schedule without the men were consulted; and the men are not compelled to work piecework if they do not want to.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, would a man in a plant where piecework was in operation, and there was this increase of apparent efficiency, is it likely that the company would retain men there that would not work piecework where others were working piecework, and adding increased efficiency to the plant?

Mr. BELL. Well, we have not had any of those cases in those localities where the men had declined to work piecework.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose there was to be an adjustment of piecework—that your company attempted to readjust, say, the price paid. I understand there is no organization among the men at this time, and no contract relations between the men and the company at this time?

Mr. BELL. Only a set of shop rules.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You promulgated the shop rules?

Mr. BELL. Yes; I was instrumental.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The men were not taken into conference, as formerly, in the matter of agreeing to the rules?

Mr. BELL. The rules practically covered the old organizations. There were no changes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just put into effect the rules that were the agreements with the older organizations?

Mr. BELL. General agreements.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, suppose the company were arbitrarily to change these rules, how would the men at the present time, not being organized, compete with the company, or even get consideration?

Mr. BELL. Well, I do not think it would be fair to change the rules without consulting the men. The men in our different shops have representation.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They would be called in en masse—the shopmen would all be called together and you would explain there was going to be a reduction in the price of piecework, or a change in the rules?

Mr. BELL. No; they would be called in according to trades.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. All the carmen, for instance, would be called in?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. En masse?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And would be dealt with individually?

Mr. BELL. Yes. They have committees. They are represented by committees. The carmen have committees, and so have all the trades. They are represented.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How do they select the committees if there is no organization among them?

Mr. BELL. They elect them themselves, I presume. Whenever they have any grievances they send in a man to the office, and they say this is our committeeman and we wish you would confer with him. We always do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose the committeeman enters into some arrangement with you and goes back and reports to these men, and then the men simply pay no attention to it. What method of enforcing the agreement made with these men would there be. Who is the responsible party? Who is the responsible party you call in to make these men do so and so?

Mr. BELL. Well, we have never had a case of that kind come up.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There would not be any organized influence or power behind any arrangement you make with these men?

Mr. BELL. Only the moral obligation of the men or of the man.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You say the efficiency of your shops now is up to the standard, as it was prior to the strike?

Mr. BELL. Quite satisfactory.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The same production at the Burnside shops, for instance, according to the number of employees—for the same number of employees as prior to the strike, the same number of locomotives are being overhauled?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. At any greater cost?

Mr. BELL. Not any greater.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the result is as efficient as it was before?

Mr. BELL. Just exactly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, are there any great number of men quitting and coming and going now?

Mr. BELL. No. For the past two years business has been very dull throughout the country and the men have stayed to work. There has been very little change among the men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If the strike were to be declared off on the Illinois Central road, officially, so that the men really had a right to return to work under the laws of their organization, if they wanted, would there be any great reemployment of these men—the old mechanics?

Mr. BELL. Well, yes; there would. We are always employing men, especially coming into the spring we employ more men than ordinarily. We open up the spring's work and endeavor to do as much as possible when we have good weather.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And they would not be held out because they are less efficient or because you have gathered a better class of mechanics than you formerly had before the strike?

Mr. BELL. We have not gathered a better class of mechanics.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You have not?

Mr. BELL. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I take it, then, if opportunity presented itself you would be glad to have these skilled men in your employment again.

Mr. BELL. Always have been glad to have them.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner LENNON. I would just like to ask you, did you start with the Illinois Central as a locomotive engineer, Mr. Bell?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner LENNON. Were you a member of the brotherhood?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. Are you still a member?

Mr. BELL. I am an honorary member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Ashton would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner ASHTON. Mr. Bell, this contract that was negotiated in 1908 that Commissioner O'Connell referred to, I understood the basis was changed from a 10-hour day to a 9-hour day at that conference. Is that right, Mr. Bell?

Mr. BELL. Well, possibly it was. As I told Mr. O'Connell, I would have to refresh my memory.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes; it was a nine-hour day.

Commissioner ASHTON. If that is the case, wasn't that rather extraordinary negotiation changing the basis of hours? Would not such a negotiation affect all the rules in the schedule—the overtime rules and the rule affecting the operation of shops—and would it not require more than the ordinary amount of consideration to reach an adjustment?

Mr. BELL. Yes, it did; it required a lot at that time, if I remember right; there were a lot of rules that had to be changed, and there were overtime concessions that had to be made, and we had to take into consideration all of these things.

Commissioner ASHTON. It was what you might call a revolutionary schedule, in that it changed all existing conditions?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner ASHTON. That is all I have to ask, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Garretson will ask you some questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Bell, is it not a fact that simply changing it as to the day would not change any other rule in the schedule?

Mr. BELL. Yes; it would change the rule.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In what way?

Mr. BELL. Time and a half would occur earlier.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It would occur earlier, but it would be paid on exactly the same basis after the close of the regular day, whether it was eight hours or twelve?

Mr. BELL. Just exactly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And there would be no change except the one rule, if that was all that was under consideration.

Mr. BELL. Well, there was a rule under consideration for Saturday afternoon.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Oh, well, if there were other rules—but I am speaking just of the change of the day. If that was the only thing under consideration it would not cause a change of any others?

Mr. BELL. At that time there was a good many rules that were under consideration.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, that changes the complexion of it. Following the commissioner's question, were you ever a committeeman for the B. of L. E.?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Isn't the principle involved in federation exactly one step forward from the principle involved in the organization?

Mr. BELL. Well, I presume it is.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And the real objection to the federation is the same old objection that you heard made when you were a committeeman of the B. of L. E., that the company didn't want to deal with the engineers collectively, because it would be hard to get—

Mr. BELL. (interrupting). No; it never came up when I was a committeeman for the B. of L. E.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It was ahead of your day?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Some of the other organizations met it later on?

Mr. BELL. I reckon they did.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Would you recognize it as a stock argument when you were committeeman?

Mr. BELL. No; I don't think that was ever brought out.

Commissioner GARRETSON. There are none of the old earmarks on it?

Mr. BELL. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You say you have not changed the rates of pay in any degree in these crafts since the strike?

Mr. BELL. Very little.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Or where they have changed they have changed for the better?

Mr. BELL. Well, there have been a great many of the men advanced in rates; that is, common labor.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have the conditions of their service changed?

Mr. BELL. No; the conditions are practically the same.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You speak of a code of shop rules you made. Those rules are posted on bulletin boards in your shops?

Mr. BELL. In every shop.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Will you file a copy of those with this commission?

Mr. BELL. Glad to.

Commissioner GARRETSON. For comparison with the old contract?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

(The rules above referred to by the witness were submitted in printed form.)

Commissioner GARRETSON. What day did the strike take place?

Mr. BELL. September 30, 1911.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Following that strike, in accepting applicants or men for the filling of these positions as furnished you by the various agencies, did you apply your physical examination to them?

Mr. BELL. I don't think we did.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Age limit?

Mr. BELL. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Reference?

Mr. BELL. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How long was that suspended?

Mr. BELL. Possibly for several months.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you know the date of its resumption, or has it been resumed?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It has been resumed now?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then those qualifications which you require of all applicants under ordinary conditions were all suspended as unnecessary in time of stress?

Mr. BELL. Yes; it was.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are they at any time really necessary, except for the purpose of weeding out undesirable men?

Mr. BELL. No; they are necessary to protect the service in a degree, and necessary to protect the other men.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But at a time like that neither service or the other men need protection?

Mr. BELL. No; those are war times.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The companies are all that need protection?

Commissioner AINSHTON. You were confronted with the condition of having to afford some transportation to the public?

Mr. BELL. We are faced with the condition, sir, of having to operate our railroad and run our trains.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has there any other statement been made than that whenever threatened with trouble with the employees at any time? Don't the moral obligations of the company get very great and their legal obligations very insistent when they are threatened with trouble?

Mr. BELL. Well, we were never threatened with trouble before. So I don't know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You speak of committees that are not existent in the various crafts?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, in which shop is there a committee?

Mr. BELL. All shops.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Can you give the date of a meeting of that character and the name of the committeeman to this commission?

Mr. BELL. I can furnish it later; yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Will you please do that?

Mr. BELL. I will.

(The matter above referred to will be found printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Bell exhibit.")

Commissioner GARRETSON. You speak of engines being started; runaways, I suppose?

Mr. BELL. Runaways, you would call them.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is, they became that as soon as they started?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. At Waterloo, Paducah, and what other points?

Mr. BELL. Burnside.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Did the company develop any information as to who started those engines?

Mr. BELL. No; we never found out.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You don't know, then, whether the strikers had anything to do with it.

Mr. BELL. We could not say.

Commissioner GARRETSON. There was no more evidence that it was a striker than that it was a special guard who desired to demonstrate the necessity of guarding?

Mr. BELL. No; we couldn't say.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You made the statement that different rates were paid to these different crafts at different points, like Burnside, New Orleans, Paducah, and other points; has any discontent ever arisen out of that?

Mr. BELL. No; I do not think that it has.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do the men ever refer to the fact in your train and engine service you pay exactly the same rate at New Orleans, Omaha, and Sioux City?

Mr. BELL. Exactly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I say, have the men in these crafts, in the days gone by, referred to the fact that you paid a uniform rate over your entire territory?

Mr. BELL. I do not recall that they ever did.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Mr. Bell. You will be permanently excused.

TESTIMONY OF MR. H. J. MALLOY.

Chairman WALSH. State your name.

Mr. MALLOY. H. J. Malloy.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. MALLOY. General organizer for the machinists.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would name all of the official positions you have had with any labor organizations, as well as your previous positions with railroad shops, or elsewhere.

Mr. MALLOY. Well, prior to the position I now hold I was business agent for the machinists on the Illinois Central, dating back to the time of the beginning of the strike, and for seven and one-half years prior to that time I worked in their shop in Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. As a machinist?

Mr. MALLOY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. State as briefly as you can what you know of the formation of the Federation System on the Illinois Central.

Mr. MALLOY. The federation was formed on the 1st of May at Memphis by representatives from the different organizations that had sent their men there and the other facts in connection with it are very much like Mr. McCreery gave here, so that it is hardly necessary to duplicate that. My recollection is just like he read it off here.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would just detail any information you have with reference to the use for publicity purposes or legislative purposes or otherwise of federated crafts by the railway companies.

Mr. MALLOY. Well, beginning as far back as 1907 a committee representing all of the employees at the shop at Burnside, which is in this city, were called into the master mechanic's office. There was somewhat of an agitation at that time caused by this so-called money panic and many of the men were beginning to insist that their pay would be given to them in cash rather than given to them in checks, fearing that when they would go to cash their checks they would be compelled to accept this script that was then being floated, and at that we were called in. I was a member of the committee that was called in and the master mechanic asked us if we would not use our influence in all of the departments to try to allay that agitation that was going on, assuring us that he thought all would be well in connection therewith. That to my recollection is the first time that these committees were called in jointly and, in my opinion, it showed the advisability of such a committee, because the master mechanic explained to us at one time what it would have taken him nine times as long to explain if he had called in nine different committees and told them at separate times.

Chairman WALSH. Prior to that time had there been any effort on the part of the crafts to have joint conferences rather than take up matters individually?

Mr. MALLOY. No, sir; not to my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. To your knowledge had there been any effort of that kind anywhere else?

Mr. MALLOY. No; I do not believe there was.

Chairman WALSH. Proceed now, and give any other instances of that kind you may have in mind?

Mr. MALLOY. Well, following that up, I—some time later at this same shop in Chicago there was a shop train running for the convenience of employees that lived down in the city and there was a bulletin posted calling attention to the danger of men staying on suburban train platforms. That came as a result of some one being hurt, and the committee wanted to point out the reason of the danger and asked that the committee be met, and they stated the purpose of their meeting. The master mechanic at that time, on gathering the purpose of their meeting from the chairman, said, "I do not see the necessity of meeting such a committee as this, but to you, as chairman, I will say that we will take this matter up." And at that time there was a very permanent remedy effected—a more permanent remedy effected than ever before. There had been additional cars which we asked for attached to that train and they were never taken off, as they had been in the past. In the past they would just put a car or two on for a short time and later on they would be cut off. But to my knowledge that effected what you might call a permanent remedy for that evil.

Chairman WALSH. Proceed and state any other instances.

Mr. MALLOY. Thank you. Later than that, beginning in 1910, there was a committee before the superintendent of motive power to adjust grievances, and this committee, after having about finished their work—it was mentioned informally something about the wage rate, which had been left over from 1909. The answer by the superintendent was that unless some new source of revenue was found by the company that he did not believe that any wage increase would be given on the system. And he made mention of the fact that this freight rate would have something to do with it. From that time on this freight-rate agitation grew, until, to my recollection, about the latter part of April or early in May, the general foreman of the Burnside shop, who was a machinist with a withdrawal card, came to a machinists' meeting and asked the privilege of speaking to the members on that question. The sentiment seemed to be very much in favor of doing something on it, the men feeling that the prosperity of the company would be in a large measure their prosperity later, and having in mind what had been said to their committee at this meeting in January, why, they decided that they would take part in it. The sentiment was very much in that way.

Now, I do not remember whether any official action was taken at the meeting, but nevertheless it was understood that there would be no objection to its being taken up. So it went on until later the company told the men in the different departments that if they would go into the office, or different places assigned to them, they could write letters to the governor of the State of Illinois urging him to assist—urging him to use his influence in the direction of an increase in this freight rate on coal. Whether they felt that was not doing all they could or not, the question was again urged that a committee might be a good thing, and when the matter was talked to the machinists, why, the machinists said if such a question came up that it was their desire that their own usual committee that handled these conferences with the company would be the committee to handle this. I happened to be on that committee and we went to Gov. Deneen, and there were 27 and it may be up to 30 representing all of the different departments, and the governor met us and we had our conference with him and told him our business. We told him we felt that the matter would mean some measure of increase to us, and he assured us that he would take under consideration what we had placed before him. He did not make any declaration as to what he would do. That was on May 26, 1910, to the best of my recollection.

Just one month later the machinists' committee, after having a request in for a conference, they were taken into conference, and prior to their being taken in, in the meantime, between the time they were first in in January talking over that question, up to that time the carmen had been taken in early in May, and this agreement that Mr Markham submitted, this low rate, ranging from a quarter of a cent upward, was at that time given to the carmen. A little later the boiler makers' committee went in, and because of the low rate and hard bargain that was driven with the car workers the boiler makers were almost compelled to accept a proportionate rate, and the boiler makers got a 1-cent rate in Chicago and a 2-cent rate at other points on the system.

At our conference on the 26th of January, this was the first conference that our committee had had under the administration of Mr. Markham, and I just want to make this statement at this time, that what Mr. Markham said about the fair treatment of the company, that all happened prior to his administration, that fair treatment. This one conference that we had was really the only wage conference that we had in Mr. Markham's administration; and the machinists were given a 1 to 2 cent increase. Regardless of their talk of fair treatment it left them 1 or 2 cents behind the prevailing rate in this territory; it left them 1 or 2 cents behind the prevailing rate in some other territory and as much as 3 cents in other territory. I will say this, that in a few different places, where there were a small number of men employed, that the rate which they gave was a little higher than that prevailing in that territory, paid by other roads. But as a general proposition the rate was a low rate for the largest number of men, because the large shops were affected by this reduced rate.

Commissioner LENNON. When you speak of 2 cents, that is the raise given over the previous schedule.

Mr. MALLOY. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. By the hour?

Mr. MALLOY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Proceed.

Mr. MALLOY. After that committee was in a matter of two hours this 2 cents had already been offered. The committee stayed here for a matter of five weeks, or perhaps a few days longer, trying to better that increase, but because of the two agreements signed ahead of them they were almost compelled to accept that which had been signed up for by the other crafts. Our committee did not sign up then; it signed up agreements back in 1909, and it was then that the nine-hour day was given and then is when the wage rate first came up, and in negotiating that it was really a matter of nine months before that conference was finally completed. All these other instances took place in the meantime—this coal rate, and so forth. And concluding on that coal-rate proposition. When our committee was finally given this 2 cents and reported back to the men, why, naturally, in checking where they had taken so much interest in trying to do all they could to make it possible to have a better rate and get all they could and do all they could for the company, with the belief that they were really acting in their own interests and all that, why, considerable dissatisfaction started right away, and those who had opposed going to the governor pointed out to us and said, "There is all you got out of it; these railroads who did not interest themselves at all, they are able to give more money." And from that time on the agitation was stronger than ever to take the matter up as a federated committee, because if it was a good thing for the company for us to act in that way, it would be a good thing for us to act in our own interests.

Then another thing that took place: We also—I urged—was the electrification of the Chicago terminals. When that agitation was up it was under the administration of Mayor Busse. The company had the men on the job to take the necessary preliminary steps to organize meetings, and so forth, and they suggested different times to meet and talk to the men. They suggested meeting them after working hours. That did not seem very practicable, because of the fact they went in so many different directions and had so many means of transportation. So the company finally set on having a meeting in the shop during shop hours, and we met, and the meeting, as I recall, was held about 10:30 in the morning, and every man in any department was allowed to go to the meeting. The speaker at that meeting urged the men to come down here to the city hall and to go in large numbers, and that same thing was done by the other railroads—to go in large numbers, and if possible to go down and crowd the council chamber so that no one else could get in. I was down there; I happened to go early enough to get in, and I was greatly surprised; when you speak about the press and the influence of the press, my best recollection is that the press of the city was in favor of electrification, but when we came down to the council meeting and this question came up the alderman of the first ward was the man favoring the railroad company; it was not the press.

Well, those instances naturally led the men to believe that they could accomplish better things by being together than by being separate, and although the company talked to us machinists and told us what fine fellows we were and that we ought not to affiliate with the carmen and all that just prior to the strike, why, at that time they were anxious for us to sit in the council chamber with the carmen or anyone else in order to crowd it; it didn't make much difference. It was much like the age limit after September 30; it was not a question then of who, but it was a question of necessity to get them.

Then right during the time that this federation was being developed by the men, the company started in and they did violate agreements. We took this question up from the standpoint of the violation of the agreements, this hospital question, and we had never had a hospital question at any other place on the system but at Paducah. The men were not asked as to whether they wanted a hospital or whether they did not want the hospital. It was just simply a question of a petition being placed before you and being asked as to whether you were in favor of it or not. Well, when the petition was passed around at our shop, which was one of the big ones of the system, the petition had quite a large number of names on the side of those opposing it and very few on the other side. Then the local federation took that question up and protested against it and said that they did not believe the matter had carried. Now, the company prepared and put forth this petition. The company counted the result of the petition and announced that the thing had carried by a great majority.

When the men protested against this the protest finally became so vigorous that a federated committee from this point was at least admitted by Mr. Park. They talked over this question of a hospital. I was not a member of that committee, but to my recollection they were told that this hospital proposition could not be a success unless it had the full membership of the employees from all the departments. They wanted some federation there! And the man that was opposed to the federation was usually a man that had to deal a whole lot with the foreman, and they were trying to convince him how good it was and how just it was in some cases to talk these questions with them.

The same thing happened when the federation was being developed by the men. The company officials all over the system, I am told, and I am sure they came to me, I know I was told what a bad thing it was for me and the rest of my associates, the machinists, to affiliate with the carmen, and that the large number of carmen on the system would outvote the rest of us fine mechanics on any question that would come up. Now, in connection with that, I just want to say their fears were not justified, because of the fact we would vote on these questions singly in our own organization, and our own organization would then have just one vote on the question. The carmen then would have the same thing, just one vote on the question, regardless of the number that they had, and so that their fears were not justified in that connection.

Now, another instance I want to give you about their fears not being justified. In 1909 when the committee was up, it was 1909 that they got this 9-hour day, the fear of the company in granting the 9-hour day was that it was going to be quite expensive, quite an expensive thing from the standpoint of the overtime, that it would shorten the day and thereby cause them to pay overtime for the tenth hour, which they did not have to do in the past. That was in September that that was settled. In January, when our committee was up, some of the complaints were too many men being worked overtime, and the officials of the company submitted evidence there to show us and told us plainly that there had been less overtime worked in our department in the last three months than had ever been in any three months time over the entire system—that is, by our craft—which went to show that we worked less overtime under a 9-hour day than we formerly had with the 10-hour day, which showed plainly that their fears were not justified. It showed that just simply by a matter of management and other things taken into consideration they could cut these things out. Their fears if not entirely eliminated would be greatly minimized.

So those things are the most flagrant things I see in connection with the way that they developed this thing, or rather developed their opposition to it, opposed the hospital question from the standpoint that it was a violation of our agreements; that our agreement called for a wage rate, our agreement called for a 30-day conference in order to change this rate, and the company did not submit any 30 days' notice on this hospital proposition; that the company just simply put out these petitions and by mutual agreement anyone that would sign the petition would become a member of this hospital association; all new men that would come into their service would be compelled to join the hospital association, be compelled to undergo a doctor's examination, and because of the features in connection with that we always believed that the doctor had a large latitude there for graft, and because of that fact we did not care to enter into the proposition. We know that the doctor had at some times issued orders and almost compelled the men to appear at his office and be vaccinated, and a man that would not comply with the notice, it might take four or five weeks until that time would have been past and finally they came up with a little slip and handed it to you, telling you to appear at the doctor's office, to go to the doctor's office to be vaccinated. And if you were not vaccinated at some time he would want to know then for sure, and he would try to impose upon you the necessity of getting vaccinated, but if you had been vaccinated at some time prior he would always be insistent enough to have you show him the scar; he would not take your word for it. The doctor was paid 25 cents for each vaccination, and you take it in a shop like Burnside, where 2,800 men were working, it is easy to see how a general rule like that would bring over $700 revenue in about as many weeks, about seven weeks, to a doctor. And it was for that that we opposed this hospital proposition—that it just opened up a new field of graft. It just made it broader. In addition to it being a violation of our contract from the 30-day-notice standpoint; there had been no notice given. There was no conference held. It was just simply put up to the men on petition, and it was left to them and if they mutually decided to do a thing, all right, and those that did not they could work and all new men coming into the service would be compelled to join that hospital association.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have any particular information, Mr. Malloy, with respect to the instance of alleged violation of the 30-day notice, particularly the notice calling the strife in 1911?

Mr. MALLOY. Well, as soon as that question was brought up the general chairman or business agent of the machinists consulted with me. I was what we call district secretary. And we wrote out a notice that would cover the machinists of the system, and in our opinion it would cover our agreement; would cover that which the company asked for; and told them that when we met, inasmuch as this question had been brought up, when we met we hoped to meet with all the other crafts in a federated body; and as far as I know that notice was conveyed to the company. I was not general chairman then.

Chairman WALSH. You say, so far as you know; what is your information, either directly or indirectly, on that subject?

Mr. MALLOY. Well, I am inclined to believe that it was given to them.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any foundation for your belief or information, either by hearsay or otherwise, that that was given them?

Mr. MALLOY. Yes; hearsay of the general chairman at that time, and my confidence in him at that time to convey it.

Chairman WALSH. Who was the general chairman?

Mr. MALLOY. He was H. S. Kieley, at Paducah.

Chairman WALSH. What was the attitude of the Chicago police department toward the strikers?

Mr. MALLOY. Well, at the very beginning of the strike, the morning of September 30, when the men walked out, there were from 150 to 200 of Chicago police lined up at the gates out here at this Chicago shop, and to me it seemed that crowd of such a number of them out there was to intimidate. Things that occurred following after that would justify that belief that they were there to intimidate.

In the early days of the strike two or three Pullman cars were backed into the yards and placed as close to the shop gate as possible. I understand that these police were kept in those cars inside the Illinois property, and that they were fed at their commissary. Their attitude from that time on was rather against our men. They would pick them up on almost anything. They would claim violation of injunction, and so forth. We had perhaps 60 to 70 different cases tried here in Chicago, and out of those 60 or 70 cases, to my knowledge, there was about one that a fine of $10 was imposed upon, because he seemed to be a little better marksman in throwing brickbats than the other fellow was.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask a question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. When this committee went to Springfield, you were allowed time and expenses?

Mr. MALLOY. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. When the company made up that committee, was it made up collectively from all the shop crafts?

Mr. MALLOY. Oh, yes; every department.

Commissioner GARRETSON. They were willing, then, to utilize the collective power of their employees legislatively for their own benefit and their municipal question also?

Mr. MALLOY. Exactly so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But they were ready to spend millions to keep from doing that, that same power on your own behalf?

Mr. MALLOY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Mr. MALLOY. I will say, since you state about millions, we were advised that on this electrification proposition that to electrify their terminals it would have cost them eighteen millions; and in order to save eighteen millions they would use us, but they would spend eighteen millions to fight on this federation.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any other statement that you desire to make about which you have not been interrogated, Mr. Malloy?

Mr. MALLOY. Yes; I would just make this statement in connection with the 30-day proposition:

That Mr. Markham the other day made the statement here that he believed that if they could have met with the different crafts that they could have convinced them that they had violated their 30-day agreement.

Now, what has been submitted here showing the company's position in connection with that, I believe it was all brought in from a federated standpoint. That from the time this first conference was asked, first communication passed, down until the time that Mr. Barnum issued the circular, that the circular was issued in the nature of a federated circular, and the company never did serve the 30-day notice on us saying that they desired to change the time to the old agreement. If they had done so, the chances are that they would have got that opportunity to try and convince us in our different crafts; but, as I understand it, they never presented any notice to us saying that they desired to meet us to discuss any one rule of that contract, but they simply put them all together and sent them out together, and to all different crafts that were affiliated with this federation.

Commissioner AUSTON. Commissioner Garretson raised the question about this committee that went to Springfield and asked if the company made up the committee.

That was not the fact, the company did not nominate who went on the committee, did they?

Mr. MALLOY. Well, as far as we were concerned, the machinists, they did not nominate, because we did not let them.

Commissioner AISHTON. They did not, as far as you know, with any other?

Mr. MALLOY. They went to those they wanted.

Commissioner AISHTON. As a matter of fact, the employees were as vitally interested as the company in seeing that revenue was secured and all that kind of thing, were they not? Ordinarily it is to the interest of the employee and to the interest of the company, they lie together in a matter of that kind?

Mr. MALLOY. From that standpoint, yes; that was the standpoint the men entered into that matter.

Commissioner AISHTON. It is a mutual affair?

Mr. MALLOY. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is all, thank you.

Mr. MALLOY. I might add to that, that that opinion was rudely shattered after our conference and the small amount of wages that were expended by by way of increase.

Commissioner AISHTON. I understand that.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you. You may be excused.

Mr. Montgomery.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HUGH MONTGOMERY.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Hugh Montgomery.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I reside in McComb, Miss.

Chairman WALSH. McComb, Miss.?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you resided in McComb, Miss.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. About 33 years.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would state what your business has been during that time?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I have been working for the Illinois Central 28 years of that time. I have worked 28 consecutive years up until September, 1911, when the strike was declared. I was on the pay roll then. I was off sick, however, and had been for a month, but I was supposed to be employed by the company at that time.

Chairman WALSH. In what department were you employed, Mr. Montgomery?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I was in the car department.

Chairman WALSH. In what capacity?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. As what is termed car carpenter.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you followed that particular line?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I had followed that particular line about 18 years.

Chairman WALSH. What was your rate of pay per hour at the time the strike was called?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Twenty-six cents.

Chairman WALSH. What was your monthly wage just prior to the strike?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Well, about an average of $55, I think, something like that; about an average of that; perhaps a little less.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a married man or a single man?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I have a family.

Chairman WALSH. What was the average wage of the men in the car department in your shop?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Why, for the last few years back I think it is about 18½ cents an hour. Prior to that, ever since I had been working for the company, they had what they called a flat rate. Every man that worked in the car department, that is, as a car repairer, got 16½ cents an hour. A few years ago they changed that plan and adopted what they call the scale system. Then they paid a man what he was worth. I do not know exactly how they came to do it, but at any rate some of the men got 17½ cents; others 18½ and up as high as 22½. I think the general average has been from that time on until now about 18½ cents an hour, some more and some less, brings the average to about, I think, 18½ cents per hour.

Chairman WALSH. What was the average number of men in ordinary times at work in the car department in your shop?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. We had, I think it was some 400 men on the last roll in the car department.

Chairman WALSH. How were those men with reference to being married or single or having a family or not having a family?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Well, the majority of them were men with families.

Chairman WALSH. What would be the average monthly wage of those men, would you say; getting 18½ cents an hour?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. About $37 to $40.

Chairman WALSH. Thirty-seven to forty dollars a month?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many men were working, would you say, approximately, at that wage?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Well, there were approximately, I suppose, 300.

Chairman WALSH. From your personal knowledge of the men in the car department who were married and working for 18 cents an hour, can you give the commission an idea, a concise idea of their standard of living, what sort of homes they had, what sort of food they ate, what sort of clothes they wore, and all about it?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, the buildings, nearly all of the buildings in that town that are for rent are just common, what we term box-house buildings, you know. They are a very ordinary class of buildings, and that kind of building, all those men that work in the car department with a few exceptions live in that kind. Of course, we have, as with all other classes, some of them who are better managers and can get along on less and have better surroundings than others; but the majority of them are men who rented these box-houses at from $7 to $10 a month. Of course, their manner of living was very poor, with what they had to buy being so very high and their having so little money with which to buy; hence they lived principally on bread and bacon, Irish potatoes and sweet potatoes and a great deal of sirup which is raised around in that section of the country; they make a good deal of sirup, cane sirup, which is very cheap. They just had simply the absolute necessities of life without any of the luxuries.

Chairman WALSH. And how about clothing?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Well, about on a par with what they eat—ordinary clothing, just very ordinary clothing.

Chairman WALSH. Are the people all white or are part of them colored?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. The car repairers were; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Were what, white people?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. To get some general idea now about the living conditions down there I would like you to tell us further. You say that during all these years, down toward the last few years at any rate, you averaged about $55 a month?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Had you had a family?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. How is that?

Chairman WALSH. How is that reference to adequacy of wage for a man to raise a family on in that neighborhood?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. At the time I was raising my family—I had a small family, I had only two in my family, two sons—and while I was raising them I was getting 16½ cents an hour. By the time I got to where I got 20 cents an hour my boys were grown and working in the shops themselves. Of course, I could get along better than a man that had a lot of small children, little boys and girls coming up that he had to clothe and feed and all that sort of thing. I owned my home. But it so happened that when I went to McComb I had some property, had some land. I sold that and bought a home in McComb. That enabled me, not having to pay rent while I was raising my children on this 16½ cents an hour, although it took my monthly wage—my monthly wage would average about $34 a month for about 18 years—no not that long—about 16 years my wages averaged about $34 a month.

Chairman WALSH. Was the work laborious; was the work hard?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Why, not necessarily.

Chairman WALSH. The general character of it?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Well, the general character of it was repairing cars in that day and time. I was a car repairer then. Then during the first few years I worked with the company, of course, it was comparatively hard work; yes, sir. A good deal of it was just all I could possibly do, because I never was so very stout—for instance, handling car wheels where you have to change wheels on the cars.

Chairman WALSH. What are you doing now?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I am not doing anything.

Chairman WALSH. Have you been out ever since the strike?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You mentioned about owning your own home?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You live in McComb?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Are there other employees there that own their homes?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes; employees, a few; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did any of them leave or are they all still there?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. They have all left there, hardly one there. I do not know of but one other man that owns his home in McComb when the strike commenced that is there to-day.

Chairman WALSH. How many home owners would you say—you say a few there—could you approximate—give us the number any more specifically than that?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Why, there was a good many of the blacksmiths, machinists, that owned homes there. I suppose there were perhaps a hundred men that owned their homes.

Chairman WALSH. Would you say there are only one or two of those men left there?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I don't think there is but one other besides myself.

Chairman WALSH. Well, were they that had their homes paid for, or were they like ordinary persons in various processes of paying for them?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. They were then in various processes of payment. There were very few of them that had their homes paid for. Some of them did and have since sold them. A great many of the men that had their homes paid for at the inception of the strike have since sold them, having title vested within themselves they could sell them and get some money for them. A great many of them have done that; others have simply lost what they had paid on them.

Chairman WALSH. Why did you join a union?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. When did I?

Chairman WALSH. Why did you join a union?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Why, because it was considered to be the thing to do. Every other workman in that whole town and in that shop belonged to the union; and for the purpose of getting protection—getting more wages. Otherwise I would perhaps be working for 10½ cents to-day, or at least when I did quit. I joined the union to get the protection that the unions give to the workmen. That is why.

Chairman WALSH. Were you in McComb at the time of the riot there?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would give a brief description of that for our record. You were right on the ground, were you?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes; I was right on the ground. I was the man that was struck. The first intimation that we had of these people in the car was from Winona, Miss., a distance of 200 miles above McComb. They wired from Winona to gentlemen in McComb that there were a certain lot of men in a coach coming south, coming to McComb, and cutting up very badly along the route; that when this train had stopped there they had gone out and looted a restaurant and several other places; and as they came on down the line we were getting messages from every town nearly about these fellows and the conduct they were carrying on, and when they got to a little town 3 miles north of McComb, called Summit, it is not admissible to tell you the conduct that these people carried on there.

These things were wired on ahead; in consequence of which by the time they arrived at McComb the citizenship was very much incensed at the insults that had been offered to women all along the line. As they approached McComb—I will say further right here the way I came to be in the crowd. A day previous to that a writ of injunction had been served upon us—upon the strikers—and the company had had a wire stretched along the right of way. Well, I had a son that was a young fellow—he was a machinist, a young fellow—and there were quite a number just like him that were thoughtless; and I knew that unless I or some one else was along to keep constantly reminding them of the fact, they were liable to get over into that wire on the right of way. And we had a United States marshal there and I knew what the consequences would be if they got over there, and hence I was along just to keep them off, from violating the injunction.

When this coach came into McComb there was a great crowd of us that was standing on the little embankment—an elevated embankment which brought us up just about on a level with the coach windows. We were scattered along there, men, women, and children, along as they came in; and as it came down and got just opposite to where the crowd was standing the windows of the coach went up as by automatically, and they—they just threw out these rocks. They had a barrel—they had stopped a mile above McComb where the company had been doing some concrete work, and got up a barrel of these rocks. And they fired them into the crowd, and shot two or three shots from a gun and shot into one man's automobile. One of the first stones hit me right above the eye [indicating] and put me out of business—for awhile, at any rate.

Well, as I have just told you, I have been a citizen of McComb for thirty-odd years. I think you will believe me when I tell you that—I do not say this boastfully—but every man, woman, and child in McComb is my friend. And when in connection with the conduct that these men had been carrying on in their course down to McComb, and the fact connected with it that they had thrown out and struck and, as they supposed, killed me—the story went out all over the country just that quick that Montgomery was killed. And they ran the coach into this shop yard. In the meantime they had built a wall around there. They ran the coach into the shop yard and on down through, and as it came out on the south side of the shop yards the men had—the citizens had gathered together, and as the coach pulled out of the shop yards some fellows in the coach fired guns and shot one of the men's fingers off, and then the shooting commenced. They shot the coach to pieces. They said there were 21 men killed in it. I don't know whether there was 21 or none. I have never been able to ascertain as to the facts of the case.

Chairman WALSH. You say 21 were killed on this car or train?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. That was the report; I don't know. But that is the fact of the case, that the citizenship of McComb had been so incensed from these wires that had been coming down the line, and then the climax of shooting into the crowd and striking and knocking me down—as I said I have been a citizen of McComb for 30 years, thirty-odd years, and no man has ever had any charge against me for anything.

Chairman WALSH. How much of a population has McComb, Mr. Montgomery?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Well, it has about 9,000.

Chairman WALSH. Nine thousand?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. They claimed 10,000. You will see on the big electric sign as you go into the city, "Ten thousand population." But I think that is exaggerated a little. I had access to the tax collector's books here a few weeks ago, and 9,000 is about the correct population.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any other large industry in the city except the railway interests?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. No, sir. No, sir; there is nothing else there at all; that is, to amount to anything.

Chairman WALSH. What is the total number of employees that were engaged in the shop at the time the strike began?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Why, something over 800, I think it was.

Chairman WALSH. How many of those have left the city of McComb?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Why, I could not tell you; nearly all of them.

Chairman WALSH. Practically all of them?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes; practically all of them. I don't think there is 10; I don't think there is 10 left there.

Chairman WALSH. At this point, Mr. Montgomery, we will adjourn until 2 o'clock this afternoon. Will you please resume the stand at that time? There may be a few more questions.

(Thereupon, at 12:30 o'clock, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HUGH MONTGOMERY—Continued.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Mr. Montgomery, will you please resume the stand. Our chairman is away on account of a funeral. I think the direct examination has closed; unless you desire to submit something that you have not yet submitted you may be excused.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I have this one particular thing that I would like to call your attention to, Mr. Chairman. In Mr. Markham's statement—he read us, in his statement before this commission, something with reference to the arrests that had been made along on the track, on the Illinois Central, in the strike zone. I wish to say to this commission that I had a son that was among that number. At McComb there was a number of our people that were arrested and hiked out to Jackson, Miss., to the Federal court, without giving them any chance whatever to make any preparation at all. My son was accused of having struck a strike breaker that was at least three-quarters of a mile from my residence. We proved conclusively by quite a number of witnesses who happened to be at my home that this boy was at my house for an hour previous and for an hour and a half subsequent to the time the man was said to have been struck; but, notwithstanding that fact, he was sentenced to 90 days in prison and fined $100, and was confined in the Jackson, Miss., jail. He was put in jail and kept there 45 days, and the fine was remitted and he was turned loose.

Now, I want to say to you gentlemen that I was in the Southern Army. We fought them for a principle that we then thought was right. I have been engaged in that same kind of a fight for a principle during this controversy with the railroad company.

While, as I said this morning, a good many of the years of my life have been spent in the service of the Illinois Central Co. at the small salary of 16½ cents per hour, hence you can readily see that I have had no opportunity to educate my children and maintain them as ought to be done with white people. However, there is no man, except in that one instance, that can point to a single solitary thing in the life of either one of my family where they have been accused of any crime or been arrested for anything in this world except that one particular thing.

The policy of the company seems to have been to arrest our people and carry them off to Jackson, Miss., in order to make it cost us as much money as possible, knowing that was the quickest way to wipe us out—to clean us of what little finances we did have. They took these people—there was no charge; some of them had no charge preferred against them at all; they were arrested by United States marshals—and carried them to Jackson, and kept them there for a few days, 30 days some of them, and then released them and the fines were remitted. So that is about the extent of that thing.

There is no charge anywhere in the records of our country down there where any of my people have ever been charged with any crime whatever, and I just wish to impress upon you gentlemen the fact that while we are poor people of necessity, yet, at the same time, we are honest people, and we try and do to our utmost. My endeavor has been always, since the inception of this strike, and I have advocated and pleaded on every occasion to keep within the limits of the law, because I knew very well whenever we come counter to the United States courts then we were in for it; hence, I have done everything in my power to keep down anything of a lawless character.

I do not think of anything else.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Will you kindly, in a brief way, tell us about the school facilities?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. The school facilities in the last few years—for the last five years at McComb—they are rather above the average; they have a good system of public schools now, but prior to that the school system was very inferior.

Acting Chairman LENNON. In connection with the riot that took place—called a riot, anyway—you were there on this bank you have described—along where the train ran—some little time before the train came in?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Well, no; I suppose not exceeding 10 minutes—5 or 10 minutes.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Did you hear anything there among the men as to a prior arrangement to attack this train or these strike breakers?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. No, sir; there could not have been anything of that kind, I don't think, from the fact that it was generally known, as I stated this morning, that we had been wired this morning from different points along the line that they were approaching McComb; and the evening this occurred was an exceedingly warm evening, and the men were out in their shirt sleeves, and they had—no; I am confident there was not a thing on earth among them with which to commit a crime or with which to fight. I am confident that I had a little umbrella in my hand, and I think that is about as dangerous a weapon as there was in the whole crowd.

Acting Chairman LENNON. That is all, Mr. Montgomery.

Commissioner AISHTON. Just a moment, Mr. Montgomery. Who were these wires sent by that you received?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Sent from Winona by—I can't think of the names of the people. There was a merchant—

Commissioner AISHTON. Telegrams, were they?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes; from Winona it was a telegram, and from Summit a telephone call. I can't tell by whom; but I can tell you to whom they were sent. They were sent to Dr. O. B. Quinn. He is president and general manager of the First National Bank of McComb. He is one of the most prominent men in the whole southwestern Mississippi, known to everybody—Dr. O. B. Quinn. These messages came to him, and he told them to me and to others that were there at the bank. That is the reason the crowd collected along there, just merely more through curiosity than anything else. As to the purpose of raising a riot or anything of that sort, there couldn't have been anything of that sort; because, if there had, they certainly would have made some preparation for it.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Commissioner Ballard would ask a question.

Commissioner BALLARD. In this repairing of cars, is it what might be called carpenter work—the use of ordinary carpenter's tools?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. Regular carpenter's tools?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. What do you say you got per hour before that strike?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I was getting 26 cents.

Commissioner BALLARD. Twenty-six cents an hour?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. Have you ever had as good a job since?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I have never had any at all, sir.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Mr. Garretson will inquire of you.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Most of those telegrams came from points where there were no strikers?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes, sir; no strikers.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Interdivision points where there were no employees or strikers?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Just some citizens?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes; from the citizens of Winona, a merchant there—I forget the name, but some merchant in Winona. Nearly all those people along the line are acquainted with Dr. Quinn, because he is a big man, a big man generally in that country, and everybody knows him. That is the reason these wires went to him. Some men in Winona—that is the place from which the first message came—some merchant.

Commissioner AISHTON. That was about 200 miles away?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes; about 200 miles north of McComb?

Acting Chairman LENNON. That is all. You will be excused, Mr. Montgomery.
Dr. L. C. Henley.

TESTIMONY OF DR. L. C. HENLEY.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Where do you live?

Dr. HENLEY. 9320 Cottage Grove, Chicago.

Acting Chairman LENNON. You are a practicing physician and surgeon?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes.

Acting Chairman LENNON. How long did you act as surgeon for the Illinois Central Railroad?

Dr. HENLEY. From June, 1896, until October 30, 1913.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Describe your duties in a general way as surgeon of the company.

Dr. HENLEY. Up until July, 1912, my duties were to take care of all injured employees that were brought to my attention, and to have general supervision of all things pertaining that would naturally come under the jurisdiction of the surgical department, and sanitary matters at the point called Burnside. Subsequent to 1912, to take care, have charge of the injured and sick employees at Burnside.

Acting Chairman LENNON. What compensation did you have prior to 1912?

Dr. HENLEY. $125 a month, with opportunities for outside work. That did not occupy all of my time.

Acting Chairman LENNON. When the system of physical examination was introduced, did that fall under your charge?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes.

Acting Chairman LENNON. And that created additional compensation to you?

Dr. HENLEY. Well, no; I should have said in July, 1911, the hospital department started, and then my salary was placed at $175. The examinations started in June, 1912, and there was no increase to the salary.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Will you describe what the examination was, how rigid an examination you made?

Dr. HENLEY. The physical examination, the general physical examination. The applicant was, you might say, examined as to his general appearance, his pulse, his temperature, whether or not he was ruptured, varicose veins, or any gross evidence of specific trouble. If his pulse and temperature indicated heart lesions or lung lesions, we would go a little further into the examination.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Were the different examinations had by you for different classes of employees?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes; there was a different examination, more thorough examination, for men of the transportation department, those who had to do with the dispatching of trains, the reading of signals, that was more rigid, required a more thorough examination as to vision and hearing.

Acting Chairman LENNON. In making the examinations in the usual way, if you found a candidate unfit for a certain position, could you certify him to some other position he might be fit for?

Dr. HENLEY. Our examinations at Burnside included only the shopmen and none of the transportation men. They were either accepted or rejected outright.

Acting Chairman LENNON. When did you leave the service of the company, or have you left?

Dr. HENLEY. October 30, 1913, my resignation was effective. My resignation was sent in the early part of September.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Have you any idea of the number of examinations you would make in the course of a month during that specific period of time?

Dr. HENLEY. From June 3, 1912, to October 30, 1913, that is 16 months, there were 9,400.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Please repeat that.

Dr. HENLEY. The examinations made between June 3, 1912, and October 30, 1913, that is 16 months, were 9,400.

Acting Chairman LENNON. What fee was charged each one of these applicants?

Dr. HENLEY. The first two months $1 was charged for each applicant, and subsequent to that those who received compensation of $50 per month or more were charged $1. Those who received a compensation of less than $50 were charged 50 cents.

Acting Chairman LENNON. What understanding, if you know, did the men have as to the disposition of these fees?

Dr. HENLEY. Their understanding was that it was to go to the examining surgeon. It was so stated on the top of the application which they filled out and signed. They were so informed by the employing officer.

Acting Chairman LENNON. The examining surgeon then received the fees?

Dr. HENLEY. I did not.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Well, do you know who did receive the fees?

Dr. HENLEY. Why, a number of them; I don't know, to my personal knowledge. I understand that surgeons throughout Illinois, except in Chicago, received them. That was where the largest number of men were employed--in Chicago.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Did these fees go to the company in any way, directly or indirectly, that you know of?

Dr. HENLEY. It was deducted from the salary, the first month's salary of the employees by the company and by them turned over to the hospital-department fund.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Then it went, eventually, these fees, to the hospital fund, as you understand it?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Could you give us an idea as to the cost of your department, including your salary—what would be the average cost to the company in cases of accident and sickness among its employees?

Dr. HENLEY. Why, I tabulated that some time ago, but I do not recall the exact number of cases. It amounted, considering my salary and the salary of my assistants, and a fair estimate for the upkeep, less than 50 cents per case for cases treated by me or my assistants.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Is there anything further in connection with these hospital services which would enlighten the commission on the management and control of the hospital system that has not been called out by these questions?

Dr. HENLEY. I do not know of anything that would be of interest to the commission. I do not know exactly what it is that is desired.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Who is the chief surgeon for the company now?

Dr. HENLEY. Dr. G. G. Dowdall.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Is he a resident of Chicago?

Dr. HENLEY. A resident of Chicago.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Does the Illinois Central Co. have surgeons in most of the principal cities and towns in which their road operates?

Dr. HENLEY. They have at all points, in all towns and cities.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Do those surgeons at those towns outside of Chicago receive the same compensation or fees that you received when you were acting here at the Burnside plant?

Dr. HENLEY. No; that varies greatly according to the amount of work that is done at these points, according to the amount for which, I presume, they can get a man.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just explain the attendance in sickness. I understand that the employees have the attention of the doctor in case of ordinary sickness?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes; the employees themselves, not their families. A sick employee has the attention of the company surgeon.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Through a protracted illness at home?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Without cost?

Dr. HENLEY. He pays 50 cents a month into the general hospital department fund.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Medical attendance was given him as a member of the hospital association?

Dr. HENLEY. Hospital department; yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. For the payment of the monthly fee?

Dr. HENLEY. That was deducted from his pay each month.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In case of surgical operation, was there any additional cost in any way?

Dr. HENLEY. No, sir; unless it was for some specific trouble or injury received in fighting or some infraction of the law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If a workman was injured away from the shop accidentally in some way, would he receive the attention?

Dr. HENLEY. He receives attention; yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He would receive the attention?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes; except as I said, through some infraction of the law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you any idea as to the proportion of the men passed upon for employment that were accepted by the company?

Dr. HENLEY. There was a very small per cent, less than a fraction of 1 per cent rejected at Burnside.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would they be rejected if, for instance, they were troubled with varicose veins?

Dr. HENLEY. If I reported they were serious, bad varicose veins, they would be rejected; that was left to my discretion, to accept or reject.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would there be very many out of the nine thousand and some that you examined, I think you said in 16 months?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would there be any perceptible percentage of that number that were not troubled in some way, by varicose veins?

Dr. HENLEY. Oh, yes; a very small per cent were troubled with varicose veins.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. A very small per cent?

Dr. HENLEY. Very small; that is, where they are enlarged to such an extent to make them a detriment in any way. My instructions were to pass all men unless their defects were very serious.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you pass upon their hearing and eyesight?

Dr. HENLEY. No; we did not do that at Burnside. That was only for the men who belonged to the transportation department, or who had to do with reading signals.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If they had a finger or two fingers off?

Dr. HENLEY. We were to make a note of those things in the paper, in the examination report.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the matter of the acceptance or rejection, would that be left to the officials of the company, based upon your reports?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Either for or against?

Dr. HENLEY. No; I marked them either accepted or rejected.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You marked them?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes. I either accepted them or rejected them. But if there were any that they wished to overrule, it would be overrule by the chief surgeon.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Largely upon your recommendation, then, they would secure employment?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir; it was entirely, I believe, in no case at all that I was overruled.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You say the per cent was very small that you rejected?

Dr. HENLEY. Practically less than 1 per cent; very small.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In a general way, what would those rejections be, what would be the cause?

Dr. HENLEY. I believe practically all for hernia, in which they refused to obtain a truss. I do not recall any other case just at present.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were there any cases with varicose veins?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes; we had some, but upon the applicant agreeing to obtain a support for them, elastic support, we left them go through.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Trouble with the lungs?

Dr. HENLEY. There were a few lung troubles. I believe we did have one case of very bad heart trouble that we rejected. My impression now is that we did.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And tuberculosis?

Dr. HENLEY. We had some what you might call mild cases, not advanced.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would they be marked favorable or unfavorable?

Dr. HENLEY. They were accepted with the notes made as to their condition.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You say you do not know where the difference in cost of operating your department and the difference of the money collected went to, other than it went to the association, the hospital association?

Dr. HENLEY. I do not quite understand your question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The money that is collected by the company, this dollar a month, or 50 cents, or 75 cents, as the case may be, that you say was turned into the hospital association?

Dr. HENLEY. Hospital-department fund; yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And your salary and expenses came out of the hospital fund?

Dr. HENLEY. They came out of the general hospital fund.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And any balance that might be there over the cost of operating the department, remained in the hospital fund?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And has that fund accumulated?

Dr. HENLEY. Why, I was informed that quite a fund had accumulated.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you any idea as to the amount?

Dr. HENLEY. Last fall I was informed by the chief clerk that it was about $400,000.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does that apply to the entire system of the Illinois Central?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The $400,000?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How many employees are supposed to be in that, all of them?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How many would that be approximately?

Dr. HENLEY. I really could not tell you; I think about sixty or seventy thousand; that is merely a rough estimate.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And they are paying on an average of from 50 cents to $1 a month?

Dr. HENLEY. They are all paying 50 cents straight and have been since the hospital department started.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The income of that department is approximately $25,000?

Dr. HENLEY. I presume about that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does the department publish an annual statement showing the receipts and expenditures?

Dr. HENLEY. I have never seen any or heard of one being issued.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There are no published documents we could count upon that would give a statement of the operating of the department, the receipts and expenditures?

Dr. HENLEY. Not that I know of.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is a report of any kind made to the Illinois Central Railroad Co.?

Dr. HENLEY. I presume there is a report made to the railway company.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But there is no published document about it?

Dr. HENLEY. None that I know of at all.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who is the chief in charge of the whole system of the medical department?

Dr. HENLEY. The chief surgeon, G. G. Dowdall.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. His address is in the city here?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And we could get from him any statement made in connection with this?

Dr. HENLEY. I suppose so.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Commissioner Ashton wishes to ask you a question.

Commissioner ASHTON. Your work was confined to the Burnside shops entirely, was it?

Dr. HENLEY. Burnside and vicinity; I handled a great many cases in the Fordham yards at Ninety-first Street.

Commissioner ASHTON. In the examination of new employees, your work covers largely shop men?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir; largely, and the laboring class from the Fordham yards, and the clerks also; all except those who have to do with the transportation of trains.

Commissioner ASHTON. You have an office in the Burnside shops?

Dr. HENLEY. There is an emergency hospital there.

Commissioner ASHTON. Fitted up by the company?

Dr. HENLEY. Fitted up out of the hospital department funds.

Commissioner ASHTON. And a part of the hospital arrangements, the general hospital arrangements?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner ASHTON. That is all.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Commissioner O'Connell wishes to ask another question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose that an employee had a protracted case of illness, would he receive medical attention and service of the physician for all of the time he was ill, say, if it was for a year or two years or even longer?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Supposing he left the service of the company and he had been paying into this fund for a number of years, that he had been paying into the hospital association for a number of years and he left the service of the company for some reason, either he was dismissed or quit, would he be entitled to that service after that?

Dr. HENLEY. No, sir; that right terminates as soon as his employment with the company ceases.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It stops as soon as his employment stops?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes.

* Acting Chairman LENNON. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask a question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In the employment of doctors in the department, Doctor, was there any different—were there any regular salaried men except here at Chicago?

Dr. HENLEY. I believe they are all regular salaried men.

Commissioner GARRETSON. All over the country—that is, all over the system?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir; all over the system.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is the arrangement the same at towns which are not division points, as at those that are?

Dr. HENLEY. In that respect, yes; there is a difference received in the way of salaries.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How about the disposition of the fees received from the men examined at points like Clinton, Champaign, and Centralia? Did the examining surgeons there keep the fees?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes; I understand they keep the fees; they are deducted by the company and paid to the examining surgeon. They are deducted by the company from the first month's pay of all those who are put to work, and in the case of men who are not put to work the company itself pays the fee.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The company acts as collecting agent in that case?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then, in Chicago, if there had been any manipulation of the examination—were you here this forenoon?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And you heard the testimony?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If there had been any manipulation here in Chicago it would be the hospital department that would be the gainer financially and not the physician?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. While at outlying points, if there was any manipulation, the surgeon would gain by it?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In the matter of physical examination, is the man compelled to strip?

Dr. HENLEY. His trousers were lowered to his knees and his upper clothing removed, his coat and vest and we would lift up his shirt.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It is quite a strict examination; it is rigid?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. More so than in an examination for insurance?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir; more than I have ever submitted to for insurance.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In other words, he does not have the status that an insurance applicant has?

Dr. HENLEY. Probably not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you know of any man holding a position being given information from any source that this or that man should be rejected?

Dr. HENLEY. No, sir; I do not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You never had anything of that kind occur?

Dr. HENLEY. No, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you know when—can you tell how long a period following the 11th day of September—that is the strike date, isn't it?

Dr. HENLEY. Thirtieth.

Commissioner GARRETSON. September 30, 1911; for how long was all physical examination in the departments that were on strike suspended?

Dr. HENLEY. Well, they did not have the examinations at that time—physical examination. Physical examinations did not commence until June, 1912.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Following that?

Dr. HENLEY. Following that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It had been before that in the transportation department?

Dr. HENLEY. Yes, sir; that was always.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But it had not been extended to these departments?

Dr. HENLEY. No, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Who are the financial officers of the hospital?

Dr. HENLEY. The same as the financial officers of the company.

Acting Chairman LENNON. The same treasurer?

Dr. HENLEY. The same treasurer, paymaster, and auditor.

Acting Chairman LENNON. That is all, thank you, Dr. Henley.
S. H. Grace.

TESTIMONY OF MR. SAMUEL H. GRACE.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Give your name, address, and occupation?

Mr. GRACE. S. H. Grace, Omaha, Nebr. I am general organizer for the International Association of Machinists. Prior to that time I was what we term business agent, or general chairman, for the machinists' organization on the Union Pacific from the fall of 1903 up until September 30, 1911.

Acting Chairman LENNON. And as such, you had been associated in this work on what are known as the Harriman lines in this controversy being investigated?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Did you make any special investigation—any special investigation of conditions on the Union Pacific and Oregon Short Line at any time?

Mr. GRACE. Mr. Chairman, before going into that I have a matter here that I would like to read to the commission—

Acting Chairman LENNON. All right.

Mr. GRACE (continuing). By which we will endeavor to show the change of policy on the part of some of the higher officials on the so-called Harriman lines.

Acting Chairman LENNON. All right, Mr. Grace. Submit it in your own way, but we want to be as brief as possible.

Mr. GRACE. I will not read it completely, but I desire to submit to the commission this telegram, and probably one or two small statements, and then will submit all of this so it may be incorporated in the record.

In the years 1902 and 1903 the machinists' organization were on a strike on the Union Pacific system. A settlement was made in May, 1903, they then returning to work on June 8, 1903. The Union Pacific at that time was using or borrowing engines from the Southern Pacific system. That matter was taken up with the heads of the different organizations and a strike vote was taken among the shopmen on the Southern Pacific system. Mr. E. H. Harriman at that time was president of the Union Pacific and of the Southern Pacific systems, and became interested in the affair, and as it was his telegram which brought a settlement, I desire to have that incorporated in the record. The same telegram was sent to the president of the International Association of Machinists, to the president of the boilermakers, and the blacksmiths' organizations—the same telegram in effect. The names of the men in these were different. This refers practically to the machinists. This is a telegram sent from New York City in the month of May, 1903, to James O'Connell, who was then president of the machinists' organization [reading]:

"Rather than permit a condition to be brought about whereby men's homes would be broken up and their families, wives, and children permitted to suffer through no fault of their own, I will recommend to Mr. Burt and suggest to you for your consideration the following:

"The sympathetic machinists' strike on the Southern Pacific and other lines to be called off, Union Pacific strike to be called off, matter of piecework to be left to the men themselves, both those already employed and to be employed hereafter by the Union Pacific, and piecework not to be further extended on the Union Pacific, and to be abandoned at the end of four months, if so determined upon by Mr. Burt and Hugh Doran, and if they can not agree it is to be referred to Messrs. J. O'Connell, M. J. Ford, and E. H. Harriman; the piecework not to be extended on the Southern Pacific or other lines except after conference and agreement with the machinists; no discrimination to be made against former employees on the Union Pacific when places are to be filled and no discrimination to be made on account of their accepting temporarily the piecework or not, and any adjustment thereof to be determined between Messrs. Doran and Burt, and in case of nonagreement by them to be referred to Messrs. O'Connell, Ford, and Harriman; in lieu of this call off the strike, both sympathetic and otherwise as above, and refer the whole Union Pacific controversy in its present condition to arbitration to be agreed upon. On account of present conditions it is important that I see you all in New York not later than Monday next. Please answer.

"E. H. HARRIMAN."

As a result of that telegram a settlement was brought about, which provided that at the end of four months a conference would be held by the parties mentioned. Mr. Doran came to Omaha, and being unable to agree with Mr. Burt over the abolishing of the piecework, the matter was then referred to Mr. Harriman, Mr. O'Connell, and Mr. Ford. Also a committee of machinists from the Union Pacific system, of which I happened to be one, went to New York. In that conference the matter was practically left in the hands of Mr. Harriman, he at that time stating it was the first labor trouble he had been mixed up or interested in, and that so far as he was concerned it would be the last if it laid within his power to prevent it. Matters ran along after that conference in New York City, and in the fall of 1903 many complaints were sent east to President O'Connell, of machinists' organization, who no doubt forwarded them to Mr. Harriman's office in regard to the company not living up to the agreement at that time as to the discontinuance of piecework. It was not being abolished as fast as the representatives thought it should be. Consequently, in the trip over the road Mr. Harriman stopped at Cheyenne, Wyo., he was in the West at the time, and telegrams were sent to the president of the machinists' organization, at that time, to myself at Omaha, stating that Mr. Harriman was in the West and would stop on his way east and interview committees. He stopped at Cheyenne, Wyo., and had an interview with the committee, and also stopped at Omaha. The matter was discussed with Mr. McKeen, then superintendent of motive power of the Union Pacific, and we had a conference in Mr. Harriman's car in the yards at Omaha. He made a very broad assertion or statement which no doubt was made in good faith, and meant considerable to the employees working on the so-called Harriman lines. After our grievances had been thrashed out, he made a suggestion to the men—to the committee—that while he realized it was necessary for capital to combine, he did not see why the same rights should be denied to the employees; and practically made the suggestion that the employees on the so-called Harriman lines should have an organization of their own, which is very much following out the federation plan—system federation plan. He made that statement, as I say, I have no doubt, in good faith; also instructed us to visit the officials more frequently; and when any change in policy was contemplated by the company the employees should also be consulted in the matter.

It is for the purpose of showing that after the death of Mr. Harriman there seemed to be a change of policy on the part of the highest officials in the operating department that I desired to read the telegram. The rest of this is practically a repetition of what has gone before, and simply shows why we organized our System Federation. The correspondence between the officials of the Union Pacific, the Oregon Short Line, and the Oregon Railway & Navigation Co. and myself, as chairman of the machinists' organization, as to serving 90 days' notice on behalf of our organization of any change in agreement, and asking for a joint conference, and their replies thereto, and I would like to submit that to the commission, which can be incorporated in the record and thus save taking up your time.

After the settlement of the shopmen's strike, 1902-3, on the Union Pacific system, which was brought about by Union Pacific using engines belonging to the other parts of the Harriman lines, strike vote was taken by the shopmen on the other lines, then Mr. E. H. Harriman, now deceased, took a hand in the affair as per the telegram from New York heretofore given.

As provided in telegram, conferences were first held in Omaha, Nebr., by the parties named, who were unable to agree. Then referred to last-named parties and Mr. E. H. Harriman at New York City.

During conference in New York City with Mr. Harriman statement was made by him that it was the first labor trouble in which he had ever become interested, and that it would be the last on system controlled by him as far as he was able to prevent.

Many complaints were made that the Union Pacific Co. was not carrying out promises made or living up to the agreement signed. These complaints were sent to Mr. Harriman at New York. Later on Mr. Harriman made a trip over the road, meeting committees at Cheyenne, Wyo., and Omaha, Nebr. At the last-named place Mr. Harriman stated in the presence of committee and officials of the railroad company that he realized it was necessary for capital to combine and organize. He therefore could not see why the same privilege should be denied the working class. At that time, December 16, 1903, he made the suggestion to the committee that he thought it would be advisable for all employees on what were termed Harriman lines to have an organization of their own, and when any change in policy was contemplated by the railroad company the employees should also be consulted in the matter. This was the idea the men had in mind in forming the Harriman federation. Such a statement coming from Mr. Harriman, then recognized as one of the foremost railroad men of the country, meant much to the employees working on the Harriman lines, and no doubt shows the foresight of the man at that time in recognizing that such an organization must or would be formed by the railroad employees. Therefore it is no wonder that regrets have often been expressed and statements made that if he were alive the present conditions on the Harriman lines would not exist.

The Harriman lines had their own organization of officials that would meet at various times at different cities on their line, at which time, no doubt, the cost of operation and amount of work done by employees in shops at the different points would be discussed and the policy outlined having to deal with their employees.

The pension rules of the Union Pacific Railway Co. dated January 1, 1903, rule 6, on page 6, reads as follows:

"The terms 'service' and 'in the service' refer to employment upon or in connection with any of the railroads owned or operated by the Union Pacific Railroad Co., Oregon Short Line Railroad Co., Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation Co., Southern Pacific Co., Central Pacific Railway Co., Southern Pacific Railway Co., Oregon & California Railroad Co., the Galveston, Harrisburg & San Antonio Railway Co., Texas & New Orleans Railroad Co., Houston & Texas Railway Co., Louisiana Western Railroad Co., and Morgan's Louisiana & Texas Railroad & Steamship Co., respectively, as well as upon or in connection with any line of railway now owned or operated by this company, and the service of any employee of either of said companies shall be considered as continuous from the date from which he has been continuously employed by said companies, or either of them, or by this company. Employment by said other companies shall be certified by the boards of pensions of said companies, respectively."

In view of the rules made by the officials of the Harriman lines, which covered all employees, the organization deemed it advisable to form a federation that would be in a measure able to cope with the organization of their employers, for in their experience in the past each craft working alone had been unable to secure redress of grievances or shop rules granted by part of the Harriman lines to some systems while denied to the employees working under the same jurisdiction of officials. For instance, shop employees when applying for a position were required to undergo physical examination by company doctors on some parts of the system, costing applicant $1. while on others it was not required. After many conferences and large expense to the different organizations the practice was finally abolished.

At different times committees representing the machinists endeavored to secure agreements from the officials of the Oregon Short Line and the Oregon Railway & Navigation Co. similar to those granted to the employees of the other Harriman lines, and until October, 1909, they were unsuccessful. At this time and in order to secure consideration it was necessary for the machinists to take a strike vote and deliver an ultimatum to the officials. After the matter had been carried to the vice president and general manager of those systems, and before agreements were secured, part of the men on the Oregon Short Line did leave their work.

Whether it was the policy of these roads to increase expenses of the committees, or for other reasons, although the employees were all under the jurisdiction of the same general manager and superintendent of motive power, committees were refused conferences unless committee was divided. At one time in Salt Lake City it was necessary for machinists' committee to be divided in three sections, the Oregon Short Line having part of the Union Pacific and part of the Southern Pacific under their jurisdiction. As these parts of the system were under the management of the Oregon Short Line officials, it meant that the machinists at that time employed at Evanston, Wyo., for the Union Pacific, and from Ogden, Utah, to Reno, Nev., employed by the Southern Pacific, had no voice or say in the shop rules they were compelled to work under. Officials at Salt Lake City would give them nothing only what had been signed by committees at Omaha, Nebr., and at San Francisco, Cal. The officials of the railroads would not meet or treat with them at those points for the reason they were under the Oregon Short Line management. The same conditions prevailed on the Oregon Railway & Navigation system, though there we were only compelled to have the two committees.

Such actions on the part of the railroad officials practically forced the employees to form into federations in order that they would eventually be in a position to deal with the highest officials of the Harriman lines.

Machinists of the Harriman lines met in Sacramento, Cal., April 10, 1911. Committees were also there from the boiler makers' and blacksmiths' organizations, while the carmen were holding a meeting similar to the machinists. Arrangements were there completed to hold a meeting in Salt Lake City on June 5, to which all organizations were requested to send delegates for the purpose of forming a federation on the Harriman lines. The Southern Pacific officials seemed opposed to this meeting, for transportation was denied delegates of the different organizations, they consequently having to pay railroad fare, about 25 in number, contrary to all former practices. A committee waited on Oregon Short Line officials in an effort to secure return transportation, after leaving a list of names, were requested to return the following day, when they were informed that no transportation would be issued unless requested by the road employing the men.

At this meeting about 100 delegates and grand lodge officers were in attendance. Laws were adopted and agreement drawn up to be submitted to the Harriman lines. The secretary of the federation authorized to give railroads 30 days' required notice in accordance with provisions in agreements then in force between the railroads and the organizations that had them.

Proper officials of the craft organizations also to give the notice for their respective crafts and ask for joint meetings at the same time. To the best of my knowledge same was done, as the following correspondence will show on behalf of the machinists—the same letter being sent to the following superintendents of motive power: Mr. C. E. Fuller, U. P. R. R., Omaha, Nebr.; Mr. J. F. Dunn, Oregon Short Line, Salt Lake City; Mr. J. F. Graham, Oregon Railway & Navigation Co., Portland, Oreg., dated at Denver, Colo., between June 28 and June 30, 1911:

"DEAR SIR: In accordance with present shop rules and regulations governing machinists and apprentices, 30 days' written notice are required to be given the other party when a change is desired.

"I have been instructed by the members of our organization working under your jurisdiction to notify you that a change is desired, and that later a new schedule will be submitted to you in our behalf.

"As the present shop rules of all crafts are now nearly identical, we believe that a conference between yourself and representatives of the different crafts should be held jointly.

"I am therefore requested to ask for a joint conference of all crafts on behalf of the machinists, and believe that by such a conference time will be saved you as an official of the company.

"Awaiting your reply, I am,

"Yours, respectfully,

"SAMUEL H. GRACE,
"Machinists' Representative, District 11, Room 403,
"Bee Building, Omaha, Nebr."

To which the following replies were received:

OREGON SHORT LINE RAILROAD CO.,
Salt Lake City, July 15, 1911.

Request from machinists for meeting.

MR. SAMUEL H. GRACE,
Machinists' Representative, District 11, 403 Bee Building, Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: Acknowledging receipt of yours of the 11th I am not in position just at this time to say when I can meet committee of machinists relative to changing their agreement, and so forth, but think no doubt that before the end of the month I can advise you as to the date when I can meet them.

Yours, truly,

J. F. DUNN.

OREGON SHORT LINE RAILROAD CO.,
Salt Lake City, July 22, 1911.

In re: Request for conference, machinists.

MR. SAMUEL H. GRACE,
*Machinist Representative, District 11,
Room 403, Bee Building, Omaha, Nebr.*

DEAR SIR: Referring to yours of June 29, and my reply thereto of the 15th instant. If the machinists' committee desire a conference with me, I will arrange to meet them here on August 3, but can not meet them in a joint conference of all crafts, but will continue to meet them as a separate organization, as we have been doing heretofore.

Yours, truly,

J. F. DUNN.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD CO.,
Omaha, July 29, 1911.

MR. SAMUEL H. GRACE,
403 Bee Building, Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of June 30 received, and in reply would advise that if a committee of machinists desire to meet me to discuss the machinists' working rules I will be very glad to arrange for a meeting with such committee as in the past, but can not accede to the request to meet with other crafts at the same time.

Yours, truly,

C. E. FULLER,
Assistant General Manager.

OREGON-WASHINGTON RAILROAD & NAVIGATION CO.,
July 3, 1911.

MR. SAMUEL H. GRACE,
403 Bee Building, Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: This is to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 28th ultimo, and wish to advise you that until such time as we are presented with a copy of demands it will not be possible for us to arrange a meeting. This inasmuch as we have had no complaint nor request from our own employees that would indicate that they are dissatisfied with the present agreement.

Yours, truly,

J. F. GRAHAM,
*Assistant General Manager,
For and in the Absence of the General Manager.*

Believing that the railroad officials should be furnished with a copy of the proposed agreement in order that they might familiarize themselves with same before expiration of the 30 days' notice, the following letters were sent:

OMAHA, NEBR., July 19, 1911.

MR. J. F. GRAHAM,
Asst. Gen. Mgr. O. W. R. R. & N. Co., Portland, Oreg.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find copy of new schedule submitted for your consideration in behalf of the machinists of the Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation Co.

This same schedule will be submitted to all of the allied lines of the so-called Harriman systems in behalf of the machinists employed by them and practically the same schedule, outside of rule 4 (definition of work), by all other shop crafts.

In view of the above, we therefore trust that you can see your way clear to grant us all at this time a joint conference, and that by so doing it will give better satisfaction to all concerned and also be a saving of time and expense to all parties.

Realizing that our 30 days' notice does not expire until August 1, I also realize that you, as the company's representative, should be furnished with the proposed schedule prior to going into conference with any committee, in order that you may familiarize yourself with all requests made, and it is with this idea in mind that I am at present inclosing copy.

Awaiting your reply, I remain,
Yours, respectfully,

S. H. GRACE.

OMAHA, NEBR., July 19, 1911.

Mr. C. E. FULLER,

Ast. Gen. Mgr. U. P. R. R., Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find copy of the new schedule submitted for consideration in behalf of the machinists of the Union Pacific Co. "S. H. GRACE."

I also desire at this time to submit a pamphlet, dated Omaha, Nebr., August 28, 1911, signed by Mr. C. E. Fuller, assistant general manager of the Union Pacific Railroad Co.; a pamphlet, of the same date, from the Omaha Business Men's Association, in which the proposed agreements are discussed pro and con; and also a copy of the agreement as proposed by the machinists' organization, which I desire to submit to be incorporated in the record.

(The pamphlets here presented and described by the witness were both in printed form. The agreement referred to appears among the exhibits as Grace Exhibit.)

Acting Chairman LENNON. Now, is that the preliminary matter that you desire to submit?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Now, did you make a special investigation of the conditions on the Union Pacific or the Oregon Short Line?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Well, tell us the conditions that you found. I suppose this investigation was made after this strike took place.

Mr. GRACE. The investigation was made quite a time after the strike took place. It was along in the year 1914 that this investigation was made. It was practically in regard to the character of the men that were imported, and was such as the effect on business, the effect on our men, and so forth. I might state, as a general rule, that the character of the men imported by the Union Pacific, I presume, were about of the same class as those imported on the other lines, as it seemed no doubt some arrangements had been made whereby the men were gathered up from the East and probably located here in the city of Chicago, and then distributed over the lines; for our pickets in picketing talked to some of the strike breakers, and were informed that when they were hired in the East they really did not know where they were to be sent, whether they were to be sent to the Illinois Central or to the Harriman lines. Some claimed they were hired for one place, and would be sent to another. This is best described by saying that this class of imported men—there is no question but that they were of a low character, the majority of them, the first that they shipped in. They seemed to have cared more for the ride they had secured from the company, in place of being able to do the work. While we have not had the trouble on the Union Pacific that they did on the Illinois Central, I can discuss that, being more familiar with it than with the balance of the Harriman lines. We have not had the trouble on the Union Pacific that they have had on the Illinois Central. The strike over there seemed to be conducted along fairly peaceable lines, and no doubt a good deal of it was through the fear, possibly of some of the so-called noted guards that were in charge—Union Pacific guards—at some of the points along the line. It is a well-known fact that the State of Wyoming, in particular, is noted for the "bad men" that they have all over the country. I have in mind several at different places—so-called noted gunmen and bad men of the West. One man in particular by the name of C. E. Horton, who was in charge of the company guard at Laramie, Wyo. He killed another one of the guards at that point. No prosecution was ever made, and he was transferred over here on the Illinois Central. There was another man by the name of Charley Irwin, of Cheyenne, Wyo., who was employed in some kind of position, industrial agent or something of that kind, who was also instrumental in gathering guards and strike breakers for the Union Pacific.

No doubt you are aware of the fact that General Manager Park is from the Union Pacific and Mr. Keillher, chief special agent for the Illinois Central, is also from the Union Pacific. It may be on account of trouble they had over here. They may have thought some of these men were necessary. Now this man Irwin sent a man by the name of Hugh Clark, he was used as one of the guards at Burnside, and another man I have named also by the name of Bill Lewis—they called him "Negro Bill Lewis" in the West. He was in charge of the guards at Evanston, Wyo. He became mixed up in an altercation or fracas with a brakeman. Some brakeman was going down the yard to his caboose or something, and Lewis set on him and beat him up very severely, and for quite a time they didn't think he was going to live. The trainmen's organization got busy and had a warrant sworn out for Mr. Lewis, but the city officials at Evanston, Wyo., made no effort to serve this warrant. Lewis, however, was transferred from Evanston to Green River, Wyo., the division east, and he later on got into some trouble there, I don't recall just what it was at this time; but he was also transferred over to the Illinois Central, and was eventually killed, I think, at Centerville, Ill., either by another Illinois Central guard or by a United States marshal. And that seemed to be the character of the guards through that section of the country. They seemed to be more obnoxious—made themselves so. And it was probably on account of the reputation they had—one storekeeper in Rawlins, Wyo., by the name of F. J. Keefe at one time went on a rampage and killed a couple of citizens, and served four years in the penitentiary, which was located at that point, and was paroled or pardoned out of the penitentiary. At the inception of the trouble he was one of the guards in the city of Rawlins, and within the last six months he went on another tear, as the saying is out there, and shot up the place. That seemed to be the character throughout that section.

On the eastern end we did not have so much trouble, with the exception that at Omaha the character of the man that was first employed in charge of guards, I believe the company soon realized what he was. He was an expoliceman. His name was Mike Cronos, and he was in charge of the company guards; and I believe he was finally discharged for drinking. Anyhow, he was placed in the sanitarium across the river, and the statement came out in the newspapers that he was transferred to Cheyenne, Wyo. After he was discharged, his brother, Fred, was placed in charge of the guards. He also was discharged by the company and was arrested by the city police and fined in police court, I believe, $25 and costs, for accepting money from the women of the streets; and I believe he was promptly discharged by the company.

Those were the only two that we had to contend with on the eastern end, to any extent.

Acting Chairman LENNON. The documents you submitted, did they show whether or not your System Federation met out there and attempted to secure conference to bring about an adjustment of the matter before the strike took place?

Mr. GRACE. The correspondence I submitted simply shows the correspondence that was taking place between officials or the superintendent of motive power and assistant general manager, as their title then was, in the majority of cases, and myself as representative of the machinists' organization; and in that correspondence we, as the machinists, asked for a joint meeting with the officials, and later on submitted a copy of the proposed agreement, and in that correspondence stated that the agreement submitted would be practically the same as that that would be submitted by all crafts with the exception of rule 4, which was the definition of work; and their replies thereto, which were that—from some of them—that they would meet these craft organizations, but refused to meet us jointly. And the matter was then turned over to our grand lodge officers, and I presume they are qualified to testify—

Acting Chairman LENNIX. Do you know about the number of men that were involved in this strike on the Harriman lines? Have you that information?

Mr. GRACE. No. To the best of my knowledge, taking the Illinois Central, as we figure between ten and eleven thousand men on the Illinois Central, I should presume that there was in the neighborhood of 20,000 to 22,000 men on the Harriman lines.

Acting Chairman LENNIX. What effect has the strike apparently had on the part of the country with which you are familiar on the business of the communities? Do you know anything about that?

Mr. GRACE. Well, that is a hard question to answer, for the simple reason that in a number of smaller points—division points, as they are termed—there is practically no competition with the Union Pacific, and practically the only industry located at those small towns is the railroad. So, as a consequence, when the men left their work, the organizations paying them what benefits they did, certainly had an effect on the business of those smaller towns. And at the inception of the strike there were many complaints made in the towns in western Nebraska and there were newspaper reports of shortage of coal, and so forth. It seemed to be the general proposition that the men did not have the money, and the majority of these smaller towns are, you might say, practically dependent on the pay roll of the corporation.

Acting Chairman LENNIX. Commissioner O'Connell desires to ask you some questions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Grace, as the result of the trouble on the road you presented a request to the officials of the Harriman lines to meet your organizations as a federation?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There was no agreement presented asking for changes of wages, was there, at that time?

Mr. GRACE. Not when the notice was served. Later on, prior to the expiration of the 30 days' notice, a proposed agreement was submitted to the Harriman lines.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The original request was simply presented asking them to meet you as the joint committee.

Mr. GRACE. No; it was serving 30 days' notice on the company—on the Harriman lines, I am speaking of.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Serving a 30 days' notice.

Mr. GRACE. For a change in the agreement.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But you asked that the company meet you as a committee of the federation.

Mr. GRACE. As a joint committee.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Joint committee?

Mr. GRACE. Endeavoring to explain to them the time that had been wasted in going over the different agreements, and explaining why such and such rules should be uniform.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You presented the officials with a copy of the proposed agreement, then, at that time, did you, when the notice was given?

Mr. GRACE. No, sir. Notice was given, as I recollect it, on the 1st day of July. It had always been customary on behalf of myself, as representing the machinists' organization prior to the expiration of the 30 days as required in the contracts that were in force, to submit a copy of the proposed agreement to the officials of the company for the purpose that they would become familiar with what our organization was asking for and that no time be wasted when the day was set for conference. As a general rule, we always heard from the officials about the time the proposed agreement was submitted, setting a date. As I recollect it now, this proposed agreement was sent by registered mail to the officials of the Union Pacific, Oregon Short Line, and the Oregon Railway & Navigation Co. on July 19, 1911.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did they acknowledge receipt of that?

Mr. GRACE. Not of the agreement. The reply came shortly afterwards under date of about July 22, probably, or 24th or 25th, advising us that they would not meet us as a joint committee.

Acting Chairman LENNON. July 25 they notified you they would not meet you as a joint committee?

Mr. GRACE. Yes; somewhere along there.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was there any suggestion or counter proposition to meet you in any other way?

Mr. GRACE. The letter from Mr. Fuller as I recollect, stated that they would meet the machinists' committee, but not meet as a joint committee.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. These two circulars you have handed in for the record, one is dated Omaha, August 28, 1911, and headed "The following from the Omaha Press, including report of meeting of the Omaha Business Men's Association, held on Saturday, August 26, is published for the information of all concerned." This circular is published more than a month prior to the time the strike occurred?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the other circular is dated August 28, two days later than the date of that meeting, and is addressed to all shop employees of the Union Pacific Railroad Co., and is signed by C. E. Fuller, assistant general manager of the Union Pacific Railroad Co. One of those was issued by the business men of Omaha, and the other by the officials of the company. I notice in looking over them both they contain practically the same matter. There are 13 paragraphs in the first circular by the business men's association, outlying the demands made by the men. In the other circular the same material and same number of demands occur, except there are 13 in this and 12 in the business men's association pamphlet, covering exactly the same language. Have you any idea how these two circulars seem to be so similar, coming from such different sources?

Mr. GRACE. Well, I have, only in a general way. No doubt that circular—that was sent broadcast, and it was practically along the lines of publicity, as stated in Mr. Markham's statement, that also appeared in the public press in all the large papers just at that time. And at that time the grand lodge officers, the presidents of the organizations, and their representatives were on their way to San Francisco to meet Julius Kruttschnitt, who was then director of maintenance and operation. They met him about the 1st of September, or somewhere along there, and those were sent out or were in the mails while the representatives of the organization were on the way to Frisco to meet Mr. Kruttschnitt, as I recollect. I know I was in Frisco when they were sent out.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. This statement appears in the circular issued by Gen. Manager Fuller, in the first paragraph: "It is demanded that the Union Pacific Railway Co. shall no longer treat directly with its own employees"; did you make any such demand as that on the company, that they should not treat with their own employees?

Mr. GRACE. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then, that is a misleading statement?

Mr. GRACE. I should judge so. I do not want to take up too much time in discussing the propositions submitted there. It has been the practice in the past in conferences with the officials of the different railroad companies that in order to get to discuss any matter that is proposed it must be incorporated in the proposed agreement, and, as a general rule, the agreement that is proposed or sent in to the officials of the railroad company is not recognizable at the conclusion of the conference with those officials, but in order to get to discuss all matters they must all be incorporated. That has been the way in the past and probably is yet.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You do not quite get the point that I am trying to make. This statement is issued to the shop employees of the Union Pacific and is signed by the assistant general manager, Mr. Fuller, and in the very first line it says, speaking of the demand that the men made upon the company by presenting their agreement, "It is demanded that the Union Pacific Railroad Co. shall no longer treat directly with its own employees." Now, did the proposed agreement you presented, or any other demands you made upon the company, contain anything that would prevent the company from dealing with its own employees?

Mr. GRACE. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then, this first statement in this circular issued is not in accordance with the facts?

Mr. GRACE. No, sir; I notice in glancing over those pamphlets that everything is headed as "demands." There were no demands.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The point I am trying to make is whether you made a request, or whether your agreement, if signed as you had presented it, would have prevented the Union Pacific Railroad Co. from dealing with its own employees?

Mr. GRACE. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And in negotiating the agreement it would have been negotiated with its own employees?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And they would have been dealing with committees from their own shops?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And if the agreement had been signed as presented, that would not have prevented them from dealing with their own employees?

Mr. GRACE. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It seems to me that there was an effort made to confuse or mislead some one as to your purposes and intentions.

Mr. GRACE. These pamphlets were sent to all business men and also to the employees in the operating department.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And I notice that appears in the circular issued by the Business Men's Association of Omaha, that you made a demand upon them which would prevent the company from treating with its own employees; as a representative of the organization upon that system, you were an employee of the Harriman lines?

Mr. GRACE. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And had not quit or been discharged when you accepted a position representing the men?

Mr. GRACE. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You were simply off on furlough?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir; simply off on furlough with transportation; I was granted annual transportation.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. By the company?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And you were in a position to return to the service of the company at any time you wanted to?

Mr. GRACE. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And you would not have lost your rights in any way by being out of the service?

Mr. GRACE. I presume not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So you were considered an employee of the Harriman lines when you were negotiating for the men?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that applied to all of the other representatives of the other organizations?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It applied to the transportation men in the same way?

Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir; all general chairmen practically.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you any idea as to what interpretation the Interstate Commerce Commission has put upon representatives of these organizations who are employed by their men to represent them?

Mr. GRACE. The general interpretation—it seems, after the amendment, I believe in 1907 the antipass law was amended, the Hepburn Act—there seemed to be quite a difference of opinion and as I had been general chairman of the machinists on the Union Pacific, there was a question about granting the transportation, notwithstanding that in our contract with the company—our understanding—it stated I was an employee of the company, and yet, in endeavoring to straighten that idea out, I was compelled to return to work, and I appeared on three pay rolls I think, or something like that, in the year 1907 or 1908. And I worked a short period in each month and was then granted further leave of absence and resumed my old position; but the general interpretation placed on the granting of such transportation by the Interstate Commerce Commission has been that they have been considered employees of the company and are entitled to transportation for themselves and for their families.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does that agreement contemplate the unionizing of the shops?

Mr. GRACE. I do not recall just now the different articles in the agreement.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You spoke of attending a conference in New York several years prior to the present strike in the matter of adjustment of a former strike occurring on the Union Pacific road?

Mr. GRACE. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. At which conference, which was held in the office of Mr. Harriman—E. H. Harriman—then president of the road, and of meeting him later at two or three points on the Union Pacific road, his general suggestion that the men get together so that they might deal in the larger unit as they had formerly done. Do you recall at that conference in New York Mr. Harriman's suggesting it would be better if the men should select some representative to represent them all so that an adjustment could be made for a long period of time for the affairs, so there would not be any possibility of strikes for at least a year that might be handled by several men representing all the employees in the shops?

Mr. GRACE. He made a suggestion along those lines when he made the statement, as I recall now, that that was the first labor trouble that he had been mixed up in or interested in, and so far as he was concerned it would be the last. At that time, if you recall, he entered into a discussion of the merits of compound engines, and so forth, and went on about merits of such engines.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is all.

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Grace, at the time this circular referred to by Commissioner O'Connell, issued by Mr. Fuller, you say the matter was out of your hands. I understood you it was entirely in the hands of the grand officers and they were on their way to Frisco to meet Mr. Kruttschnitt at that time?

Mr. GRACE. The general officers were on their way to San Francisco and I had been instructed to be there with them.

Commissioner AISHTON. And this entire matter had been turned over to them?

Mr. GRACE. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. For adjustment?

Mr. GRACE. It was in the hands of the grand lodge officers.

Commissioner AISHTON. So that Mr. Fuller's circular was correct in the statement made in that paragraph that the matter was being handled by other than employees of the system?

Mr. GRACE. No. I would like to take exception to that statement. It was being handled, temporarily, by the international officers of the organization—but it was for the purpose of bringing the two parties together. It was not for discussion of the contents of the proposed agreement or anything of that kind.

Commissioner AISHTON. Oh, I misunderstood your former testimony on that to that effect. You had turned that matter over to the grand officers?

Mr. GRACE. In turning the matter over to the grand lodge officers, that was done for the purpose of bringing about a conference.

I might explain a little further, that as the Harriman lines were constituted at that time it seemed—the statement has been made they were something like scrambled eggs—they were divided and subdivided into so many different sections. It was for the purpose of bringing in some of the higher officials with authority who could deal for all of them. That was the purpose of turning the matter over to the grand lodge officers. It was not really out of the hands of the employees after the conference was secured.

Acting Chairman LENNON. You mentioned that at Omaha Mr. Harriman stopped and you had a consultation with him in the car. I wish you would state so that we may get it in the record who was with you representing the men and who was there with Mr. Harriman representing the company, as nearly as you can recall; you may not remember everyone, but you certainly can remember part of them.

Mr. GRACE. Well, present with Mr. Harriman was Mr. W. R. McKeen, jr., superintendent of motive power. With the committee of machinists was George W. Smith, who is living in Council Bluffs, Iowa, at the present time; a machinist by the name of A. S. Mildred, who is dead, I am sorry to say; and myself.

There was a committee of three in the Omaha conference. There was a committee of three in the conference at Cheyenne. I will give you the names of those if you want them. I have them.

Acting Chairman LENNON. If you can name them, name them also.

Mr. GRACE. At Cheyenne, Mr. William Nyland was representing the company along with Mr. Harriman.

Commissioner AISHON. What is his position?

Mr. GRACE. Master mechanic; G. H. Tomlinson, George Harris, W. R. Junk was, I think—I don't remember the machinists' committee. I wouldn't be positive about Junk.

Acting Chairman LENNON. That is all, Mr. Grace, unless you desire to submit any further statement.

Mr. GRACE. No; there is nothing; matters then being left in hands of grand lodge officials for future action.

Acting Chairman LENNON. You will be excused, then.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN G. TAYLOR.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Give the stenographer your name, for fear we did not call it right.

Mr. TAYLOR. John G. Taylor; residence, Oakland, Cal. Entered the service of the Wabash as machinist apprentice in 1888 in Springfield, Ill. I have worked almost continuously since that time on western railroads, among them the various Harriman lines. I was elected business agent of the machinists upon the Southern Pacific, Pacific & Atlantic system, the Houston & Texas Central systems in May, 1909.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Did you make any special investigation of the conditions on these lines?

Mr. TAYLOR. I did.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Just tell us as briefly as you can and cover the subject—what you found to be the conditions.

Mr. TAYLOR. I should like—

Acting Chairman LENNON (interrupting). Talk as loud as you can. Don't be afraid to use your lungs.

Mr. TAYLOR. I haven't got much. I caught a cold since I landed in the Windy City.

I would like to make a very, very brief statement as to the causes that led up to the formation of the System Federation on those lines in my territory.

Acting Chairman LENNON. All right.

Mr. TAYLOR. The story told by Mr. Grace is generally accepted in all that territory which covers roughly about 10,000 miles and about 10,500 shop men. It is accepted, and so is the statement Mr. Harriman made that he hoped at some time the representatives of all the men would deal with all lines. It was generally accepted as true.

Another statement made to the machinists, blacksmiths, and boiler makers' representatives at different times by Mr. H. J. Small, at that time general superintendent of motive power on the Southern Pacific, both of its systems, now retired, that he hoped at some time or other the men would all come at once and they would not spend the whole year taking up his time and others also.

The schedule generally, the district that I represented and of which Mr. Grace and myself were the business agents, was combined in one, the first to combine along that line. If I remember correctly, district 11, machinists, that is the Harriman lines, held its first real session in 1907, or along about that time.

Schedules were drawn up separately. And in 1907 the machinists of the Pacific system—I want to make a slight digression, the Southern Pacific and the Pacific systems comprise those lines from Portland, Oreg., to Los Angeles and from San Francisco to Ogden; the Atlantic system, as it is generally known, comprises the G. H. & S. A. and some subordinate lines; the T. & N. O., the M. L. & T., and the L. & W. railway.

The Houston & Texas Central comprises the Houston & Texas Central proper, the Houston, East & West Texas Railways, and all of these railways have within them more corporations, about 25 or 30.

On neither of the systems under my jurisdiction, I mean on all the systems the machinists having schedules, all of them combined in one district, the boiler makers also, and later I believe the blacksmiths and the sheet metal men had none on any of the systems that I know of unless it was the Houston & Texas Central.

The carmen had no schedule upon the Southern Pacific proper or the Pacific system. They had a very fair schedule on the Houston & Texas Central.

The main causes—that is, the mental attitude of the men, and I believe I am as familiar with that as any man can possibly be, having been up and down those lines for the past six years and personally acquainted with all of the men at some time or other—the schedule of the machinists generally upon the Pacific system was considered fair except so far as the seniority clause was concerned—that is, its rate of pay was good—the schedule upon which the Atlantic system, the H. & T. C. was considered good so far as shop conditions—I believe a little above the average—but the rate of pay was 3 to 4 cents below the rate of pay in that territory.

In 1909 we began a conference with the officials; that is, the motive power officials on the Atlantic system, and the H. & T. C. That extended along from the fall of 1909 until along in April, 1910, if I remember correctly, and the machinists got a 3-cent raise, and I believe the boiler makers at that time also had a change.

That left three points, Houston, San Antonio, and Algiers, all intermediate points between Ennis, Tex., 1½ cents behind the rate of pay, for my craft to that of competing territory. In other words, the man who sat in the same local in Houston and San Antonio and Algiers from their railways like the I. & G. N. and the T. P. were getting 42 cents an hour, and my men were getting 37 or 37½, something like that.

In 1910 we gained 3 cents, leaving us a cent and a half behind at that time. The machinists on the Pacific system were held what to our law was an illegal convention. We never called it as such, because there was going to be some more consideration upon the seniority clause in the—and absolute violation of the seniority clause and the hospital question and the spotter system.

The seniority clause—I am not going to burden the commission with any great story of it, but simply tell one story or perhaps two that illustrates on the Pacific system.

I want to say for the Atlantic system that we never had any trouble along that line outside of the Houston & Texas Central.

I hope I will be pardoned for using a personal reference, because I can tell my own story best. I went to work in the Oakland shop, and I have been working with the Southern Pacific on more than one occasion, in the fall of 1907, and I want to show conditions.

I did not go into Oakland to go to work there. The master mechanic and the general foreman and the gang boss under whom I worked were men whom I had worked many times, and in the language of the street were partners of mine. They asked me to go to work. That was the time the Pacific system got the 3-cent raise over and above all the other Harriman—I mean the machinists on the Pacific system, which afterward caused a good bit of trouble. I think I had been in the service at that time about six or seven weeks when there came a lay off and two men who had been in the service of the company for a long time, named Dwelley and Fredericks, men who were counted extraordinarily first-class mechanics, were laid off. It was common report among the men they had had got in bad with a particular spotter. At any rate I was kept. I was not laid off. After a good bit of trouble of our shop committee Dwelley and Fredericks and some others were reinstated.

Again, in 1908, in the same shop, as was general all over the system, there was a heavy reduction made, I think only in our shop, about 19 of our craft were kept in the roundhouse.

I went to work for the Du Pont Powder Co. at Paola; had a good situation. The gang boss came to me one night when I came into Oakland from Paola—Paola is a short distance out of Oakland—and said for me to go to work. I refused, because I knew that men who had antedated me in seniority—some of them 30 years—were still out. But I think it was two or three weeks before I really did go in, because it occurred to me that some were men that never could go back to their jobs. A man that took my place—I went to work in the West Oakland shops. In the lodge room afterwards; that is, in my own union, the talk came up that the most outrageous thing that had ever happened, because we were hired with this understanding that the seniority right, so far as transportation and pensions were concerned, they still had. But no other seniority rights did they have. In simple language I am giving it now, not absolutely, but as near as I can recall, that I was a boomer, counted as a boomer in the shop, had only been there perhaps seven or eight months all told, and was antedated in seniority by about 100 or 100 men who had been there 30 or 40 years. That was all over the Pacific system.

In 1909 I was elected business agent to fill the unexpired term. We had some six or seven business agents and none of us were ever recognized as chairman. I think I was recognized longer than anybody else, 70 days, and we had some general correspondence over that.

On the spotter system it is so bad in California that at the last legislature, that is the one preceding the present one, the transportation organizations, backed up by all the other labor unions of California, brought in an anti-spotter bill. It failed of passing. The present legislature has an anti-spotter bill that when I left there had been so amended that it was practically worthless. Its history right now I do not know. I have not been able to ascertain. But the effect of that upon the minds of the employees was bad.

For instance, I have had my union built up only to have it torn down. I will tell that further story where the spotter seniority business did come up and that will end it.

In this convention which the machinists held, and which I spoke of as being practically illegal according to our district law at Rosevale, the young man by the name of Beck—Rosevale is what is called a boomer town, one that comes and goes all the time. I had rebuilt that lodge; I don't know how many times it was torn to pieces. I do not know what caused it, but something did. During the heart of the fruit rush when—and this is a mountain roundhouse, Rosevale is—when they needed everything that would turn a wheel, right after this convention, we had no conference, as a matter of fact refused a conference, as did the boiler makers and tinnerns. And on further evidence, I think I can not give it absolutely, but in a general way, notice was posted at 3 o'clock that they would go on 48 hours a week. I believe in 15 or 20 minutes thereafter that they would go on 40 hours a week. Then 28 men were laid off. That was the seniority effect. The rest of them were hired Monday morning. Mr. Beck was never.

When the tinnerns asked for a conference in 1909 I think they were refused; had a strike, and lost.

In 1910 the machinists on the Pacific system asked for a conference, and they got none.

The boiler makers asked for the same thing.

And the demand for a system federation became general. The carmen never did have the schedule on the Pacific system. I believe that Mr. Markham stated that they did not believe that they would ever strike. I want to say to you in my talk with our men our men never believed we would have to strike we never believed that to the last hour, we never believed it.

Three or four months elapsed during the strike before the men believed that they were up against a hard fight, because of the statement of Mr. Small to the boiler makers, to the blacksmiths, to the machinists, and I want to say to you it is ordinary human nature. Mr. Small always had the best reputation among the men as a general superintendent of motive power than all the other railroads I ever worked on, and the faith of the men was then and is now absolutely in him. They also had faith in the statement of Mr. Harriman.

After this strike took place the effect of the spotter system was very apparent to some of our organizations.

At one of our particular points, I would like to mention Sacramento, the boiler makers are said to be 100 per cent strong. Their organization was crushed like a shell within three months after it began. The foreman out there was a notorious money lender and a very wealthy man, said to be. I do not know him. In the language of the streets, as we say, he had his fingers in most all the boiler makers in that union; that is, he had loaned them money to build houses and things like that.

I have made a general investigation of the effects, and I do not want to take up the time of the commission very much, but I believe I could give it.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Will you tell us, before you leave that question, who were the spotters, the machinists, or blacksmiths, or the men employed in some other capacity; do you know anything about it?

Mr. TAYLOR. It is a general question that can not be absolutely proven, only here and there, and then only by inference. I have had a great deal of experience in organizing the men of my own craft, and I might say this, as an opinion, that they generally work in trios—some of them I have in mind that I thought were spotters, who are now in the employ of the company as strike breakers. One is running a detective agency of his own at Sacramento; one of them in Portland, Oreg., was a leader of our picket lines, we happened to catch him with the goods on him. And their general idea was to—knowing the ordinary nature of the male sex, and that men follow leaders, for instance, now, in the lodge room—I say they would work in trios and as against each other, Jew against Gentile or Greek against barbarian; they would do it. Then there was another fellow who was a genuine good fellow, he never took any of our money himself, but he always wanted to spend it on smokers and little excursions. And then there was another fellow, that there is nothing in the English language to describe him exactly. He was a good fellow, but whenever anyone spoke of any movement he would point out the dangers in it; he was a "discourager." The man on the picket line in Portland, Oreg., turned in regular reports; he was also on our executive committee; that was after the strike. I will state, Mr. Lennon, that it is a generally recognized thing in California, at any rate, and I believe in Arizona, because I think both States have had up antispotter bills; the present antispotter bill is in the legislature of California at this time.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Do you want to tell anything more, Mr. Taylor?

Mr. TAYLOR. There is so much of it, still, I believe I am willing to turn it over to the commission, and think I can get through with it in 20 minutes.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Is it a written document?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Possibly you can put that in evidence; can you tell us some specific things as to the distribution of the men that went on strike? Are they in the same neighborhood, or, like on the Illinois Central, scattered all over the country?

Mr. TAYLOR. Scattered all over the country.

Acting Chairman LENNON. And have not remained at the place where they were when the strike took place?

Mr. TAYLOR. In our country there are places where it is absolutely desert territory and there is nothing but the shop, and at some of those places there are none, but in the larger towns they have not scattered quite so much, in such towns as Sacramento and San Francisco and Los Angeles, and so forth.

Acting Chairman LENNON. If you want to submit some parts of that, or want to read them, why, they will be heard all right.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am just going to submit a summary, just about a page and a quarter.

"Forty-four points were investigated. Seven thousand four hundred and eighty-two men came out on strike. A number probably equal to one-fifth of this trouble were laid off or quit just prior to the strike. About 16 division points were not investigated. These employed from 2 to 6 men. I believe that with one exception all of them struck. Their particular story could not be obtained in the time given to me."

I will state that this is a report to your department, and the matter will be submitted entirely—the entire matter will be submitted. [Reads:]

"On matters relating to the first question; the territory given to me is mainly desert, or at least not thickly populated. Small portions of it are agricultural, and but four towns, namely, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Oakland, and Portland, contain factories of any size whatever. Most of the cities have practically no industries but the railroad shops.

"On the second question, I have 14 cases of men with criminal records—speaking of the strike breakers who were caught—for whom there were warrants and whom were caught. Four hundred and forty-one cases of arrests for various misdemeanors that came directly under the notice of the strikers. In only one city could I get information from police-court officers, and I feel sure that my estimate is conservative to the last degree. There are 5 cases of scabs taking the bankruptcy act, and 495 cases of garnishee. This information also is given by strikers; and I am sure is exceedingly conservative. The general answer given to this question was about the excessive number that beat their bills, but as to whether many had been garnisheed or not, strikers appear to have little knowledge or care.

"One hundred and eighty children were taken from school. On this question strikers generally deliberately lie, undoubtedly from a sense of pride. The time limit given me would not justify my calling on school superintendents, and in many cases they were out of town, it being the summer vacation. The number given does not include those taken out temporarily because of the removal of their parents to other towns. If this number were counted it would undoubtedly run past the thousand mark.

"The fourth question shows that 1,069 families were forced to break up their homes. All of these can be easily verified. I have no record from Starbuck, a large shop, and the numerous places mentioned previously, which would undoubtedly add at least 50 cases to this number.

"On the fifth proposition 553 strikers were arrested, none of them for crime; there were but 20 cases of fines and all the rest were released.' Each case was for fighting, and the highest fine—that of O. L. Davis at San Jose, Cal.—was undoubtedly unjust."

In this case the charge was that a strike breaker had been beaten up, and the witnesses to that said that Davis, being an unmarried man, took the blame off of the shoulders of a married man who had actually beaten up the strike breaker. The man who did that was a trouble maker and was in the employ of the company only two weeks longer, and we were glad to get rid of him.

"Questions 6 and 7 can not be totalized. They apply to each particular locality and are so given.

"Question 8: One hundred and four children were put to work and 383 wives went to work. This number, I believe, falls ridiculously short of the real number, so far as the labor of wives and children is concerned. I am positive that some of the strikers lied to me, because I talked to the wives of men whom I knew had been at work and these men afterwards denied.

"There were 57 deaths, 4 suicides, 4 insane, 4 murders, and the loss of 10 homes are credited to the strike. The latter case I am sure is also short of the real number."

There is also the statement of a case I would like to read, just extracts from the investigation made at Bakersfield and Mojave.

"During October, 1911, three gunmen made an assault on two pickets, one picket was badly wounded. Shooting up the yards and the town by gunmen was a nightly occurrence for four months.

"During the evening of November 25, 1911, Railroad Policeman Oyster began beating Picket Reinhardt with his club. Reinhardt ran and hid in the rear of the Leader saloon. A small fight occurred on the street during the beating of Reinhardt. Policeman Oyster and four gunmen followed Reinhardt into the saloon, Gunmen Hardwick and Perry carrying guns in their hands. A small crowd followed them in. Perry and Hardwick began using clubs on the crowd indiscriminately. J. S. Coldereau, a striker, was at the bar before the fight began. Perry began shooting at Coldereau, hitting him five times, the last shot being fired into Coldereau's head as he lay dying on the floor, Perry remarking at the time, 'Take that, you s— of a b—'; I guess that will quiet you." Perry was arrested and charged with murder. Citizens of Bakersfield openly charged that Reinhardt, the principal witness, was paid by the S. P. Co. to leave the country. The district attorney, Mr. Irwin, was charged by the strikers of being an 'S. P. man.' and finally juggled the case out of court. Perry's case was called this summer, but was dismissed because Reinhardt, the principal witness could not be located.

"Reinhardt had been charged with resisting an officer. Bail was furnished by the treasurers of the different unions. When the treasurers of these unions saw how flagrant the case was, they demanded the return of the bail money after Reinhardt had left town, and the authorities, afraid to refuse, gave it to them.

"The whole affair is such a shameful travesty on justice that the authorities of California should investigate, and if they are unable to make Kern County comply with law and order, then the United States Government should take a hand."

I will read a part of the record at Mojave:

"About January 25, 1912, Ed Lafevre, a striking car inspector, was shot and killed, supposedly by an Indian mixed breed named Smith. On this occasion five or six gunmen were outside of the Owl saloon, and one shot at Lafevre came out of the door. Several of the guards were arrested, but no real attempt has ever been made to apprehend the murderer. Three of the gunmen who made this assault were given 30, 60, and 90 days, respectively, as being accessories. Smith left Mojave about 11 o'clock that night and is still at large. The guards made criminal assaults at the same time on Ernest Mayne, a companion of Lafevre."

Acting Chairman LENNON. Is that all, Mr. Taylor?

Mr. TAYLOR. The investigation in its entirety, at all the local points, is in this and it will be given to the commission.

(The paper so referred to appears at the end of this subject as "Taylor Exhibit.")

Acting Chairman LENNON. Mr. Taylor, it has been requested to ask you a couple of questions. Who were the witnesses that were paid by the Southern Pacific to leave town?

Mr. TAYLOR. Reinhardt; that is the general charge that was then in the newspapers in Bakersfield, Cal.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Your information is of a general character and not specific and of your own knowledge?

Mr. TAYLOR. As I stated in my statement, it was of a general character. I would like to add, that as to the return of the bail money, that is absolutely illegal; the bail money furnished by the treasurers of the unions was returned to the unions even after Reinhardt had left town.

Acting Chairman LENNON. You will be excused, Mr. Taylor.

TESTIMONY OF MR. J. W. KLINE.

Acting Chairman LENNON. State your name and business, please.

Mr. KLINE. I am president of the International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Will you state your experience and the experience of your organization doing business with the Illinois Central Railroad Co. and Harriman lines, if that is also covered by your experience, prior to the strike, as to making agreements with them; and a brief story of the experience of your organization doing business with these railroad companies?

Mr. KLINE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to read into the record a series of conferences and dates that I can not well keep in my mind, which will only take about 10 or 15 minutes.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Very well.

Mr. KLINE. I would like to say that the statement contained in the circular written by Mr. Fuller and quoted by Commissioner O'Connell—that the men were demanding that others would confer with the company hereafter instead of the employees—that in following my statement here you will see that such is not the case. [Reading:]

"A STATEMENT BY J. W. KLINE, GENERAL PRESIDENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BLACKSMITHS AND HELPERS.

"On June 11, 1910, we signed our last agreement with the Illinois Central Railroad. In negotiating that agreement our organization was represented by 19 delegates, and the contract was signed by a subcommittee of 5 with myself. The increase in rates for our organization at that time would possibly average about 1½ per cent. At some points we received 2 cents. At other points 1 and 1½ cents. About a maximum of 400 men involved, would mean about $6 an hour, and, if working eight or nine hours a day, would amount to $48 a day advance for the blacksmith department over the Illinois Central system and their allied lines. Some of the other crafts did not fare as well, and some possibly a little better than we did. It cost us $114 a day in negotiating this contract, for getting the advance of $50 a day. I am now speaking of the actual conferences and the days with the company officials, and not days put in with our own committees arranging our contract for presentation to the company. Sometimes our committees were sent home for a week, as the case may have been, and at other times the company would meet other committees, and keep one set of committees waiting.

"We concluded that it was a very expensive way of doing business. For some time our men, as well as the other crafts, were dissatisfied with the long-drawn-out conferences, and decided that a joint committee with less committee-men from each craft could accomplish the same purpose in possibly less time, and a great deal less expensive.

"The committees were called together in Memphis in May, 1911, to form a federation, principally for the purpose of economy as well as harmony. This was followed in June of the same year by the Harriman line employees. These federations received the sanction of the general officers of the different organizations involved. I, as a general officer, approved the Illinois Central contract of 1910, and signed it with Mr. Barnum, general superintendent of motive power.

9880 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

"Rule 21 reads as follows:

"The rules and rates as shown herein to become effective June 1, 1910, and remain in force until June 1, 1911, and thereafter, provided that after the first year changes may be agreed upon by either party giving 30 days' notice to the other of changes desired for conference.

"Accepted June 30, 1910.

"M. K. BARNUM,
"General Supt. of Motive Power.
"J. W. KLINE.
"S. J. OSTEN.
"J. L. EDWARDS.
"THOS. YATES.
"EDW. KING.
"CORNELIUS CASEY."

"You will note that after the first year 30 days' notice is to be given by either party desiring changes. Our craft desired to change, and that conference or federation organized, with the sanction of the general executives, elected a committee to notify the company of these changes. In other words, they were the authorized agents of their organizations to notify the company of these changes. I, as a general officer, was not notified by the Illinois Central officials of their dissatisfaction with this procedure until I received a letter from Mr. M. K. Barnum, August 25, 1911, in which he called my attention to that clause in our contract.

"All of the correspondence and statements made at this hearing to my mind is ample evidence that the strengthening of our separate crafts by federation is necessary to cope with a much stronger federation or combination.

"The offensive tactics of the railroad officials preceding a change of policy is usually worked out through their subordinate officials down to local foremen, and as a rule, if the unions are strong, these tactics are in the form of discriminations in the way of changing work on the men, showing personal preferences, breaking into the seniority rights, injecting personalities and in many other ways, which naturally create an unsettled feeling and discontent, breaking up the harmony of the shop, and in many instances making enemies among the men, causing such friction that many times we have what is known as the union men and the company men. After the strength of the union is broken our contracts can be violated without much fear. Shop committees are powerless on account of the division among the men in the shops. This was the policy of the Union Pacific officials in 1902 before they introduced the premium system, which drove their employees out on strike in 1903 and 1904, in which I was involved, and some of the I. C. officials at present are from that system, and had started the same time study that the U. P. started.

"The general officers were thoroughly convinced some months before the present strike on the Illinois Central that the new management was going to introduce a different system of working in their shops. Complaints of a general nature came to my office from different points on the Illinois Central of an unrest among the men, they stating that the management seemed to be taking advantage of them in various ways where they could do so without an open and glaring violation of the contract. Finally, I began to receive letters asking my advice relative to filling out time-study cards, which the officials had insisted on them filling out. As time went by the feeling against this card system became more intense, and I was called upon to take the matter up with the company's officials. These protests came from various points, and one point in particular was Freeport, Ill., where I prevented a walkout by taking the matter up with Mr. Barnum, who stated that he would not insist, and that the men were unduly alarmed. This included, I believe, all the metal crafts.

"A general dissatisfaction and discontent was now prevalent, and the employees had about concluded that the only way to protect what they already had, and to carry on their future negotiations, was to federate the crafts, which was done in Memphis in May, 1911. This same course was pursued on the Harriman lines in June of the same year in Salt Lake City. Immediately after the formation of these federations, the proper railroad officials were duly notified of our action, therefore giving their companies ample time for the proper consideration of the proposed agreements submitted to them by their federated employees. The organization of these federations being authorized by the executive officers of the crafts involved, we considered the 30-day clause was covered, when our authorized representatives notified the management of the change desired. These negotiations were carried on with their employees until it became evident that the company's officials were not disposed to go along with us in our efforts to bring about harmony in the shop organizations. This includes harmonious relations between the company and our unions, and, finally, the general officers were requested by the committees to assist them. In fact, about the 1st of August there was a condition prevalent on both the Harriman and Illinois Central lines that looked serious. Many complaints of discriminations in various ways were flying thick and fast on the Harriman lines. The various general managers had refused to meet federated committees on these lines, as well as on the Illinois Central, and request came that the general officers confer with Mr. Kruttschnitt, the then general manager of maintenance and operation on the Harriman lines, if possible, for the purpose of adjusting the difficulty. I was in the East at that time with the president of the International Association of Machinists and the president of the International Brotherhood of Roller Makers, and the latter was requested to go to Chicago, where the meeting of the Illinois Central committees were in session, and, if possible, to arrange a meeting with Mr. Kruttschnitt. He failed to meet Mr. Kruttschnitt, but finally met Mr. Scott, one of Mr. Kruttschnitt's assistants, who, by the way, refused to meet anyone except Mr. Franklin. The conference between Mr. Scott and Mr. Franklin brought no results, but rather we were more thoroughly convinced in our own minds that the Illinois Central and Harriman lines were both going to attack our federation."

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was that W. B. Scott?

Mr. KLINE. I think it is; he was assistant to Mr. Kruttschnitt. [Continues reading:]

"I returned to Chicago August 19 and found an extremely serious state of affairs. There seemed to be at this time a series of discriminations in the form of reductions of force and an increase of hours on the Harriman lines, the building of high board fences around the shops, the hiring of extra policemen, the usual procedure before a strike. After a careful survey of all of these conditions, I decided to confer with Mr. Kruttschnitt, if possible, and therefore made arrangements to meet him in his office in Chicago the 24th of August.

"At that meeting with Mr. Kruttschnitt I explained to him the absolute facts regarding the conditions on the Harriman lines and the earnest efforts of the officers of the unions to avoid an open rupture between the company and their employees. I advised that a meeting with the federated committee, either by himself or his representatives would, in my opinion, bring about an amicable adjustment, and what he considered unreasonable wage increase or other unreasonable requests could be settled without much difficulty. He agreed with me that conditions were serious, but he had been instructed by the board of directors to ignore the requests for federated conferences, and that it was impossible for him to ignore the instructions of the directors. After a conference of an hour or an hour and a half he finally agreed to meet the general officers of the unions, but absolutely refused to meet a federated committee of his employees. Neither would he advise any of his subordinates to meet them as federated employees. This seems to be a new departure, as a rule—they would rather meet their own employees.

"Mr. Kruttschnitt left the city the same evening for a trip over the lines west. He agreed to meet the general officers anywhere along the lines or at San Francisco. After that meeting with Mr. Kruttschnitt later in the evening, I concluded that to be safe I would wire Mr. Lovett in New York, chairman of the board of directors. I therefore sent the following telegram:

"Mr. R. S. LOVETT,

"Pres. U. P. & S. P. R. R., 120 Broadway, N. Y.:

"As Mr. Kruttschnitt had left for the West, thereby making it impossible to meet him, and as the conditions are extremely serious in the mechanical department and men on the verge of a strike on Harriman lines, which we are trying to avoid, I therefore request that you meet the international officers of the crafts involved in an effort to bring about an amicable adjustment of the trouble. Please wire.

"J. W. KLINE,

"International President, 585 Monon Bldg., Chicago, Ill."

"The following day I received this reply:

"J. W. KLINE,

"585 Monon Bldg., Chicago, Ill.:

"Replying to your message received to-day: The position of our companies, as stated by the general managers and Mr. Kruttschnitt, was taken after conference with and approval by me, hence no reason for me to interfere. Moreover, Mr. Kruttschnitt wired me yesterday the substance of his interview with you, and as you understood then, he is on the lines and is conveniently accessible to any one in the West who desire to see him.

" 'R. S. LOVETT.

" '1.55 p. m.'

" 'I then wired Mr. Kruttschnitt as follows:

" 'JULIUS KRUTTSCHNITT,

" 'Vice President, General Manager Maintenance and Operation,
" 'Union Pacific and Southern Pacific.

" 'You stated to me that you were willing to meet the general officers in West. Will you please state time and place for that meeting.

" 'J. W. KLINE.'

" 'Received the following reply:

" 'J. W. KLINE,

" 'Chicago, Ill.:

" 'I expect to be in San Francisco until end or next week and can see you there at any time before Saturday, September 2.

" 'J. KRUTTSCHNITT.'

" 'I then wired the international officers of the machinists, boiler makers, carmen, and sheet metal workers that if agreeable we could meet Mr. Kruttschnitt in San Francisco on or before September 2. This was acceptable, and we arranged immediately and proceeded to that city. From Omaha I wired Mr. Kruttschnitt that we would meet him the following Thursday or Friday. We arrived in San Francisco on Wednesday, the 30th. On Thursday, the 31st, we met with our committees and arranged a date to meet Mr. Kruttschnitt on Friday, September 1. We met Mr. Kruttschnitt, Mr. Calvin, Mr. Small, Mr. Clancy, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Athearn. Representing our organizations were President Ryan, of the carmen, President Franklin, of the boiler makers, Vice President Buckalew, of the machinists, and myself. The conference lasted about two hours and a half, and everything was discussed that had any bearing on the case. It was apparent from the line of argument that Mr. Kruttschnitt had not changed his original position, and contended that the different systems of railroads were under different stockholders, and a federation of all systems would be an utter impossibility. His main objection was that it would place too much power in the hands of the federation, but was willing to treat each craft separately. We argued that it was not the policy of our federation to gather power enough to protect our various crafts, the same power would be applied to discipline our own organizations when it became necessary, and also maintain a harmonious shop organization. Mr. Kruttschnitt further stated that he was willing to continue his relations with the individual shop crafts and deal with them separately on the various lines of the system, basing a strong argument on the fact, that he could handle one craft at a time, but he could not handle them together. I lay special emphasis on the word 'handle.'

" 'During our conference and after Judge Clancy examined our federated constitution, Mr. Kruttschnitt made the statement that we were a combination and were in his office in violation of the law, intimating that a possible prosecution was in store for us for violating the Sherman Act. He denied that the railroad managers were federated, and stated that two managers were almost afraid to get together on the street lest they might be accused of being a combination.

" 'In the general discussion we naturally spoke of a possible strike with all of the hardships and suffering that goes with these industrial disturbances, and we appealed to Mr. Kruttschnitt to avoid this by meeting a federated committee of his own employees. We thought that possibly the appeal would reach the tender spot, but we were doomed to disappointment. Our conferences came to an end. However, before separating, we wanted to be further convinced as to the attitude of Mr. Kruttschnitt, and asked him a question in about the following manner: 'Mr. Kruttschnitt, we have discussed this matter of federation quite thoroughly. There seems to be but one obstacle in the way of our getting together, namely, federation. We have discussed the sufferings that would naturally accompany a strike. Do you still maintain your position that you will allow this to come about rather than meet a federated committee of your own employees?' His answer was 'I do. I have been advised of what the consequences will be.' This astounding statement was the most cold-blooded I ever heard.

"We made our report to the federation of the Harriman lines that was then in session, and we decided to call the general chairmen of all points on the line, numbering about 40, and place the matter before them. I was advised to get Mr. Kruttschnitt, and request transportation for the general chairmen to San Francisco. Mr. Kruttschnitt referred me to Mr. Calvin, general manager, and Mr. Scott, secretary of the federation, and myself, met with Calvin and arranged for these general chairmen to apply for transportation at their various home office. The transportation being granted in most cases, I believe, if not all, they all came to San Francisco on September 9.

"We placed the matter before them and discussed the strike situation from every angle, and by a unanimous vote they said they could not, and would not, stand for any further discriminations and humiliations from the subordinate officials of the company, and that they were representing the sentiment of the men who had previously voted to stand for federation.

"On September 11 the general officers left San Francisco by way of Los Angeles and separated and went various routes home. On September 25, with the other general officers, President Franklin of the boilermakers, Ryan of the carmen, and myself attended the convention of machinists in Davenport and laid the matter before that body. The result was that the machinists' convention decided to strike the Illinois Central and Harriman lines with the other crafts. We then sent the following telegram to Mr. Kruttschnitt, who was then in New York:

"DAVENPORT, IOWA, September 28, 1911.

"JULIUS KRUTTSCHNITT,

"Vice Pres. U. P. Ry. Co., 120 Broadway, New York City:

"We are officially instructed by our organizations to request you to agree to meet the representatives of the shop federations, or to notify you that we have no other alternative but to give our approval and permission to the men on the lines you represent to quit work. We will expect an answer so that we can arrange to meet you by noon Thursday next at Chicago for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements as above indicated. Send reply to Jas. O'Connell, Davenport Hotel.

"J. W. KLINE.

"M. F. RYAN.

"J. A. FRANKLIN.

"M. O'SULLIVAN.

"JAS. O'CONNELL."

"On the 27th received the following:

"JAMES O'CONNELL AND OTHERS,

"Davenport Hotel, Davenport, Iowa.

"Replying to your telegram of September 26, my presence here, of course, makes it impossible for me to meet you in Chicago Thursday noon.

"If the essentials of admittedly fair and considerate treatment, the payment of the highest wages of any road in the territory served by our lines, and the guaranty of hospital and generous pension benefits have not been sufficient to deter our shopmen from terminating agreements insuring these conditions made from time to time in conference with their labor unions and from spending four or five months in devising new issues and means to destroy existing harmonious relations, and moreover, are not sufficient to induce them to remain in our employ, and to make them realize their duty to the public, I do not see that we can do anything more to convince them that they have no good reason to stop work or to prevent you giving your approval and permission to them to leave our service.

"JULIUS KRUTTSCHNITT."

"Both positions being well defined, and the ultimatum issued, nothing was left for us to do but to call the strike, as per instructions of the rank and file.

"The statement that it was an illegal strike is absurd. The statement that the men did not know what they were doing and that they were not expecting a strike is ridiculous. The intense feeling among the men in regard to discriminations, and a clamor to have it remedied or strike, refutes the company's statement. The walkout at Memphis before the strike was called corroborates the statement that I am now making.

"The large percentage of the strike vote on the Illinois Central is evidence that they well knew what was going on, for negotiations had continued about three months at that time, and the further fact that they knew what they were doing is that in February, 1913, the general committee of the Illinois Central in St. Louis, unanimously rejected Mr. Park's proposition of a settlement.

"The American workingmen reserve the right to form any kind of an organization for their own protection, as long as it does not antagonize the law of our land or interfere with the legitimate business of another. This right has been recognized by the highest authorities.

"The employer may think we make mistakes sometimes in forming these organizations, and that may be true, but we have always shown a disposition, and in fact in this case an earnest effort was made to discuss our form of organization with the employer from our side of the table. Our efforts were unavailing, as the records show. The antagonism of the officials of the Illinois Central and Harriman lines was such that we were deprived of that privilege, and to our way of thinking the responsibility for this strike was thrown upon the shoulders of the railroad officials. Had that autocratic spirit that was so publicly displayed in purchased paid advertisements in the daily press been substituted by the American spirit of honest purpose and a square deal this strike would have been avoided."

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the letter that Mr. Barnum sent me on August 25, after the correspondence had been going on for about three months and the question of the 30-day clause had not been raised, it was surprising to me to have it raised at that late date.

I want further to say that there was reference made this afternoon in regard to the conference with Mr. Harriman, the predecessor of Judge Lovett as president of the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific. The former strike on the Union Pacific in 1903 and 1904 was settled as has been stated here. I was one that was selected with my predecessor to meet Mr. Harriman in his office in New York, and he made the statement at that time to us that the matter of collective bargaining was to be the form of doing business in the future, and that so far as he was concerned he never expected to have any more labor troubles on his railroad; and I often felt that it was a sad day for organized labor that Mr. Harriman died, for I believe if he had lived we would not have had this trouble.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Have you something more there that you desire to submit in advance?

Mr. KLINE. No, sir. I have some more data here that possibly later I may offer.

Acting Chairman LENNON. After the strike was called what, if any, efforts were made by the organizations involved or by their friends or by the Government to try to bring about conferences and attempts of settlement, if any such attempts were made at all?

Mr. KLINE. In January we appealed to President Gompers to intercede with Hon. Seth Low, chairman of the National Civic Federation of New York, and, if possible, to use his good offices with Judge Lovett and try to bring about a settlement of the strike. We were notified later that Mr. Low was unable to do anything with Mr. Lovett.

Then, on January 31, the general officers received a wire from Gov. Brewer of the State of Mississippi, asking us to meet him at his mansion on February 5, at 7.30 p. m. The general officers went to Jackson, Miss., and met the governor, and to this day we are at a loss to know just why we were there. The governor wanted the strike settled. If it could not be settled on the whole line of the road, he would like it settled in Mississippi; and if he could not get the strike settled in Mississippi he, at least, wanted the State militia removed from McComb City and Water Valley. He seemed to be between the devil and the sea. If he removed the militia he would offend the Illinois Central, and if he did not remove them he would offend the citizens of McComb. And he asked us to advise him to remove them. We, of course, could not do so and did not do so. Did not care to do so. It was not our business.

In our conferences with him he stated that he attended a meeting of the board of directors in New York City. I do not know who the directors were, or what road they represented, but he made a statement that the president or Chairman Yoakum of the Frisco Lines—he made the statement in that meeting and advised the other directors to fight a federation of railroad employees. Since that time we have organized a federation on the Frisco Lines.

On February 7 there was a gentleman came from New Orleans to Jackson and invited us to New Orleans to meet members of the cotton exchange. We went there and we laid our strike matter before them, and they, after hearing our case, wired to President Markham, of the Illinois Central, at Chicago and he came to New Orleans later. Also Mr. Kruttschnitt and Mr. Lovett, I understand, were there.

This conference, according to the chairman of the cotton exchange, was also without results. He so reported to us, in Mr. Markham's statement the other day before this body, that he had advised the president of the cotton exchange that it would be unwise to accede to the demands of the men and that the president of the exchange had agreed with him was not born out by the statement the president made to us. He was very sympathetic and assured us that we had a just grievance and hoped the strike would be settled.

On February 13, 1912, we met the Business Men's Association of Memphis.

Some one of the strikers invited us to stop off and he would get the business men's association together so that we could lay the matter before them; this was done and they were also sympathetic. However, they told us they did not see that they could do anything at that time.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Did you have any consultation with Prof. Neill, of the Labor Department? Was any effort made through that department to adjudicate the trouble?

Mr. KLINE. Yes, sir. I have not the data, Mr. Chairman, but an effort was made through the department and Mr. Neill used his good offices also the second time and failed.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Were you here when Mr. Wharton submitted his statement regarding the growth and development of the federation and the causes leading to it?

Mr. KLINE. Yes, sir.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Has his statement regarding that your approval?

Mr. KLINE. Yes, sir.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Any other statement you desire to submit, Mr. Kline?

Mr. KLINE. Mr. Bell, the general superintendent of motive power, was unable to give the rate of wages of the blacksmiths. If you desire, I will submit that.

Acting Chairman LENNON. All right. It does not cover that whole book, does it?

Mr. KLINE. Oh, no. But we have our matter bound each year and we print these contracts. Mr. Bell stated that the rate of the blacksmiths ran from 36 to 42 cents, I think. The rates run from 30 cents and some as low as 23½ up to 47½.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Is that the 1910 agreement?

Mr. KLINE. The 1910, the last agreement. There is only one man on the Illinois Central getting 47½; very few 44; a few 42½ and 40 and 39. And at the time of the strike I think 39 cents was the prevailing or going or hiring rate as they term it. The helpers run as low as 17½ cents; at the Burnside shops here in Chicago there are hammer boys that get as low as 13 and 10½ cents an hour, and in Louisiana, on the Illinois Central, where they were getting 39, across there in the same State, on the Texas Pacific they are getting 42, 3 cents an hour more.

Of course these low rates obtain at various points on the Illinois Central. I did not go over all of them, but the lowest and the highest ones.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Is that all you care to submit, Mr. Kline?

Mr. KLINE. I believe so.

(See supplemental statement of Mr. Kline at end of this subject.)

Acting Chairman LENNON. At this point the commission will stand adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock. Mr. Fuller will probably be the first witness called.

(At 4.30 in the afternoon of this Friday, April 9, 1915, an adjournment was taken until Saturday, April 10, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

CHICAGO, ILL., Saturday, April 10, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners Lennon, Aishton, O'Connell, Ballard, and Garretson.

Chairman WALSH. The commission will please come to order.

Mr. Kruttschnitt.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JULIUS KRUTTSCHNITT.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your name?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Julius Kruttschnitt.

Chairman WALSH. And your residence?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. New York.

Chairman WALSH. The particular address in New York?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. 165 Broadway.

Chairman WALSH. Your occupation, please?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I am at present chairman of the executive board of the Southern Pacific Co.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your experience as a railroad official, the positions you have held?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I started in 1878 as engineer in charge of construction of the Morgan, Louisiana & Texas Railroad in Louisiana; I occupied that position for three years, when I was made general road master; two years after that I was made division superintendent. In 1885 I was appointed assistant general manager of what was then known as the Atlantic system of the Southern Pacific Co. In 1889 I was appointed general manager. In 1895 I was appointed general manager of the Southern Pacific Co., both Atlantic and Pacific systems, and also after that elected fourth vice president of the company. In 1904 I was appointed director of maintenance and operation of the Union and Southern Pacific systems, with headquarters at Chicago. In 1913 I was elected to my present position.

Chairman WALSH. What was your position with the Harriman lines during the time of the shop strike which began September 30, 1911?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I was director of maintenance and operation; I had charge of the operation of the roads, maintenance and construction.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your experience prior to that time in dealing with what are known as the shop crafts?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Prior to September 30, 1911?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir; prior to the strike.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Both the Southern and Union Pacific had contracts with numbers of the shop crafts, I think four or five. It was the custom to meet the men whenever they desired to take up questions and discuss them. Up to that time everything had been harmoniously settled, and we had gotten along without any particular friction or trouble. We rather prided ourselves on our record, and up to as late as immediately preceding this strike our men told us that they had been properly treated and they had nothing to complain about.

Chairman WALSH. I have some detailed questions that I desire to ask you, Mr. Kruttschnitt, quite a number that have been submitted by what might be called the other side of the controversy, and the commission thought perhaps you might like to make a statement in a sense covering any observation you have to make upon the general subject of the inquiry, with which I believe, you are reasonably familiar—that is, with the scope of our inquiry.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. You mean generally covering my connection with the strike?

Chairman WALSH. Covering your connection and your ideas with respect to it and the reason for that position which the company has taken and such matters as that; it may save asking some questions.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Well, as stated, we had gotten along pleasantly with our men until a month or two preceding this strike. About May, 1911, we were informed that a meeting had been held at Salt Lake, at which different shop crafts had decided to federate and present their demands in a body. I think in June, or perhaps in July, the conclusions that this federation meeting had reached and the demands they proposed to make were presented to the different companies, the Union Pacific, the Southern Pacific, and the Short Line & Navigation Co. In the months of July and August requests were made by the men to jointly meet the motive power officers, superintendents, general superintendents, and other officers of the company. To this request the reply was made that we had contracts with the different crafts and that if they were found objectionable or any changes were to be discussed the company would be glad, through its officers, to meet the men of each craft separately, but they did not care to make any changes in the methods of discussing or handling the questions. The men were not satisfied with those answers, and they waited on the general managers and received the same replies; that is, that the company was ready at that time, and in the future, as they had been in the past, to meet the men freely to discuss differences, and expressed the hope that whatever differences existed at that time could be amicably settled as they always had been before.

These answers were not satisfactory to the men, and some time in August, I think probably between the 15th and the 25th, Mr. Franklin, of the boiler makers, wrote asking me for a meeting on a certain date in Chicago. I replied that I would not be in Chicago on that date, but that my assistant, Mr. W. B. Scott, would meet him, which he did. At that meeting Mr. Franklin urged the company, through Mr. Scott, to change its views and to adopt the federation plan of settling these matters. Mr. Kline came to see me on the same subject—I think between the 20th and the 25th of August—making the same plea. Mr. Kline represented that the men were in a very excited condition, that they were threatening trouble and he came to me, as Mr. Franklin did, to devise ways and means to avert this trouble. I explained to him that our record with our men was a matter of pride with us, and that we were extremely indisposed to have any trouble; but if the men had met and drawn up a set of demands on the company, which they proposed to have granted whether or not, that, as a condition precedent to the discussion of any matters of difference between the company and the men, that the company should accede to this question of federation and have all crafts to discuss and settle matters connected with only one—that if the men had made up their minds to that and that we must have trouble, I did not see how we could avert it; that we had nothing to do with bringing it on and, apparently the first people to take steps to avoid trouble would be the people that had laid the foundation for it. Mr. Kline did some arguing and tried to convince me it was for the benefit of the companies to adopt this change of plan. I replied that if his plan was acceded to and the company, before discussing any questions of working conditions or wages, should deliver itself practically bound hand and foot into the power of Mr. Kline and his associates, that then it would be too late to discuss any questions of wages and conditions; that the federation would have it in its power to impose any conditions it saw fit, not necessarily the conditions that were set forth in this printed circular served on us, but any conditions they saw fit to impose; that the company by agreeing to a condition precedent would deprive itself of any power to resist. I told him, also, that they should recognize that it took two people to make a bargain and apparently this arrangement had been made without any consultation with the company, and that if the company acceded to this plan of settling troubles it would forever thereafter be deprived of any power to resist any demands, no matter how unreasonable.

In that interview Mr. Kline asked me, or stated that he and his associates had not been able to get any hearing from any officer of the company. I told him I was glad he had come to me, that I had never yet refused to meet anybody, and that I would meet him or his associates or anybody he had with him. That led to a meeting with Mr. Kline, and, as I remember it, Mr. Franklin, Mr. Buckalew, Mr. Ryan, and one other whose name I do not remember now, in San Francisco.

The matter of this federation method of settlement was fully discussed, the company being represented by Mr. Calvin, who was then general manager; Mr. Scott, assistant general manager; Mr. Small, superintendent of motive power, and two other gentlemen, Mr. Clancey, an attorney, and Mr. Athearn, who had charge of the comfort and rest rooms of the employees. In that meeting pretty much the same ground was gone over as was gone over in the Chicago meeting with Mr. Kline, and it was explained to him and his associates at that time still more fully how utterly helpless the company would be in the future if it acceded to their demands to treat with the crafts as a federated whole.

It was pointed out that a very slight disagreement perhaps with a tinsmith or a blacksmith in New Orleans might put the entire line from New Orleans to Portland and from Omaha to San Francisco out of commission. Mr. Kline and his associates assured me that it was not their desire to do anything of that sort, and that they did not intend to do it. To that we replied that if they once had the power nobody could say what they would do; that the company would no longer be a party to these negotiations with any power, but would be utterly helpless. They were insistent on their method of dealing. I think the conference lasted two and a half or three hours, perhaps. We touched on some of the objectionable features of the paper that had been handed to us, such as the demand that the company should, within 30 days, require all of its men to join the federation whether they wished to or not; that the dismissal of men from the company's shops should be entirely in the hands of the federated committee; that the appointment of foremen should be largely in their control; that the number of apprentices should be dictated by them; and that no questions were to be asked a man either as to his physical condition or as to his previous employment—rights that every individual in the country has, though they were to be denied to the company. As a result of this meeting we were given plainly to understand by Mr. Kline asking a question couched in some such language as this: Whether we understood what a continued refusal to accede to this plan meant? I told him I thought I did. I understood from the beginning and I believed all through the negotiations that this plan had been arranged by the men to force the issue; we were told by our older men that they were not in sympathy with the plan, that the plan had been arranged by the younger men, the hotheads that wanted to make this change, and that they were not in sympathy with it, but, of course, if called out, they would have to go. So I never was deceived for a moment as to what the men intended to do. I firmly believed they intended to strike if we did not give them what they wanted. And the matter was placed clearly before our board of directors, both of the Southern Pacific and of the Union Pacific systems. It was explained to them what would happen if a refusal was given to these demands; and they concluded, as trustees of property representing some thirty-five or forty thousand owners, and perhaps some two or three hundred thousand people in the United States, and after considering their obligations to the public to manage their properties and to run them so as to give proper service, that it was impracticable—indeed, impossible—to accede to these demands. Mr. Kline and his associates left the meeting and said that they intended to get delegates from all over the system to meet, I think, at San Francisco, to discuss this matter; and they asked for transportation, which was given them.

This meeting was held, I suppose, some time about the middle of September—perhaps between the 10th and the 20th. We were told that the men had voted for a strike. The next I heard of the matter was through a telegram sent to me by Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Franklin, Mr. Kline and Mr. Ryan, and a fifth gentleman, whose name I do not happen to remember now, from Davenport, Iowa, presenting an ultimatum that the company would either have to consent to this federation plan and deal with the federated committee, or they would strike. To that I replied that we had done everything possible and everything that could be expected of us. That if fair treatment of the men and looking out for them in their old age with pensions, and for their care when they were sick, would not affect or appeal to them, of course we could not dictate what view they should take of this matter, and we could not control their judgment, and that they could do what they saw fit; and a strike followed, I think, on the 30th of September or the 1st of October.

It always seemed to me through these negotiations that the trouble arose from a misconception or rather from a total disregard of the rights of the employer. The men got together and decided what they wanted and what they proposed to demand, what they proposed to exact to the extent of their power from the employer. That was briefly—they appeared to think that the employer's work belonged to them; that they could dictate terms without consulting the rights or the wishes of the employer as to how this work should be conducted, and what men should be chosen to do the work for the carriers, how the forces should be decreased when they had to be decreased; that they would be the judges of that, and not the carriers; that they denied to the carrier the right accorded to everyone to select the people or the employees to do his work. I don't suppose one of them would have considered for a moment hampering his wife in the choice of a cook and requiring that she should retain a cook that did not suit her, did not do her work properly, or was distasteful to her, or not useful to her; yet this right was denied to the company in their paper.

After the strike was started the usual tactics followed of attacks upon the men who were engaged to take the places of the men who had abandoned their jobs, and there was a great deal of violence at a great many points, and that violence culminated in murder and assassination at one point in Texas in which three men were shot from ambush. The number of men arrested and punished for these attacks was very great. I have not prepared a statement of them. I do not know that a statement is particularly necessary or is particularly desired. If it is, of course, it can be furnished.

Chairman WALSH. I would like to ask—pardon me.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I deplored this trouble. I started in a department of the company where I had to do very hard physical labor for a number of years. I was in close touch with the workmen of all kinds, where I knew the men and where I could call them "Bill" or "Tom." I was sympathetic. And I had up to 1911—for 33 years—gotten along pleasantly with my fellow workmen. But the unreasonableness of these demands, and the insistence that before considering any question of wages, of service, or anything affecting the relations of the men with the company, excepting only this question of federating, and of all taking up a question for settlement instead of one craft, had led to this serious difficulty.

Chairman WALSH. What official position did you hold in 1902 and 1903?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I was general manager of the Southern Pacific Co., assistant to the president and fourth vice president.

Chairman WALSH. I want to go—in view of some of the testimony that has been submitted—into a little history prior to this time. What position did the late E. H. Harriman hold at that time—1902 and 1903?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. He was president of the Southern Pacific Co. and chairman of the executive committee.

Chairman WALSH. Now, there was a strike on the Union Pacific, I believe, in 1902 and 1903?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I think that is the correct date. There was a strike about that time.

Chairman WALSH. It has been stated that the cause of that strike was the effort on the part of the officials of the company to introduce what is called the piecework system. Was that correctly stated?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I think that is correct. That was the cause of the strike.

Chairman WALSH. And I believe there was what they call a sympathetic strike growing out of the claim that the Southern Pacific had assisted the Union Pacific by supplying engines during the strike?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. There was no sympathetic strike on the Southern Pacific. That claim was made, but it was without foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, I do not understand. That is, that there was no sympathetic strike without foundation, or that the engines were not loaned—is without foundation?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Both. I do not recall any sympathetic strike. There were threats of a sympathetic strike based on the claim that locomotives were furnished, but I know that the locomotives were not furnished, and my recollection is that no sympathetic strike occurred. It was simply threatened.

Chairman WALSH. It has been stated that a sympathetic strike was voted on the Southern Pacific at that time. Whether it came to a head or not, I have not in mind. Was there a strike voted on the Southern Pacific at that time, to your knowledge?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I don't remember.

Chairman WALSH. Are you aware of the fact, if it be a fact, after the sympathetic strike was voted on the Southern Pacific, that Mr. Harriman appealed to the international presidents of the several crafts to meet him in New York and confer with him for the purpose of settling the difficulties in the whole matter?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I do not know. Mind you, I had nothing to do with the Union Pacific at that time.

Chairman WALSH. I understand. Do you recall, as a matter of history, that the federated body representing all the shop crafts of the Union Pacific and Harriman lines did meet with Mr. Harriman in New York at that time?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I think a number of men from the Southern Pacific, by number I would say perhaps three or four, did apply for transportation to go east to meet Mr. Harriman. I think that is correct. And transportation was given to them.

Chairman WALSH. Are you familiar with the fact, if it be a fact, that Mr. Harriman sent a telegram to the grand lodge officers of the various crafts in which he stated in substance that rather than be responsible for the breaking up of homes, the suffering and poverty of men, women, and children, that the strike on the Union Pacific would mean if it continued, and the strike on the Southern Pacific would mean if inaugurated, that he would meet a federated body around the council table and confer with them to the end that they might be reinstated in their employment?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. There was no strike on the Southern Pacific.

Chairman WALSH. Well, assuming that a strike was voted, or not assuming, are you aware of any such telegram being sent?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No, I am not.

Chairman WALSH. Are you aware of the fact, if it be a fact, that the grand lodge officers representing the shop crafts answered this telegram, saying that they would meet, and that they did meet in conference, and as a result of the conference a satisfactory settlement of both the Union Pacific strike, which was in effect, and the Southern Pacific strike, which had been declared by a vote, was settled and the men returned to work?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I know nothing of the telegram you refer to. I had nothing to do with the Union Pacific at that time. I had nothing to do with this settlement further than to answer some questions Mr. Harriman asked whether it was true or not that the Southern Pacific supplied locomotives to the Union Pacific. To that I replied in the negative—that there was no foundation for the claim at all. And the only further information I had was the request of some men from the Southern Pacific asking for transportation to go east to meet Mr. Harriman in conference.

Chairman WALSH. When did Mr. Harriman himself assume the presidency of the Union Pacific Railway Co.?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I do not know; approximately 1898, I think.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know the reason, Mr. Kruttschnitt, first-hand, or by hearsay, why the late Mr. Burt was removed from the presidency of the Union Pacific, if he was removed?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No, I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Had that anything to do with the difficulty that had arisen between him and the employees of the company prior to his removal?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. That I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. At this conference that you had September 1, 1911, was the matter of a strike, the possible consequences, gone into in any greater detail than you have mentioned here, Mr. Kruttschnitt? As I recall your statement, it was that Mr. Kline and others stated simply that you knew what the consequences would be if a conference was not had. Was it gone into any more fully in detail; that is, as to the location of so many men in particular places and so many cities in which the men had acquired homes, that had family roots and the like, which would be torn up in case a disturbance occurred?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I don't think so. In what I have said before I have repeated as exactly as I can remember after a lapse of four years just what happened. There had been numerous talks between some of our older men and the officers of the company, deploring the possibility of a strike and breaking up of long-standing pleasant relations, but there was no particular detail gone into at this conference with Mr. Kline and his associates.

Chairman WALSH. Do you regard the attitude of your company and of yourself in 1911 as being in harmony with the attitude of the late Mr. Harriman in 1902 and 1903?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I was very closely associated with Mr. Harriman from 1902 until his death in 1909. That would be seven years. And I do not remember that I ever had any disagreement with Mr. Harriman about my attitude toward labor or my treatment of labor. He knew thoroughly well what my record was on the Southern Pacific; he knew thoroughly well before he got control of it, and he knew from personal observation what my record had been and what policy I was pursuing from 1902 to the time of his death, and he never criticized or reversed anything that I had done. I think I understood his mental attitude thoroughly, and I am justified in believing that my acts harmonized with his ideas, because, as I say, he never criticized them. And Mr. Harriman was not at all backward about criticizing when he did not like anything.

Chairman WALSH. When Mr. Kline and these other gentlemen called upon you, did you suggest to them that their action in calling upon you as representing a federation—that this was in violation of the Sherman Act, and that they might be prosecuted for coming to see you in that situation in that capacity?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I did make that remark jocularly. I believed it true at the time, and I believe it true to-day. I think if we had done anything one-half as repugnant to the Sherman Act as that we would have been indicted very promptly.

Chairman WALSH. It is a fact that a very short while ago a federated committee representing the employees in the transportation department of your roads was denied a conference by the vice president and general manager of the Atlantic system of the Southern Pacific, and that upon your specific order he was directed to recede from his stand and to hold a conference with the committee?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I think you are alluding to a trouble with the engineers—

Chairman WALSH. I really do not know what it is. This is one of the questions that has been submitted.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. There was a difference between the engineers and firemen on the Atlantic system of the company. It was really a case where the innocent outsider is the sufferer. There was a dispute between the engineers and the firemen in which the company was in nowise interested. The company announced that it was perfectly willing to accept either the engineers' or the firemen's contention if they would only agree amongst themselves. But they insisted on bringing the company into this matter and a strike followed. Public sentiment that was familiar with the conditions, and public sentiment after all is the power that finally settles these contentions, was strongly opposed to this strike. They appealed to the President. Troubles were imminent on the Mexican border and I was appealed to by the head of the mediation board, Judge Chambers, who represented that the President appealed to the company's sense of patriotism to yield a point in order to settle with the men on a plan outlined by Judge Chambers and relieve the Government from embarrassment that might occur in connection with the movement of troops and supplies to the Mexican border. As an American citizen I—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Commissioner Garretson suggests that perhaps you have the two occurrences confused in your mind. If you have no objection, Commissioner Garretson will interpolate a question here.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are you not confusing two occurrences, Mr. Kruttschnitt? You are referring to the jurisdictional strike between the firemen and engineers which occurred some five or six years ago—

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON (continuing). While the question is—

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT (interrupting). No; I am not confusing it with that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The last occurrences referred to four organizations, didn't it, of men in the train and engine service?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. The chairman said he did not know what was referred to. I am putting on my explanation, and if it does not fit it will only result in the consumption of a little time and patience of the commission; but I am not mistaken as to the time, for I remember distinctly being called up by Mr. Chambers over the long-distance phone at my home in New Canaan, Conn., and having the situation explained; I could not be mistaken about the date because I have lived there only two years.

Chairman WALSH. Were there only two crafts involved?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Two?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes. To finish my story on this appeal from the President of the United States, we said at once that any view we might have about this matter would be abandoned and we would conform to the President's wishes, and we did so. That was the matter, and it happened certainly not more than two and one-half years ago, because I remember it occurred when I was living in Connecticut, and I have not lived there over two and one-half years.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any difference in principle in dealing with the federation of employees in the transportation department and when you are dealing with the shop crafts?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. A very great difference.

Chairman WALSH. State as briefly as possible what that difference is.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I have already stated, and won't repeat it unless you wish—I have already repeated what the views of the shop crafts' federation was as to their jurisdiction over shop practices. You do not want me to repeat that, do you?

Chairman WALSH. No.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. In dealing with the trainmen, engineers, and firemen, they have never presumed to call on us to require every man to join their organizations. They have relied on the good judgment and the good sense of the men to join or not, as they saw fit; if they do not join, they take the view that it is the men's loss, and if they do join, they are glad to take them in. They have never undertaken to say whom we should retain in the service; they have never undertaken to say whom we should employ as trainmasters or assistant superintendents. They are all in one branch of service; first, the engineers and firemen—naturally, their duties overlap. A fireman is an engineer in embryo. When he is promoted he has two organizations he can join—either the firemen's organization, which takes in engineers also, or the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. The brakeman is a conductor in embryo; therefore when you speak of four organizations there are only two, because, as I say, they overlap. And all four organizations—if you choose to call them four—are engaged in one division of the service, and that is in running trains; and the great difference has been, in our experience, that these men do not claim that absolute control over their employers' business that the shop federation claims to hold, and to enforce with the strike.

Chairman WALSH. Is it within your knowledge that the late E. H. Harriman ever advised the men working on the so-called Harriman lines to get together and federate and treat with the officials by a federated committee of the Harriman lines; and did the late E. H. Harriman ever say that such a method of bargaining would save time and expense to the company and to the men and would go a long way toward preventing labor disturbances?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I have said I was intimately associated with Mr. Harriman from 1902 to 1909 as his immediate assistant; from the time he bought control of the Southern Pacific in 1902 to 1904 I was his assistant on the Pacific coast. The negotiations with the men in 1911 lasted, in one way or another, from, you might say, the month of June until the time of the declaration of the strike, and never once, either from Mr. Harriman in his lifetime or from any of these men, have I ever heard any allusion to any such agreement or expression of opinion on the part of Mr. Harriman. This is the first time I have ever heard it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not Mr. Harriman stated this to be his policy in October, 1903, in the city of New York, when conferring with Mr. James O'Connell, M. J. Ford, Hugh Doran, S. H. Grace, T. F. Tomlinson, and George W. Smith, representatives of the Union Pacific machinists?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I do not; but I would think it passing strange if Mr. Harriman, after 1904, on giving me control for him over all these matters for both Union and Southern Pacific systems, should fail to acquaint me with his desires in that direction, and, as I repeated, he never did, and I have never heard of these telegrams or expressions of his views until you read them.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever hear, prior to September 30, 1911, that the seniority rights of the men on the Pacific system were violated, and that complaints were made to your subordinate, and that these complaints were not redressed, and that as a consequence general dissatisfaction was created among your employees?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I do not know that; but I do know that Mr. Franklin, when he waited on Mr. Scott in August, 1911, used the expression that there was little or no trouble on the Union or Southern Pacific; that they came nearer 100 per cent good service than any he knew of. In my conference with Mr. Kline in August, 1911, he made the same statement—that there was no trouble on our roads, and he was glad to know how harmonious the relations were; and when I went to San Francisco in the latter part of August, 1911, I was shown an interview that had been given to the papers by the head of the federated employees in California, in which he stated publicly that they had always been considerably and well treated by the Southern Pacific; and the same assertions were made to Mr. Small in numbers of his meetings with the committees of the individual crafts.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that the car workers were denied a conference on the Pacific system and refused recognition as a craft organization of any kind?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I do not know that; but if it was stated, I would say emphatically that I do not believe it, because we had agreements with a number of the crafts, and I do not know why we should not have had it with these men as well as others.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that the sheet-metal workers' craft asked for recognition as a craft organization on the Pacific system on or about the fall of 1909 and that recognition of this organization as a craft organization was denied by the company and that as a result thereof the sheet-metal workers went on strike at a number of points on the system?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. That I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. You have no knowledge of any such thing?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that for years prior to 1909 the machinists on the Oregon Short Line and Oregon Railway & Navigation Co. petitioned your companies for the recognition of their crafts' organizations and that it was repeatedly refused?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No; I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that the boiler makers and blacksmiths, as crafts, asked recognition repeatedly, prior to 1907, and were denied recognition by you or your subordinates of the Oregon Short Line and Oregon Railway & Navigation Co.?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. That I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that the boiler makers and blacksmiths, as separate crafts, sought conferences in 1910 with the proper officials on the Pacific system and that they were denied, although they had at the time contracts with that system under which it was provided for conferences when they desired to make changes on giving 30 days' notice?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I do not know the fact; but I say again that if those contracts were in effect, I do not believe the statement implied in the question.

Chairman WALSH. How much money did the companies under your appropriate for publicity purposes before the strike of September 30, 1911?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. None.

Chairman WALSH. Was money used for publicity purposes in this way, that advertisements of an expensive character were inserted in the papers that were deemed to be influential and good avenues of creating public sentiment in different parts of the country?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I don't believe so.

Chairman WALSH. You are not aware of any such thing being done, if it was done?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No. The handling of the strike was in the hands of the operating vice presidents on the ground. I think I should have known of it. If any expenses had been incurred, however, I think I should have known it.

Chairman WALSH. Were you aware of any such publicity being used after the strikes began?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Why, I should have thought that these men were not proper for the duties intrusted to them if they had not given full publicity. I began by responding to a request of the San Francisco papers to give publicity to this contention, and I started by giving this statement. May I give this to the stenographer?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; you may, please. • • •

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. And it was the duty of every officer, inasmuch as this was a contention in which we were fighting for a right to serve the public in a way in which they wished to be served, that they should be informed and that the fullest publicity should be given to everything we could think of.

(The paper here presented by the witness was received in evidence and appears among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Kruttschnitt Exhibit.")

Chairman WALSH. Then, you mean to say you are not acquainted with the details; that is, as to how much money was expended in that way?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No.

Chairman WALSH. Is that correct?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I am not.

Chairman WALSH. This, I note, was given as a signed statement from you?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. For publication in a San Francisco paper?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes. The papers were very much mystified; wanted to know what it was all about, and before I had been in San Francisco six hours, I suppose, I was waited on by a dozen different reporters and was told that they did not understand and that the public did not understand. And on the way west I was waited on by a number of reporters and was asked the same thing, and on arriving at San Francisco I wrote this statement and gave it to the press.

I don't think there was much, if any, money spent, because we were absolutely persecuted by reporters for statements, and after the strike began we pursued the policy of sitting quiet and having very little to say; and the officers were instructed by me not to make any boasts of what they were going to do or what they were doing, but to go ahead and perform their duties and to get the company's work systematized again and get the shop forces built up and to do no crowing about it in the press.

Chairman WALSH. This statement you submit here was not run in any newspapers as an advertisement and paid for in that way?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No, sir; it was solicited with the utmost eagerness, and there was not a cent paid for it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you keep fairly good track of the newspaper publications in the territory where the greatest interest was likely to be?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. The operating vice presidents did; I did not. We paid for clippings. I was flooded with a mass of clippings, some of which I suppose I kept, but most of which I did not. They were too voluminous.

Chairman WALSH. Did the newspapers likewise publish the statements of the representatives of the men as to the causes of the strike?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Freely. I had—after the strike began I was importuned by a number of the papers to answer statements made in the press by Mr. Kline and other leaders of the men, which I consistently declined to do. I stated that I was not going to indulge in any newspaper controversy; that the side of the company had been given by me to the press, and I proposed to stop at that.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact, Mr. Kruttschnitt, referring again for a moment to the demands made by this federation and the conference in September, 1911; that is, that the so-called check-off system be adopted—

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT (interrupting). So-called what?

Chairman WALSH. That the requirement be made that all employees should join the union and those others that were so objectionable to you—I wanted to ask you if it is or is not a fact that those suggestions were what might be called tentative suggestions for the purpose of discussion and negotiation in case a conference was granted, or were they absolute demands on the part of the men with a declaration that in the event they were not granted a strike would be called?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I am going to deal perfectly frankly with you and the members of the commission. We were assured time and again that we must not be alarmed by these objectionable demands that they made, that all we were asked to do was to deal with a federated body; that then everything would be lovely. That was tantamount to asking the company to surrender its ability to resist, and Mr. Franklin and Mr. Kline, in their interviews, and Mr. Kline and his four associates in the San Francisco meeting, tried in every possible way that ingenuity could suggest to persuade us that the only interest of the men in the matter was a little more convenient and expeditious way of handling grievances.

I was frank with Mr. Kline and his associates. I said, "I understand; we need not try to throw dust in each others eyes. I know and you know what you are after. Any acquiescence on the part of the company to the demand that we meet a federated board would no doubt lead to a good many of these matters that you put in here for trading purposes being put aside for the moment. In other words, they are there for trading purposes, and they would be withdrawn if only the company would bind itself by preliminary agreement with you that would prevent it from ever being able to resist any demands, no matter how unreasonable. Once having done that the company would find itself, perhaps in a year or two years or three years or maybe five or six years, met with a demand to pay exorbitant wages, and do all sorts of things, perhaps all the things asked for in this paper, and a good many more besides; and it would find itself powerless to offer any resistance." I told Mr. Kline in the San Francisco conference—I said, "At the present time we have agreements with a number of your crafts. If the machinists should come in with an absolutely outrageous and unreasonable demand on refusal of which they should all strike, the company would not be bound hand and foot—would not be helpless. It could transact its business in some way or other and fulfill its duties to the public that are required of it by commissions and by courts and by laws." I said, "What you are after, and I see it very plainly, is that if the machinists and all these other crafts should federate, then no matter how unreasonable the request the federation would be the sole and only judge as to whether pressure was to be put on the company by striking to enforce those demands." Now, I said, "It is not reasonable to come to any man with any kind of intelligence and ask him to make such an arrangement as that." I said, "I can not do it."

Chairman WALSH. Did you have any conferences, formal or informal, with the Illinois Central, concerning the subject of system federation, prior to June, 1911?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No; I did not have anything to do with the Illinois Central, and never have had.

Chairman WALSH. Ever have any correspondence with them in regard to that matter?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I don't think so. I don't think there is a line of correspondence.

Chairman WALSH. What has been your attitude since the strike regarding conciliation, mediation, and arbitration?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. There has been absolutely nothing that we could mediate or arbitrate. That was the hopeless condition of this issue that was presented to us by the men, that it was not arbitrable. It was simply a demand that they be put in control of the company's shopwork; that they should be given power to dictate whether any shopwork should be done or not; and if so, the conditions under which it should be done. The men put up a proposition to the company which, if reversed, they would have considered the company's officers insane for presenting. If the company's officers had suggested to the men that they were dissatisfied with the separate agreements with the crafts, and that they gave notice that in 30 days they would take up a change of those conditions, and that they proposed to require every man to get out of the union, that they proposed to dictate on just what terms the men should have employment with the company, regardless of their wishes, regardless of their convenience, regardless of their health or welfare, the men would not have tolerated it for a moment. They would have immediately begun a strike, and properly so. Yet they reversed those conditions and imposed those conditions on the company, and when they were refused they went on strike, and that was argued and preached, I suppose, in half a dozen different ways. And then the question was taken up after the company's forces had been built up to take back these men that had caused this trouble, but we consistently refused to do so.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel that you took all possible steps to avoid the strike of 1911, Mr. Kruttschnitt?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I do.

Chairman WALSH. Have you made any investigation as to whether or not the system federations have been satisfactorily negotiated on other systems of railroads, and that they have worked out without detriment to the companies?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No; because it was totally irrelevant. My duties to the stockholders of the South Pacific Co. and the Union Pacific Co. and to the public would not have been based on the actions of A, B, C, or D road to its stockholders or the public. I could not have justified my acts by stating that I did thus and so because Mr. So-and-so did that in any court or tribunal or in public opinion. The reply would have been, "Why, that has nothing to do with the case. Your duty is clear; it is to serve the stockholders and the public according to law, and that utterly regardless of what any other road was doing." I have never given that matter consideration, though it was advanced by the men, as sugar coating to the pill, what this road had done or that road had done. It was totally irrelevant.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe in the general principle of collective bargaining, Mr. Kruttschnitt?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes. As I told you, I had been working 33 years on it.

Chairman WALSH. Yes. This is leading up to another question; Do you believe that employees who are divided into many or into several different crafts, each dealing separately with a single employer, can enjoy anything like equality in bargaining power?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I do; and what is more, I think that a number of the chiefs of these separate crafts believed the same way before the strike.

Chairman WALSH. Are labor conditions in the companies considered by the directors of the company at directors' meetings; that is, the question of wages and conditions of your labor and the satisfaction or dissatisfaction among your employees?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes, sir; unquestionably so—they are. As I told you, in this case they were very promptly put up to the directors, who were put in full possession of the facts.

Chairman WALSH. Are the conditions of employment as to hours and wages discussed generally by your executive boards?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. If you mean by that if they take a table of wages and compare them, no; but the conditions of the men, how they are paid, with respect to employees in the same occupation on different roads and in outside shops, I would say yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe a wage averaging $300 a month is enough to support an American citizen and an ordinary family in the communities such as exist where your large shops are located?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Well, of course, that is a loaded question. Before I could answer I would have to ask you what that American citizen considered proper living. I can, perhaps, answer it best by saying that thousands and thousands—hundreds of thousands—of American citizens are living properly and raising their children and educating them on such wages.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever considered, or do you consider, that proposition generally in fixing wages, what it costs the individual to live and support a family?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No; we have not done that, and I think we are right in that, because—take Government bodies, such as commissions; they have told us through their acts that cost of living has nothing to do with the case; they are not concerned as to how our companies live or the railroads' cost of living or the cost of buying material. They say that has nothing to do with it, and in paying wages we have always paid—and the men admitted that—we stated it repeatedly and they could not deny it—the highest wages of any railroads in the United States.

Chairman WALSH. Some of the commissioners will probably want to ask you some questions, Mr. Kruttschnitt, but I will ask you now whether there is any statement you would like to volunteer or any statement you would like to make covering any questions that have been asked you?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I don't think of anything much, Mr. Chairman. I came here, of course, knowing that you wanted to question me about my connection with these unfortunate occurrences. I did not know just what the line of your inquiry would be, and really I lacked the time and, I must confess, the inclination to sit down and write a very long statement, preferring to make the statement orally, as I have done, and let you supplement it by asking me questions on points I had overlooked, and I do not think of anything more.

Chairman WALSH. That is very satisfactory.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Possibly the questioning of some of the other commissioners might inspire a desire on our part to offer some questions, but I don't know of anything now.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Garretson has a few questions he says he wants to ask you.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Kruttschnitt, I think you would regret it more than any one person if it developed that the testimony on any given point was historically incorrect, would you not?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I should.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I want to go back to the question of the two incidents where the Atlantic system of the Southern Pacific had trouble with their enginemen or with the trainmen. Mr. W. B. Scott was located here in Chicago as your assistant, when you were director of maintenance and operation, was he not, for a considerable period?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. He was my assistant part of the time. No; when I first came to Chicago I had another assistant, but I expect he was my assistant from about 1906 or 1907 to 1911.

Commissioner GARRETSON. At the time of the jurisdictional strike between the locomotive engineers and the firemen Mr. Scott was located here with you as assistant?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No. Perhaps I should have answered that a little more fully; no; because Mr. Scott at that time was in Houston, and handled all of the negotiations with the engineers and firemen.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a fact that the negotiations were handled almost exclusively by Mr. van Vleck and Mr. Fay, and that the terms of the settlement were finally reached here in Chicago in Mr. W. B. Scott's office, with Mr. Charles P. Neill, then commissioner under the Erdmann Act, on the ground in Houston, the terms being arranged between the two chief executives of the firemen and engineers, with the chief executives of the conductors and trainmen acting as intermediaries, with Mr. W. B. Scott and Mr. Charles P. Neill and the executive officers of the organizations on the ground at Houston, Mr. Morrissey then president of the trainmen and the then president of the Order of Railway Conductors?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I think you are speaking of an entirely different matter. Commissioner GARRETSON. That was the jurisdictional strike between the two?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes; the engineers and the firemen.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You are not mistaken about Mr. Scott—

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Impossible for me to be, because where a man has a fact of a fact in an indefinite way, he may be mistaken, but he can not be mistaken when, as in this case, I stood at a telephone in a certain room in my house in Connecticut and talked with Judge Chambers at his home somewhere in Maryland on this strike, being called up in the middle of the night by the Western Union, in this very same house, and given telegrams relating to and explaining why the President wanted us to recede and give way to the men. I can not be mistaken.

Commissioner GARRETSON. At the time of the jurisdictional strike of the engineers and firemen, was there any trouble in Mexico, and was Judge Chambers connected in any way with the Federal Mediation Board?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Well, I—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). Judge Chambers never was Federal mediator until after the passage of the Newlands Act in 1912, and the strike of the conductors, trainmen, engineers, and firemen on the Atlantic system of the Southern Pacific took place in 1912, or 1913, and Judge Chambers was a party to the settlement of that strike. Is that not correct?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Assuming what you say to be true, I suppose it is correct; but I still think we are talking about different strikes. However, if it be a fact that Judge Chambers was not put on the mediation board—if that is a fact, then I must confess that I am mistaken, and I am talking about the wrong strike. Now, is Judge Chambers a member of the board now?

Commissioner GARRETSON. He is, and has been since 1912 or 1913, only. But bear in mind—I want to refresh your memory—

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Well, I will say there was a strike at the time when Judge Chambers was mediator.

Commissioner GARRETSON. There was.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. And the circumstances that I have related did happen or did take place with Judge Chambers. Now, it is possible that it was not the strike of the engineers and firemen, but I thought it was.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is what I wanted to correct in the record, because the other is historically in the record, as I have stated. What I wanted to draw attention to in the record is this, the strike of the four organizations was not jurisdictional; was it not over the refusal of Mr. George W. Waid, assistant manager of the Atlantic system, to meet and treat with representatives of the four trainmen's and engine service organizations jointly?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes; I think you are correct as to that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And did not the recession from that position come from the fact that your company's trains—the movement of them was absolutely tied up, was it not?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. The reason of that recession, as I told you, was that it was made on the appeal of the President through Judge Chambers.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The mediator had entered the game?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then you now realize that Judge Chambers had no connection with the original jurisdictional strike between the two organizations, which took place in 1907 and early in 1908, the enginemen?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Well, I say I am willing to assume the correctness of what you stated, that the judge was not put on this board until then, but I think as my recollection goes that he acted in some cases prior to this strike that we are discussing now. However, that is immaterial.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is immaterial except as it applies to the true facts and as to the cause and who were involved in the two strikes. That was what I wanted to get into the record in its correct historical form.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Well, I think you are right.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It will be a misfortune for you if the testimony stood absolutely out of accord with the occurrences that took place?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Quite right, and I am very much obliged to you for correcting me.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was there any connection, Mr. Kruttschnitt, between the attitude of your general manager on the Atlantic system in refusing there being no question involved whatever in the original strike of the four organizations, but the refusal of Mr. Waid to meet the four jointly—was there any connection between that and your attitude as shown toward this federation?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No, I have already explained in answer to a question from the chairman the difference in the attitude of the trainmen's and the enginemen's organizations and the shop federation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then, in your opinion, if they had no connection with each other, there were not the following out of the same general policy, what was the cause of the refusal, then, to deal jointly with the train and engine service organizations?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. You say what was the reason of the refusal?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes; what would be the cause of the refusal?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. To answer frankly, I think a mistake was made.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Really, the two attitudes were exactly consistent with each other?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No; I haven't said that. You asked me that first and I said they were entirely different; then you asked me why the refusal was made to deal with the four trainmen organizations on the Atlantic system, is that not correct?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. And I told you that I thought frankly a mistake had been made.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Oh; I beg your pardon. I didn't catch that answer. Did you hear the declaration of Mr. Markham?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I was given a transcript of the testimony yesterday, and it amounted to, I think, six or seven hundred pages, and I only went through it very hurriedly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Your own testimony in general and his are in line with each other. Now, would not the natural outcome of the attitude of your company and his, and the reasons asserted by yourself and Mr. Markham as underlying your attitude—would not the natural application by thinking labor men of your theories, result in the triumph of what is known as the industrial form of organization whereby every man on the pay roll of your company would be enrolled in one organization, because from the testimony given that would be the natural method for the man of radical views to carry out his desires against his employer—wouldn't that be the natural result?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Your question is very long and involved, and I will have to ask the stenographer to read it.

(Question read.)

I can answer that in a qualified way, yes; because the very issue that was presented to the companies, was the result of the presence of the radical and hot-headed men on the companies' pay roll and in the different craft organizations.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I was not passing upon the matter submitted in any degree; I was only speaking of the original man, because that is exactly the form of organization, is it not, that is advocated by the I. W. W., who are generally classed as radical?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I am afraid I do not know much about that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Industrial Workers of the World?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I know what you mean, but except from general newspaper accounts of them I know nothing about their aims or their ideals.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If you had traveled with the commission, you would have had considerable information on their desires. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ashton has a few questions to ask.

Commissioner ASHTON. I understood you to say that you objected to the additional power which your employees sought to obtain. Have you seen anything since the strike was inaugurated to confirm those views?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes. I think it was in January, 1912, some three months or more after the strike had been started that President E. L. Reguin, of the System Federation of the Harriman lines, sent out a set of resolutions adopted by the federation of the crafts of the Harriman lines calling on all railroads in the country to join in a sympathetic strike to help them win the strike on the Harriman lines. This is a copy of the paper.

Commissioner Aishton. Do you desire to put it in evidence?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes.

(The paper thus offered is as follows:)

OFFICE 608, HIBERNIA BUILDING.

San Francisco, January 6, 1912.

BROTHERS, GREETING:

The following resolutions are herewith submitted for your consideration:

We, the committee on resolutions, respectfully submit the following to you with the request of this local that you submit same to all locals on the Harriman lines and Illinois Central lines, and in addition all federated locals and trades-unionists involved in this strike on other systems.

CLARENCE C. RIDGEN.

E. J. CONNERS,

WM. A. DOUGAN,

Committee on Resolutions.

The following resolutions were drawn up by the committee appointed by system local at San Jose at our regular meeting Thursday, January 4, 1912, upon receipt of resolutions drawn up at Freeport, Ill., which resolutions we believe would have the effect of placing us in a position where the railroads would be able to effect a compromise with the federations on the Harriman and Illinois Central lines, before we have had time to fire our most effective shot, to wit, the federation with other federations and union shopmen throughout the country, so that if necessary to win this strike they can be called out and force the railroads to grant our demands at this time, and in the future enable the shopmen on the Harriman lines and the Illinois Central lines to protect all other brothers.

Let us make the federation of shop employees as nearly invincible as possible, and to do this we must strike while the iron is hot, and that to compromise at this time would probably prevent the federation of the shopmen into a Nation-wide organization.

We are out to win; so say we all.

Whereas we know from the word and action of the railroad officials since the strike was called September 30, that in no case will the managers of the railroads comprising the Harriman and Illinois Central lines be willing to compromise except to save themselves from defeat; and

Whereas the time must come when labor will realize that through compact organization, comprising not only one craft but all crafts working in one industry, that strikes can be decisively won, enabling the workers in that industry to demand and realize conditions which they know to be just to themselves, and believing that the time has come when this strike can be won with the assistance of the other federations now in existence in the United States with the help of all other union shopmen who have not yet formed federations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That steps be taken and demanded in recent resolutions from San Antonio, Tex., and Los Angeles, Cal., and unanimously indorsed by this local to call out, if necessary, all other shopmen in the United States for the purpose of winning, if possible without compromising, the demands of the blanket agreement, all of which demands we consider not only fair and just, but actually conservative.

Resolved, That we consider no compromise until all union men have done everything within their power to win all of the demands of the federation of shop employees of the Harriman and Illinois Central lines. With the coming of cold weather reports show that the system for which these men were working are only operating under the greatest of difficulties and it is highly probable that the general managers of these railroad interests will take steps to effect a compromise to enable themselves to avoid defeat. And be it further,

Resolved, That owing to the benefits that will accrue to all workers through the success of this strike and the stimulus such issue is certain to be for the federating of other crafts, not only in the railroad industry but in other industries as well, thereby developing a much greater power in the hands of labor than has been heretofore attained, that our request for voluntary financial and moral support be addressed to our brother workers instead of the business men, who as a matter of fact are not so deeply interested in the outcome of this struggle as the workers are.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to all locals on the Harriman and Illinois Central lines for their indorsement or rejection, and also to locals of other federations and craft locals not yet federated for the information of all union men not participating in this strike.

Respectfully submitted.

[SEAL]

JOHN SCOTT,
Secretary-Treasurer System Federation Farriman Lines.

Approved:

E. L. REGUIN,
President System Federation of the Harriman Lines.

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Kruttschnitt—

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT (interrupting). This I considered at the time was a justification of fears that we had—that this federation was simply a plan to obtain absolute power over the operations of the carriers and to exert it to the utmost of their ability to carry their contentions no matter what they should be.

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Kruttschnitt, there was a lot of testimony introduced before the commission here yesterday about views expressed by Mr. Harriman in 1903, which indicated that he favored the federation of shop employees. Have you any knowledge as to his views other than as expressed by you in replying to the inquiries of the chairman?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. None whatever. I desire to say to the commission with the utmost frankness and without the slightest mental reservation that Mr. Harriman never in any manner, shape, or form indicated to me any desire of that sort. If he had, it would have been my duty, as his assistant, to at once take the matter up and advocate it and carry it out. I should have done that. But as I say, I never in any manner, shape, or form received any intimation or instructions from him about that. I repeat, that until the chairman read these questions this morning I never heard that.

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Kruttschnitt, I understand you to say that at the time of this strike or just prior to it that your company had five contracts with shop trades?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I think the Union Pacific had five. I think the Southern Pacific had three or four. We had contracts with the shop crafts.

Commissioner AISHTON. Entered into through the usual negotiations between the employees in those crafts and the properly authorized officials of the company?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is all. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Kruttschnitt, I do not want to appear as having this a personal matter at all in my position I am occupying here, but I happened to attend the conference at New York originally with Mr. Harriman which brought out statements about the old strike of the Union Pacific road. The testimony yesterday brought out some things that occurred at the conference and later resulted in an adjustment of the Union Pacific strike.

One of the witnesses yesterday attended the conference at New York, and I asked him some questions to put into the record his remembrance of what took place at the conference. Among the occurrences was a running conversation with Mr. Harriman in which he expressed the desire to have the matter adjusted and what he thought might be the manner of handling the affairs in the future that would avoid a recurrence of these strikes and the possibility of having a number of men, the smaller the number the better, he thought, who would be in a position to speak for the entire forces of the mechanical department of the road in the adjustment of any controversy that might arise. That led to the belief that he was favorable toward the form of organization that would permit the men to select representatives who would represent all of the organizations in any conference that might be had and carry it up to the executive officers. And later, he said he was going west and would be glad to meet representatives of the organizations in the West with a view of carrying out the proposed sentiments, and he did at Cheyenne and Omaha meet representatives of the joint organizations.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I do not, Mr. O'Connell, question any of that. I tried to make my position definite on that; it was before I had any connection whatever with the Union Pacific. I know nothing about the matter, but I do say that it was strange that if Mr. Harriman charged me with the supervision and operations on both the Union and Southern Pacific he never mentioned anything about his desire to have what we were doing changed. It was still more incomprehensible that in the numbers of interviews and meetings between the craft committees and the officers of the companies, between Mr. Franklin, Mr. Kline, and their associates, who met me in San Francisco, that nothing had ever been urged on the part of the employees as to Mr. Harriman's wishes to induce us to agree to this federation plan, which they were advancing, and it seems to me, since I have heard you, that it was the most incomprehensible omission on their part that they did not advance that as an argument, because it would have been the strongest argument possible on their part.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The matter might not have come to their minds at that time.

I recall Mr. Harriman going further in the telegram put in the record yesterday, in which he suggested three men to act as a finality on any dispute that came up, and could not be adjusted out along the lines—if any of the crafts had a difference with the company that could not be adjusted out there, that the contested matter be left to himself—"myself," and a Mr. Ford, who was in the company; and that on any subject or any questions he would be perfectly satisfied to have it adjusted by these parties.

As a man who handles large affairs, Mr. Kruttschnitt, and who comes in contact with the large employment of labor—this commission is authorized to ascertain the underlying causes of unrest and make some recommendations to Congress. Now, what has been your observation, and what suggestions have you to make to this commission for the elimination or the reduction as far as possible of the so-called unrest and the causes of strikes and friction between employer and employee?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I have observed that as to every strike that has ever taken place none has succeeded where public opinion was against it; that the strikes that have taken place with which I am familiar have ordinarily been settled in the way in which the great American public decided that they should be settled; that is easily understandable, because, under our form of government, our final appeal must be made to the opinions and views of our fellow citizens, and if we are operating against their views as to what is right and proper, it is right and proper that we should not succeed, and I do not think any of us ever will. So that the only views I have ever held about the settlement of industrial disputes—and the older I get the firmer I believe it—is that the only way to settle them is to let the public fully understand what it is all about; and it is on that theory I wrote that memorandum which was passed up to the chairman in answer to the reporters of the papers asking what this was all about. The public had a right to know; I gave the railroad side of it and the federated employees gave their side. This strike did not succeed because the public believed that the men were wrong; if they had believed the men were right they would have succeeded.

Now, I believe, for the settlement of all future strikes, the only way we will ever get industrial peace is to let the general public know exactly what the issues are—take them into your confidence and their judgment will be, I will say, almost always right.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Could there be some sort of a machine for carrying into effect public opinion?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. That is secondary. If you provide that the public shall be informed, if that principle is agreed to, the design of the machinery ought to be comparatively easy.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would you extend the idea to the mechanical department of railroads that now applies to the transportation department under the Newlands Act?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I would make it absolutely general; I would say to all employees, "Let any employee who has any cause for dissatisfaction make it known in a proper way to the officers of the company, and if he and his associates can not bring about a settlement there should be an appeal to somebody or some organization that can look into these matters carefully and impartially and let the general public know." I do not suggest compulsory arbitration; I think it is chimerical; I do not think it would ever be made a success. It was tried in New Zealand and has proven a failure there. So the only force we can appeal to, to bring contestants together, is the force of public opinion.

The Canadians have some very excellent acts that provide for publicity and from an investigation I made, through one of my staff in the last six or eight months. I find those acts are working up there very satisfactorily. The public there is put in full possession of the facts and they are able then to make their wishes and their judgment known; instead of providing for an arbitration by one or three or five or seven men, why, the general public acts as an arbiter.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would the creation of such a department by the Government of purely voluntary character, covering all industries, or lines of activity, as far as labor and capital are concerned, would the creation of such a department, with boards that would have authority, would have influence, on the Government to step in and ask contestant parties to use their good offices to mediate for the purpose of adjustment—do you think that would be of benefit to our country generally?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I think it would be of incalculable benefit, not only for the contestants, the employers and employees, but for the financial situation of the corporations. As our Government is organized at the present time the Government has absolute control over the revenues of certainly the railroads and of a great many other corporations, but now we are speaking really of railroads principally. Government has also, through the operation of the numerous laws, a very complete control of their expenses; in other words, the railroads at the present time have very little control over either their revenues or their expenses, therefore it is nothing but just that whatever tribunal has control over the revenues and expenses should investigate at least and report on these industrial troubles, because the ability of the road to pay the wages, in case the investigating board should decide that more wages were necessary, gives them the power to provide the way by which the railroad can get the money to pay these wages.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just referring to the strike situation for a moment; I gathered from what you say, Mr. Kruttschnitt, that your fear was that recognition of the federation of these different trades would place an extraordinary power within their hands to compel you to comply and that it might result in constant trouble with the company. In your experience as a railroad man, does your observation lead you to believe there has been a great number of strikes in railroads—a great number of strikes in the past where the railroads were dealing with individual organizations, such as the Union Pacific, and the Santa Fe, where the railroad strikes ran a long time, and that such strikes have been going on in one way or another for a long time, and don't you think that the bringing together of these trades into a confederation would reduce the possibility of strikes? The evidence submitted here by the officers of these federations shows that they have entered into agreements with some 50 railways and that no strike had occurred, no appearance of strikes, and that the system there put into effect—the evidence is that it has eliminated strikes and friction, while the old system is simply strewn with the wrecks of strikes.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I do not agree with you altogether as to your views as to the frequency of strikes under what I might term the existing plan. I said, in answer to one of the questions of the chairman, that I did not think, if we had agreed to this federation plan, that we should have a strike for one or two or three or four or five years; in other words, we would not have had a strike until the federation was ready. As to the 52 roads you have mentioned, I do not know which they are.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It is in the record.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. The federation is perhaps not ready to do the next thing it has on the program.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is all. "

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you, Mr. Kruttschnitt. You will be permanently excused.

TESTIMONY OF MR. J. F. GRAHAM.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, residence, and occupation, please, Mr. Graham.

Mr. GRAHAM. J. F. Graham; residence, Portland, Oreg.; at the present time I am superintendent of motive power of the O.-W. R. R. N. Co.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe your duties in that capacity, Mr. Graham.

Mr. GRAHAM. My duties in that capacity are to supervise all of the rolling stock and employees who are directly connected with the maintenance of the same.

Chairman WALSH. What craft unions do you deal with as—what craft unions did you deal with as a railroad official prior to the strike of 1911?

Mr. GRAHAM. With the machinists, blacksmiths, boiler makers, and carmen. Chairman WALSH. What were your relations with those unions prior to that time, friendly or otherwise?

Mr. GRAHAM. Very friendly.

Chairman WALSH. How were contracts and agreements made?

Mr. GRAHAM. They were made by representatives of the various crafts; for instance, of the machinists—a representative from each division, sometimes two from a division.

Chairman WALSH. How much time was usually required by the—per year, say, to attend to the business of making the agreements?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is a pretty hard question to answer.

Chairman WALSH. Well, approximately, was it a month or two out of a year?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not that long; I should say, offhand, about between 5 and 7 per cent of my time, perhaps two years.

Chairman WALSH. To what extent had the piece-rate system entered into your operations prior to the time of this strike?

Mr. GRAHAM. None.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have time studies or bonus systems in your shops?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Could you sketch to us, briefly, Mr. Graham, what points of controversy were typical ones in these conferences that you had with the craft unions prior to the time of the strike?

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, the conferences that came up, as a general thing, were those which related particularly to the crafts, the particular craft.

Chairman WALSH. As to wages and hours?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; as to wages and hours.

Chairman WALSH. And the assignment of work—with the machinists, what was considered machinists' work—any jurisdictional disputes that might happen to arise?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; that is correct.

Chairman WALSH. What was your first notification from anyone connected with the organization that a federation had been formed?

Mr. GRAHAM. The first notification, real notification, I had that there had been a federation formed was from our own employees.

Chairman WALSH. Was it in writing?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Were any demands made upon you by the men in writing with reference to a conference or anything else?

Mr. GRAHAM. They asked for a joint conference; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was it in writing?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you a copy of the request?

Mr. GRAHAM. I haven't it here; I left it at the hotel. I did not anticipate I would be called on this morning. I will bring it here this afternoon.

(The document referred to was later submitted by witness and appears among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Graham Exhibit No. 1.")

Chairman WALSH. Have you also your reply to that first communication?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you that with you?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, sir; but I will get it this afternoon.

Chairman WALSH. Kindly submit it then.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

(See Graham Exhibit No. 1.)

Chairman WALSH. Can you state concisely, so that we will not have to read it when it comes, what the substance of their communication was and the substance of your reply thereto?

Mr. GRAHAM. The substance of their communication was that they wished me to meet them in conference; that they thought the time had come for a change in the then existing rules and wished me to meet them as a federated body—that is, of shop employees, the different crafts—claiming that they thought it would require less time in dealing with them if we would deal with them as a federation.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would relate as briefly as you can the process of the negotiations and the dealings between you and the men, or attempted dealings, right up to the time of the strike?

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, there wasn't any negotiations further than my letters to them stating that I would be glad to meet with each one separately, but not as a body.

months. I find those acts are working up there very satisfactorily. The public there is put in full possession of the facts and they are able then to make their wishes and their judgment known; instead of providing for an arbitration by one or three or five or seven men, why, the general public acts as an arbiter.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would the creation of such a department by the Government of purely voluntary character, covering all industries, or lines of activity, as far as labor and capital are concerned, would the creation of such a department, with boards that would have authority, would have influence, on the Government to step in and ask contestant parties to use their good offices to mediate for the purpose of adjustment—do you think that would be of benefit to our country generally?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I think it would be of incalculable benefit, not only for the contestants, the employers and employees, but for the financial situation of the corporations. As our Government is organized at the present time the Government has absolute control over the revenues of certainly the railroads and of a great many other corporations, but now we are speaking really of railroads principally. Government has also, through the operation of the numerous laws, a very complete control of their expenses; in other words, the railroads at the present time have very little control over either their revenues or their expenses, therefore it is nothing but just that whatever tribunal has control over the revenues and expenses should investigate at least and report on these industrial troubles, because the ability of the road to pay the wages, in case the investigating board should decide that more wages were necessary, gives them the power to provide the way by which the railroad can get the money to pay these wages.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just referring to the strike situation for a moment; I gathered from what you say, Mr. Kruttschnitt, that your fear was that recognition of the federation of these different trades would place an extraordinary power within their hands to compel you to comply and that it might result in constant trouble with the company. In your experience as a railroad man, does your observation lead you to believe there has been a great number of strikes in railroads—a great number of strikes in the past where the railroads were dealing with individual organizations, such as the Union Pacific, and the Santa Fe, where the railroad strikes ran a long time, and that such strikes have been going on in one way or another for a long time, and don't you think that the bringing together of these trades into a confederation would reduce the possibility of strikes? The evidence submitted here by the officers of these federations shows that they have entered into agreements with some 50 railways and that no strike had occurred, no appearance of strikes, and that the system there put into effect—the evidence is that it has eliminated strikes and friction, while the old system is simply strewn with the wrecks of strikes.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I do not agree with you altogether as to your views as to the frequency of strikes under what I might term the existing plan. I said, in answer to one of the questions of the chairman, that I did not think, if we had agreed to this federation plan, that we should have a strike for one or two or three or four or five years; in other words, we would not have had a strike until the federation was ready. As to the 52 roads you have mentioned, I do not know which they are.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It is in the record.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. The federation is perhaps not ready to do the next thing it has on the program.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is all. "

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you, Mr. Kruttschnitt. You will be permanently excused.

TESTIMONY OF MR. J. F. GRAHAM.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, residence, and occupation, please, Mr. Graham.

Mr. GRAHAM. J. F. Graham; residence, Portland, Oreg.; at the present time I am superintendent of motive power of the O.-W. R. R. N. Co.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe your duties in that capacity, Mr. Graham.

Mr. GRAHAM. My duties in that capacity are to supervise all of the rolling stock and employees who are directly connected with the maintenance of the same.

Chairman WALSH. What craft unions do you deal with as—what craft unions did you deal with as a railroad official prior to the strike of 1911?

Chairman WALSH. Did that cover the procuring of employees for all of the Harriman lines?

Mr. GRAHAM. I could not answer that question; I think it did for the Union Pacific, the Oregon Short Line, and the O.-W. R. R. & N.

Chairman WALSH. Who was the individual in particular charge of that work for that particular company?

Mr. GRAHAM. The man who did the examining was Mr. Daley.

Chairman WALSH. Is he still with your company?

Mr. GRAHAM. He is with the Southern Pacific at the present time.

Chairman WALSH. What position did he occupy at the time the strike was called?

Mr. GRAHAM. He was, I think, chief draftsman for the Union Pacific; that is, in the mechanical department.

Chairman WALSH. Before the calling of the strike, did you employ persons to guard the company's property?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you build any stockades before the strike was called?

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, what would you term stockades?

Chairman WALSH. What has generally been described as being a high fence around the place where the men were to be employed.

Mr. GRAHAM. At our main shops at Albina, or Portland, rather, there had been a high board fence around the shop, inclosing it, for 25 years, and there was both at Starbuck and La Grande a high board fence built that summer, but there had been an appropriation for it about a year prior to that.

Chairman WALSH. Did you build any fences or make any physical preparations for the strike prior to the time it was called at any point?

Mr. GRAHAM. Why, yes; what they already had built prior to the time the strike was called.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I mean with reference to the strike?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; I could not say they were built with reference to the strike.

Chairman WALSH. Now, after the strike was called, did your company employ men to guard the company's property?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How many guards did you have?

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, over the entire system I think we had at one time in the neighborhood of 90.

Chairman WALSH. How did you procure the guards?

Mr. GRAHAM. Oh, our special agents that we have there, an employee of the company, he procured his own men, picking them up.

Chairman WALSH. Who was in charge, before there was any strike, of policing the company's property?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; and had been for years.

Chairman WALSH. And he just increased it in his discretion?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you, or any of your subordinates, make any effort to blacklist men that went on the strike?

Mr. GRAHAM. None.

Chairman WALSH. What steps did your company take, if any, to secure the support of business men or business men's associations or commercial clubs?

Mr. GRAHAM. What is that?

Chairman WALSH. What steps did your company take, or what efforts did it make, if any, to secure the support of business men's associations?

Mr. GRAHAM. I don't know that we did anything in particular in that way.

Chairman WALSH. Did you submit your side of the controversy to business men's organizations out in that country—

Mr. GRAHAM. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). With the idea of having them pass resolutions?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What steps, if any, did you take to give publicity to the company's side of the controversy?

Mr. GRAHAM. We took no steps whatever.

Chairman WALSH. Sir?

Mr. GRAHAM. No steps whatever.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any effort made at any points along the lines to induce merchants to refuse credit to strikers or their families while the strike was going on?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, sir; on the contrary, I think everything had the appearance of them refusing credit to the men who were brought in.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know anything of the character of the men who were employed as special agents or guards after the strike started?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; I don't know any more than just coming in contact with them; they were men I was not particularly acquainted with, with the exception of two I was personally acquainted with.

Chairman WALSH. To your knowledge, or from hearsay, were any of the guards employed during the strike men of bad character or previous criminal record?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Were any guards or special officers arrested for violations of law during the pendency of the strike?

Mr. GRAHAM. I only remember one who was arrested. He had had some little trouble with a man who was trespassing on the company's property.

Chairman WALSH. Just that one case?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is all I remember about.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any of your former employees being arrested during the strike?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; a number of them.

Chairman WALSH. Generally speaking, what were the charges?

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, charges of fighting or assaulting men who were going to or from the shops.

Chairman WALSH. How general was it, Mr. Graham?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not to any very great extent.

Chairman WALSH. Any great number arrested?

Mr. GRAHAM. Oh, I think, all told, there were about 11 arrests made.

Chairman WALSH. During the entire strike?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; that is all the men who went out on the strike, that is my recollection now. I think I have got all that with me at the hotel.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would submit that.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will.

(See Graham Exhibit No. 2.)

Chairman WALSH. Were there any violations in which serious injury was inflicted or life was lost?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; not any more than injuries, beating a man up, having a sore head for a few days.

Chairman WALSH. Was liquor permitted in the inclosure about your shops where the strike breakers lived?

Mr. GRAHAM. Absolutely not.

Chairman WALSH. Have wages been increased or reduced since the strike?

Mr. GRAHAM. There has been some slight increase since the strike, which I will submit later.

Chairman WALSH. You have that, have you?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would.

(See Graham Exhibit No. 3.)

Chairman WALSH. I am going to ask you about the wages paid in your shop. What are the wages paid to helpers, Mr. Graham?

Mr. GRAHAM. Twenty-three cents an hour to machinists' helpers.

Chairman WALSH. What is that?

Mr. GRAHAM. Twenty-three cents an hour to machinist helpers, and also blacksmith helpers. That varies, you know, from 21 cents up to 25 cents. It is in relation to the fire that is on.

Chairman WALSH. Shop clerks, what are their salaries?

Mr. GRAHAM. Our shop clerks, from $65 to $110.

Chairman WALSH. Approximately, how many at $65, and what proportion would that be—that would be your minimum; that is, $65 per month to $110 per month?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; I could not tell you just how many there are at each. I think I have that, too.

(See Graham Exhibit No. 4.)

Chairman WALSH. But the minimum is $65 and the maximum $110?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; the minimum is that, except for the office boy, the younger, junior, clerk in the office, you know.

Chairman WALSH. Is there more than one in each office?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have only one in my office.

Chairman WALSH. Car helpers and repairers, what are their wages?

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, their wages vary from 21 cents up to 27 and 27½ cents an hour.

Chairman WALSH. Blacksmiths?

Mr. GRAHAM. Blacksmiths, their wages are from 28 cents up to as high as 45 cents.

Chairman WALSH. How many hours per day do the car repairers work?

Mr. GRAHAM. Ten hours.

Chairman WALSH. And blacksmiths?

Mr. GRAHAM. Nine hours.

Chairman WALSH. And what is the pay rate for machinists?

Mr. GRAHAM. Prior to the strike and at the time of the strike machinists were getting 42 cents an hour; now 44.

Chairman WALSH. And boiler makers?

Mr. GRAHAM. Boiler makers, as high as—paid at the time of the strike; that is, the ordinary boiler maker was 44 cents.

Chairman WALSH. How does the present efficiency of your shop compare with that of the force you had prior to the strike?

Mr. GRAHAM. At the present time?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM. One hundred per cent.

Chairman WALSH. They compare favorably, then?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was your objection to the System Federation based on the demand that all the Harriman lines negotiate as a unit, rather than with the crafts—asking that your company deal with them as a unit?

Mr. GRAHAM. Our company, the company I represent.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would state, as briefly as you can, the reason for your objections, Mr. Graham. You need not go into detail, because we will have to hurry through in order to let some of these other gentlemen get away.

Mr. GRAHAM. In the first place, it meant the turning of the management practically over to the men. They would dictate who you should hire; they would dictate the men—if this was adopted, they would dictate who you should hire; they would govern the hours of labor; they demanded that the hours of labor be uniform in all shops in the different crafts regardless of conditions, which is hardly practicable in any railroad shop, for the reason that the hours of labor—the work may require more hours to keep the repairing up in the car department than in the locomotive department, so that it is not practicable. Furthermore, the men in the car department when you made contracts asked for a 10-hour day, insisted on it. And it also meant that every man employed become a member of the organization—whatever organization it was in this federation—and they gave them 30 days' time after their contracts were entered into to join. And I also considered that meant the throttling of industrial freedom for the employee. I have always contended that any employee had a perfect right whatever—his inalienable right; he can belong to the union if he wanted to, or he can refrain from it if he wanted to, and that he should have the same right and privileges in the shop that the union men had. We never question a man when we are hiring him—or did before this—whether he was union or nonunion.

Chairman WALSH. Briefly, without going into detail, how did you start in the railroad service? Did you come up from the ranks or otherwise?

Mr. GRAHAM. From a machinist.

Chairman WALSH. You are a machinist?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What other official positions did you occupy until you got to the present one?

Mr. GRAHAM. What?

Chairman WALSH. What official positions have you held with the railroad company?

Mr. GRAHAM. Oh, I was foreman in various shops. I have worked both in railroad shops and in contract shops for the past 29 years, almost 30 years. I have either been foreman or master mechanic, or superintendent of motive power. For the last 22 years, you might say—yes, 22 years—I have held the position as superintendent of motive power.

My present position I have occupied for 20 years. Two years prior to that I was in the same capacity on the Iowa Central. It was not—I did not have the title as superintendent of motive power there. It was general master mechanic. I do not assume to give the title as superintendent of motive power.

Commissioner AISHTON. I understood your testimony was that about two weeks' time in every year was occupied in negotiations on schedules with the organizations of the shop crafts?

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, when we first entered into that, about two weeks, but the first we went into was with the machinists in October, 1909, and I put in a little over a week with them at that time. Then came up next was the boiler makers, and I think I was there about two days with them. Then the carmen; no, the blacksmiths and then the carmen. These were easy after we had made a contract with the one; the others were practically the same.

Commissioner AISHTON. In other words, certain rules applied to—

Mr. GRAHAM (interrupting). The only difference there was was in the carmen; they asked for a 10-hour day. They wanted more time.

Commissioner AISHTON. How about the carmen? Carmen are not ranked as skilled laborers the same as machinists; they do not require the same degree of efficiency, do they?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; not as a general thing, except such as coach carpenters, upholsters, and painters.

Commissioner AISHTON. But on freight-car repairing?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; most anyone can build himself up to a freight-car repairer.

Commissioner AISHTON. Any man that can handle a hammer and saw and drive a nail can be a car repairer?

Mr. GRAHAM. In other words, it is not class work.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you. Please submit the data. You are excused permanently.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HENRY C. BAINING.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name, address, and occupation.

Mr. BAINING. Henry C. Baining, 9437 Champlain Avenue, Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. Occupation?

Mr. BAINING. Truck builder.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a married man?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How many children have you?

Mr. BAINING. I have three.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you been married?

Mr. BAINING. Fifteen years.

Chairman WALSH. Are you employed at the present time?

Mr. BAINING. No.

Chairman WALSH. Where have you lived, during the period of your married life?

Mr. BAINING. In Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. Chicago?

Mr. BAINING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. During the entire 15 years?

Mr. BAINING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You are a native of what place?

Mr. BAINING. Of the United States.

Chairman WALSH. Of what State of the United States?

Mr. BAINING. The State of Illinois.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever work for the Illinois Central Railroad Co.?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How long did you work for them?

Mr. BAINING. Two years.

Chairman WALSH. What was your line of occupation?

Mr. BAINING. Truck building.

Chairman WALSH. What were your wages when you were working for them?

Mr. BAINING. Seventeen and seventeen and one-half cents an hour.

Chairman WALSH. And where did you work for the company?

Mr. BAINING. I worked as a pipe-fitter helper.

Chairman WALSH. Where?

Mr. BAINING. At the Illinois Central, Burnside.

Chairman WALSH. What shop?

Mr. BAINING. Burnside shop.

Chairman WALSH. Do you remember, was your pay increased during the time you were there?

Mr. BAINING. It was, after I changed into truck building.

Chairman WALSH. What did you get as a truck builder?

Mr. BAINING. Well, I was working piecework and daywork. I was getting 19 cents an hour daywork.

Chairman WALSH. What was your average monthly pay check when you were making 19 cents an hour?

Mr. BAINING. About thirty-five to thirty-six a month.

Chairman WALSH. About what?

Mr. BAINING. Thirty-five to thirty-six a month.

Chairman WALSH. Thirty-five to thirty-six dollars a month?

Mr. BAINING. Yes; but we got piecework between that.

Chairman WALSH. What?

Mr. BAINING. We got piecework that made an average of about $55 a month.

Chairman WALSH. So your total average amounted to about $55 a month?

Mr. BAINING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What house rent do you pay?

Mr. BAINING. Fifteen dollars a month.

Chairman WALSH. What would your grocery and meat bills average?

Mr. BAINING. Oh, they would average $20, $22, or $23 a month.

Chairman WALSH. Have you figured it up so you could give it with any degree of accuracy?

Mr. BAINING. No; I have not.

Chairman WALSH. How do you get at it being $22 or $23 a month?

Mr. BAINING. Well, some months, of course, it would be that we would buy, in wintertime, we could buy a little more meat in the piece more than we could in the summer, because it kept better and longer, and you could buy a bigger piece and you could get it cheaper than in the summer.

Chairman WALSH. Is your life insured?

Mr. BAINING. It is not now; it was.

Chairman WALSH. It is not now?

Mr. BAINING. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. During the time you were working, did you carry insurance on your life?

Mr. BAINING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. In what company?

Mr. BAINING. I was in the Independent Order of Affairs, the Canadian Order of Affairs.

Chairman WALSH. How much insurance did you carry?

Mr. BAINING. One thousand dollars.

Chairman WALSH. Approximately, what premium did you pay?

Mr. BAINING. One dollar and fifty-five cents.

Chairman WALSH. Was your wife and children insured?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Your children?

Mr. BAINING. My children, they carried theirs in an insurance policy, the Metropolitan.

Chairman WALSH. Industrial insurance company?

Mr. BAINING. No.

Chairman WALSH. In the Metropolitan?

Mr. BAINING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Was your wife insured, also?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What did her insurance cost?

Mr. BAINING. Her insurance, she was in a Catholic order; some months it would be cheaper than others, but it was an average of about $1.05 a month.

Chairman WALSH. Does she still carry insurance?

Mr. BAINING. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What did it cost for the insurance of your children?

Mr. BAINING. Well, it cost 60 cents a week.

Chairman WALSH. Did your house rent include fuel and light, or either one?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How much did you pay for your house rent, you say?

Mr. BAINING. Fifteen dollars a month.

Chairman WALSH. And was the house heated, or do you live in an apartment?

Mr. BAINING. I heated the house myself.

Chairman WALSH. You heated it?

Mr. BAINING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have to buy fuel in addition to your house rent?

Mr. BAINING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And what did that cost, was my first question; what did your fuel cost?

Mr. BAINING. It cost about $7.75 per ton for coal.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of coal?

Mr. BAINING. Hard coal.

Chairman WALSH. How much coal did you burn per year?

Mr. BAINING. Oh, about 7 tons.

Chairman WALSH. About 7 tons?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What were your milk bills per month?

Mr. BAINING. We got a quart of milk every day, at 8 cents a quart.

Chairman WALSH. Have you figured out what it cost you to live during this time? You say your house rent was $15; my recollection is your grocery bill was $22.

Mr. BAINING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And insurance for yourself, how much?

Mr. BAINING. One dollar and fifty-five cents.

Chairman WALSH. Insurance for your wife, how much?

Mr. BAINING. One dollar and five cents.

Chairman WALSH. And insurance for the children?

Mr. BAINING. About 60 cents.

Chairman WALSH. About 60 cents a what?

Mr. BAINING. A week.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have three of them insured?

Mr. BAINING. Two of them. I didn't have the third one then.

Chairman WALSH. I don't understand that 60 cents a week; 60 cents a week for the two children?

Mr. BAINING. Yes; 15 cents a week apiece.

Chairman WALSH. Fifteen cents a week each?

Mr. BAINING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How did you light your house?

Mr. BAINING. With gas.

Chairman WALSH. What did it cost you per month for gas?

Mr. BAINING. Our gas bill ran about $2.50 to $2.60 a month.

Chairman WALSH. And the milk, how much per month?

Mr. BAINING. Oh, about $2.40—something like that.

Chairman WALSH. How often did you have to buy shoes for your children?

Mr. BAINING. About every six weeks.

Chairman WALSH. As I figure the actual expense, it is $50.58 per month. How often do you buy a new suit of clothes for yourself?

Mr. BAINING. I haven't bought one yet.

Chairman WALSH. What is that?

Mr. BAINING. I didn't buy one in six years.

Chairman WALSH. Didn't buy a suit of clothes in six years?

Mr. BAINING. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you get any help from any other member of your family? Did you wife work?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. At what occupation?

Mr. BAINING. She took in two boarders.

Chairman WALSH. Kept two boarders?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You say that you at some period did piecework?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would describe what the change was from daywork to piecework; what was it; how was it changed to piecework?

Mr. BAINING. It is in the daywork, piecework; when you work piecework you have to work hard, slave; when you work daywork you didn't have to work quite as hard; didn't have to work quite as hard.

Chairman WALSH. What was the difference in your compensation, in pay?

Mr. BAINING. Well, quite a bit of difference.

Chairman WALSH. How much did you make when you were on piecework?

Mr. BAINING. On piecework, from 35 cents an hour.

Chairman WALSH. What would your pay check amount to when you were on piecework?

Mr. BAINING. Well, it would come up to, some months, come up to as high as $60 to $65 a month.

Chairman WALSH. Would you prefer to work on a piecework basis, or on the hour basis?

Mr. BAINING. Well, I would prefer on the hour basis.

Chairman WALSH. Why?

Mr. BAINING. I would not be so tired when I got home, when I got through with our work.

Chairman WALSH. Well, were you more tired on the piecework system than you were on the hour system?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you observe any particular effect that it had upon your health?

Mr. BAINING. Well, the only thing I found out was it reduced me—in two years' time it reduced me 11 pounds.

Chairman WALSH. You were 11 pounds lighter?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Were you ill at any time during the time you were on piecework?

Mr. BAINING. No; I was not exactly ill.

Chairman WALSH. Now, in what manner—you say you were required to speed up—in what manner were you required to speed up?

Mr. BAINING. If we were working on a kindle-truck frame, put 44 rivets on a kindle, and if an ajax truck, we put 18. And he would run behind with the heavy rivets, and the ajax truck, they would put us back. On the kindle truck we could knock them out quicker than we could the ajax, and we used to get quite a bunch of ajax trucks, and they are a heavier truck frame than the kindle-truck frame.

Chairman WALSH. I want to get what other facts you have upon which you base your conclusion that they speeded you up? Was there a time study made of the time of the different operations performed?

Mr. BAINING. Well, we had only so many hours—we had so many hours—we had nine hours to work in—and wanted to get our day's work out.

Chairman WALSH. Well, who set the task? Who set the amount of work that was to be done?

Mr. BAINING. Why, there was nobody—

Chairman WALSH. Nobody set it? • •

Mr. BAINING. No.

Chairman WALSH. You did not have any time study?

Mr. BAINING. No.

Chairman WALSH. You did not have any bonus?

Mr. BAINING. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How old are your children?

Mr. BAINING. Well, one is 13, the oldest; the other will be 10, and the baby will be 2 in May.

Chairman WALSH. Do both of the older ones go to school?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir. •

Chairman WALSH. Where do you live in the city? How far from the center of the city?

Mr. BAINING. I live at Ninety-fifth Street.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have any expenses for car fare?

Mr. BAINING. I do now. When I go out looking for work anywhere.

Chairman WALSH. I mean, when you were working, did you have any expenses for car fare?

Mr. BAINING. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you go out on the strike?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. When?

Mr. BAINING. I think it was the 30th of September.

Chairman WALSH. What have you done since, Mr. Baining?

Mr. BAINING. Oh, I have been knocking around, doing little odds and ends of jobs, doing repair work and digging garden and—oh, little jobs that I could do, like building fences and painting sheds, and so forth.

Chairman WALSH. Have you undertaken to get regular work?

Mr. BAINING. Well, I have worked out in Hegewisch a while and out in Pullman off and on, and work two or three months and then get laid off and shut out again.

Chairman WALSH. I was going to ask you how long a period of permanent employment have you had since you went out on a strike?

Mr. BAINING. I worked about eight months steady.

Chairman WALSH. Did you consider the possible consequences to yourself and family of going on a strike, Mr. Baining, before you went out?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What determined in your mind, finally, the fact that you would go out?

Mr. BAINING. Why, to get better terms.

Chairman WALSH. Were you a member of the craft organization during all the time you were on the Illinois Central?

Mr. BAINING. No; not all the time. I was in the last six or seven months—last eight months that I worked there.

Chairman WALSH. Had you belonged to any union prior to that time?

Mr. BAINING. Yes; the car workers.

Chairman WALSH. What was the nature of your employment prior to the time that you worked on the Illinois Central? Had you been with any other railroads?

Mr. BAINING. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That was your first employment with a railroad?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What had been your employment prior to that time?

Mr. BAINING. Before I went to work for the railroad?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAINING. Drop-forge worker.

Chairman WALSH. What company did you work for immediately before?

Mr. BAINING. I worked for the Union Drop Forge over on Ohio and Orleans.

Chairman WALSH. Were you married, in Chicago?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until 2 o'clock, and please be here at 2 o'clock, Mr. Baining. Somebody may have some questions to ask you.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m., of this Saturday, April 10, 1915.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. Please take the stand again, Mr. Baining.

Mr. Aishton, did you desire to ask Mr. Baining any questions?

Commissioner AISHTON. No, sir; I did not. I think Mr. Ballard had a question to ask of the witness.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Ballard has a few questions he would like to submit to you.

Commissioner BALLARD. I will just ask you—you say while you were working at this shop your wife had two boarders?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. What did they pay per week?

Mr. BAINING. Four and one-half dollars per week.

Commissioner BALLARD. Apiece?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. The two paid $9 a week, and that amounts to nearly $40 a month that your wife got?

Mr. BAINING. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. You say you struck because you wanted to get better conditions and better wages?

Mr. BAINING. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. Who persuaded you to strike?

Mr. BAINING. Who persuaded me to strike?

Commissioner BALLARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAINING. My own conscience.

Commissioner BALLARD. You thought that you were not getting enough?

Mr. BAINING. I didn't think I was—I was getting enough, but I was not treated right.

Commissioner BALLARD. How long ago was that?

Mr. BAINING. Four years the 30th of December.

Commissioner BALLARD. Have you ever had as good a job since?

Mr. BAINING. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. You did not keep it, though?

Mr. BAINING. I could not hold it on account of bad times.

Commissioner BALLARD. And you have none now?

Mr. BAINING. No, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Mr. Baining. You will be permanently excused.

Mr. Fuller. Is Mr. Fuller in the room?

TESTIMONY OF MR. C. E. FULLER.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, please.

Mr. FULLER. C. E. Fuller.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. FULLER. Superintendent of motive power of the Union Pacific Railroad.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe your duties as superintendent of motive power of the Union Pacific?

Mr. FULLER. General supervision of all matters pertaining to the maintenance of equipment and mechanical matters.

Chairman WALSH. Did you hold the same position in 1903?

Mr. FULLER. Not on the Union Pacific.

Chairman WALSH. What position did you hold with the Union Pacific in 1903?

Mr. FULLER. I was not with the Union Pacific in 1903.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would tell us what your various employments—official employments—have been, commencing with this one; you have already stated that, but go backward for the last 10 or 15 or 20 years.

Mr. FULLER. Do you want me to go backward or begin at the beginning?

Chairman WALSH. Go backward—whichever way you please.

Mr. FULLER. Well, prior to being on the Union Pacific I was superintendent of motive power of the Chicago & Alton Railroad; prior to that assistant superintendent of motive power of the Erie.

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). How long were you with the Chicago & Alton?

Mr. FULLER. A little over five years. Then I was assistant mechanical superintendent of the Erie for about three years; superintendent of motive power of the Central of Vermont for eight years prior to that; prior to that master mechanic of the Erie for about three years; prior to that apprentice—mechanical engineer, machinist, roundhouse foreman, and general foreman of the shops of the Vandalla.

Chairman WALSH. Could you tell us, as a matter of history of the Union Pacific, what the causes of the strike of 1903 were and how it was settled?

Mr. FULLER. I know very little of the trouble with the Union Pacific at that time. I learned more about it to-day than I really ever have known before; it seems to have been some kind of piecework introduction.

Chairman WALSH. But you have no personal knowledge of it?

Mr. FULLER. I have no personal knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Any more than we have already learned here?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. State what craft unions you have dealt with prior to the strike of 1911, how the contracts and agreements were made, what time it took to make them, and the typical points of difference that were raised at such conferences; in other words, in hurrying to let some of you gentlemen off, I wish you would epitomize the things as you have heard them put to the other witnesses.

Mr. FULLER. The conferences with the crafts were principally with the machinists, blacksmiths, and carmen. The conferences were on wages, as well as conditions prevailing in the shops. The last conference I had, as I remember, with the machinists, took three days and one-half, with the boiler makers or blacksmiths about a day or a day and a half, and with the carmen about a day.

9914 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Chairman WALSH. And what were the points you say that came up, just wages?

Mr. FULLER. Simply wages and conditions under which the men worked in the shops.

Chairman WALSH. What was your first notification from the newly organized federation that there had been such a federation formed?

Mr. FULLER. In the latter part of June or the early part of July, 1911, I received a communication from our machinists by Mr. Grace and from our carmen through their secretary, Mr. Tucker, and from the boiler makers from—I forget his name—and two communications from outsiders, from California, representing themselves as covering the blacksmiths and the shop federations on the Harriman lines, by John Scott. I will file these if you wish with the correspondence and their schedules.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would.

(The witness submitted the correspondence referred to. It appears among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Fuller Exhibit.")

You spoke of schedules. You mean schedules of demands that they had?

Mr. FULLER. Schedules of demands, including wages and conditions.

Chairman WALSH. Could you give us the substance of the demands that were contained in this schedule that were not usually contained in schedules of the craft unions, if any?

Mr. FULLER. The closed shop was the principal one, giving us notice that within 30 days any employees who did not belong to the crafts would be given 30 days to join on the signing of the agreement.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a request accompanying it to the effect that the dues of the members should be kept out of their pay by the company?

Mr. FULLER. No request of that kind has ever been made to our knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Please state the substance of what was your reply.

Mr. FULLER. I would like to read this. They were practically all the same with the exception of one to the men in California. I replied on the 29th of July to Mr. Grace as follows [reading]:

"Your favor of June 30 received, and in reply would advise that if a committee of machinists desire to meet me to discuss the machinists' working rules I will be very glad to arrange for a meeting with such committee as in the past, but can not accede to the request to meet with other crafts at the same time."

I replied to Mr. Scott on July 29, in California [reading]:

"Your letter under date of 27th received, and in reply beg to advise that it has always been the policy of this company to deal directly with its own employees and we can not see our way clear to deviate from this practice. If any classes of our employees desire a change in their present working rules and schedules, they fully understand that upon their direct request they will be given a hearing and full consideration."

Chairman WALSH. Now, did you have any other communications with men prior to the strike?

Mr. FULLER. My letters were the last that I have heard in any way, shape, or form.

Chairman WALSH. Why were the demands contained in the request objected to by you?

Mr. FULLER. The closed shop was the principal objectionable feature and their desire to meet as a federated body.

Chairman WALSH. How was the policy of your line and of the other lines, the Harriman lines, determined toward this proposition? Just state whether any conferences were had with any other officials or any correspondence, the substance of any correspondence that took place between you.

Mr. FULLER. There was no correspondence to my knowledge. We did in the summer ascertain whether or not the crafts on the other lines had made the same request and were informed they had. After that there was nothing done, there was nothing that came up. We waited from in July until the strike was called to see whether they would come to us locally or not. They did not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you make any effort to meet the men and discuss the new question raised by the federated trades?

Mr. FULLER. We did not.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any effort made by either side to bring about mediation, conciliation, or arbitration?

Mr. FULLER. Not that I know of. As time went on, I was approached by a good many of the men to explain what the situation was. It was plain that very few of them knew exactly what this federated movement meant. And on August 28, 1911, I issued the following letter, which I would like to read, if you care to hear it.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would.

Mr. FULLER [reading]:

"OMAHA, NEBR., August 28, 1911.

"To all shop employees of the Union Pacific Railroad Co.:

"In view of the rumors of an impending strike on the part of shop employees of Union Pacific Railroad Co., growing out of certain demands of the federation of shop employees of all the Harriman lines, it is deemed important that the men fully understand the exact character of the demands which are made upon the company and of the situation in which it places the shop employees themselves. The company therefore presents to you a concise statement of the principal demands made by the federation, together with a number of reasons showing why the demands are not fair and should be withdrawn.

"1. It is demanded that the Union Pacific Railroad Co. shall no longer treat directly with its own employees, or its own crafts or organizations, but that it shall deal with a federation of shop employees consisting of workmen employed upon the Southern Pacific, Oregon Short Line, Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation Co., and other Harriman lines, including the Union Pacific.

"This company submits for consideration whether it would be wise in view of the friendly relations now existing between the company and its men, relations which are constantly improving, to disrupt the ties that bind together the company and its employees for the mere purpose of meeting the demands of workmen engaged upon other roads, whose interests are entirely separate and distinct from those of the employees of the Union Pacific Railroad Co.

"2. The demand is made that the company stop treating with the separate mechanical crafts of its employees and that it deal with a federation of craftsmen engaged in shopwork, consisting of machinists, blacksmiths, boiler makers, car-department employees, and others.

"This company has had schedules with its various crafts, each of which works under conditions peculiar to itself, and the relations in so dealing with the crafts have been pleasant and satisfactory. The result of this demand, if granted, would be that certain crafts would have the privilege of insisting upon demands for other crafts, which might involve matters in direct conflict with the interests of the individual crafts.

"3. The demand is made that the men in charge of mechanics must be mechanics.

"In other words, that foremen must belong to their organization, because in order to be a mechanic under the proposed rules an employee must be a member.

"4. The demand is made that the competency of employees entering the service shall be determined within 30 days.

"Under such a rule, if a workman was found to be incompetent after 30 days' service he could not be discharged on that ground.

"5. It is demanded that employees shall not be requested to undergo any form of physical examination or make out any form of personal record.

"The enforcement of such a rule would prevent the company from ascertaining the actual truth as to the physical, moral, and other qualifications of the men it seeks to employ.

"6. It is demanded that men shall not be required to work on engines outside of shops in bad weather; that no work shall be done on engines undergoing repairs until they have been cleaned; and that roundhouses shall be piled within 90 days, in order to carry away the steam blown out of engines.

"As to these demands it must be apparent, first, that there are times when it is absolutely necessary to have certain repairs done on engines outside of the shops in bad weather, and an absolute rule forbidding it would materially interfere with the service which the public is entitled to have; second, it must also be obvious that it is impossible to always clean the engines before any repair work is done upon them. The enforcement of such a rule would frequently prevent the use of a locomotive when imperatively needed to clear up a congestion of traffic; third, the company is piping all of its new roundhouses for the purpose of carrying away steam blown off from engines and within a reasonable time all of its roundhouses will be so equipped. The company is improving the physical condition of its property as fast as circumstances will permit. The present excellent condition of its railroad, including buildings, speaks for itself.

"7. The demand is made that a workman be not discharged or suspended without the previous consent of a committee of shop employees.

"The enforcement of such a rule would deprive the company of the power to maintain discipline.

"8. It is demanded that employees in outlying districts be given leave of absence and transportation upon 10 days' demand without regard to the needs of the company or the number of applicants asking for leave at the same time, or the ability of the company to furnish substitutes.

"9. It is demanded that all present and future employees not members shall join the organization making the demands in 30 days.

"This means, of course, the discharge of all employees who will not or can not obtain membership in the organization.

"10. The adoption of a rule is demanded which will result in the promotion of the oldest man in a given shop to the position of foreman whenever a vacancy occurs.

"The enforcement of such a rule would mean not only that the company would be deprived of the privilege of selecting its own officers, but in addition thereto might mean the selection of a foreman who was utterly incompetent to direct the labors of other employees however skillful he might be as a workman under the supervision of some other foreman.

"11. The demand is made that employees who are sent to the hospital for injuries or sickness shall remain there as long as the patients and the members of their organization think it necessary, regardless of the views of the experienced surgeons in charge.

"12. It is demanded that all employees be paid by the hour, abolishing all monthly bonus or premium systems of compensation, notwithstanding the fact that some of the crafts in the past have requested the bonus system, which has enabled them to make high premiums over their daily wages.

"13. The demand is made for a flat increase of 7 cents per hour and a bonus of one hour per week for all shop employees, and in addition thereto other methods of increasing the compensation for time worked, which, in the aggregate, would increase the expenses of Union Pacific Railroad Co. alone $1,500,000 per year.

"Attention is called to the fact that Union Pacific shop employees have received two general increases in pay since 1906, averaging an increase of 15 per cent for all shopmen; the rate of skilled mechanics being raised in this period from a minimum of 34 and a maximum of 37 cents to a minimum of 40 and a maximum of 43 cents per hour. The present rate of pay is generally higher than on other roads in our territory.

"With the business of the country rapidly declining, having held the re-trenchment of forces longer than other lines in the same territory, this company deplores the present situation when it has striven so hard in the past to do as well or better than its neighboring competing lines in the matter of wages and expenditures to provide better shop facilities. It would therefore seem unwise and unjust in view of the treatment heretofore extended that the men should at this time inject a condition that further reduces prosperity and employment.

"This company feels that it has no right to present demands to its employees that are unreasonable or unfair, and it feels that the shopmen have no right to present to it, particularly at this time, conditions that are unfair. On the other hand, it feels that it ought to have the support and encouragement of its shopmen instead of embarrassment and attack.

"Attention is called to the fact that in the new shops at Omaha and in all the shops being erected upon the line in other places the most modern sanitary devices and other modern improvements are being installed, and that everything possible is being done to increase the comfort and convenience of the workmen which it gives the company pleasure to do.

"The employees of the company are also reminded that a pension system has been adopted for their benefit which provides for liberal compensation and free transportation during old age, and that many of the shopmen are now on the pension roll and many others are nearing the age when they will be entitled to such benefits.

"The company has endeavored to treat its employees with consideration and fairness, and now that it is struggling with the burdens of adverse legislation, rate reductions, material tax increases, and a large reduction in earnings, due to depressed business conditions throughout the country, it submits for the candid consideration of its shopmen whether it is not unwise for them to be making demands which the company can not meet and producing conditions which may result in the utter demoralization of business conditions, curtailed employment, and in hardship and suffering for themselves and their families.

"The management will continue as heretofore to meet its employees of the respective crafts in such conferences as may be mutually agreed to and as heretofore advised."

Chairman WALSH. Were there any other efforts made to forestall or advise against the strike?

Mr. FULLER. I think what effort was made was made by the officers, who came in contact with the men from time to time.

Chairman WALSH. Was there then a concerted effort on the part of the company's officials to avert the strike?

Mr. FULLER. No; there wasn't any concerted action. The conditions on the Union Pacific railroad were as near a family condition as you could possibly find. The most harmonious relation existed between employees and employer. The men were free to talk to me wherever I went and as free to talk to their immediate officers. And what prompted this letter was the fact that so many men, as I went over the line, and the officers called my attention to the fact that the men were not familiar with the situation, and we felt that it was our duty to place the facts before them in as concise a form as possible, and then let them use their best judgment.

Chairman WALSH. Were there any preparations made for the strike prior to the strike—

Mr. FULLER (interrupting). None whatever.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). That is, the employment of strike breakers, building of stockades—

Mr. FULLER (interrupting). None whatever.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). And fences?

Mr. FULLER. None whatever.

Chairman WALSH. Briefly state what was done afterwards as to the employment of guards. How many were employed, and how did you obtain them, and all that—the same as you have heard asked some other witnesses?

Mr. FULLER. At the time of the shop strike we of course used every effort to fill our shops with competent men. I sent a man of my staff to Chicago, who examined and employed practically all the men employed at that point, with the assistance of others that he picked up. We commenced at once to also employ natives—men who lived in the towns where our shops were located—and for the first three months—October, November, and December—we employed about 50 per cent of the number of men that went out; that is, outside. We then employed, as I say inside, in their town, clerks, druggists, soldiers, street car drivers, motormen—I guess we have got every profession there is in our shops to-day—young men that wanted to learn the trade. We took them in and educated them, until we have got practically 90 per cent natives of the towns through which the road runs. We employed guards—not that we had any knowledge of what might occur, but we felt it wise to protect our property and to protect our men. We are very happy to say that it was the best investment ever made, because we did not need them. Our men who went out on strike conducted themselves, as a general thing, in a gentlemanly manner. We employed about 400 guards and distributed them over the different sections of the railroad. These men were employed in towns along the line of the road in most cases. A few were got—I think there were 12 brought from Chicago; I think they were the first guards that were employed—they were all at Omaha.

Chairman WALSH. What steps did you take to give publicity to the company's side of the case?

Mr. FULLER. We didn't do very much. I had an awful time to keep from giving it. I was requested first by the boards of trade and commercial clubs to give a statement; but what to give, we did not know; and finally we formulated this letter that we sent to the shopmen, and we handed that to the commercial men and to the boards of trade who asked for it in the different towns, and we then gave it to such papers as asked for it. That is the only newspaper article that appeared, to my knowledge, from the time of the strike up to the present time that was given by the railroad company.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any effort made to blacklist the men that went on strike, to keep them from obtaining employment?

Mr. FULLER. Not to my knowledge; no, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have any knowledge of strikers being denied the privilege of working for contractors engaged in the construction of round-houses on your road?

Mr. FULLER. Not to my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any of them being denied the privilege of working at the company's ice plants, cutting ice, while the strike was going on?

Mr. FULLER. Not to my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Did you use any effort with the merchants in the towns along your road to induce them to refuse credit to the strikers along the line?

Mr. FULLER. Not to my knowledge. I will say, very frankly, that we absolutely refrained from in any way interfering with our ex-shop employees. We felt they were citizens and they had a right to leave our service, and felt that in doing that they did not place themselves where we had any right to interfere with them, and we have not done it.

Chairman WALSH. Have the wages been increased or reduced since the strike?

Mr. FULLER. The wages have been increased since the strike. In July, 1913, we gave all shop employees voluntarily an increase.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please give me the rate of pay? First, describe what increase you gave them and to what character of employees it applied.

Mr. FULLER. We gave every employee in the shop, every class of labor, 1 cent increase.

Chairman WALSH. One cent per hour?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; 1 cent per hour. That was July, 1913.

Chairman WALSH. What was the pay to the shop clerks?

Mr. FULLER. I don't know what you mean by "shop clerks." Do you mean the clerks that worked in the shops?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. FULLER. It runs from, I think, $60—there may be a few at $50—I think it runs from $60 to $125, depending on the duties and the hours that they work—whatever the shops work; if the shops are working eight hours, they work eight hours, and if the shops work nine hours, they work nine hours.

Chairman WALSH. What do the shops work?

Mr. FULLER. At the present time the shops work eight hours a day, with the exception of the car department, which works nine hours.

Chairman WALSH. What are car builders and repairers paid?

Mr. FULLER. Car builders and repairers were paid from 21 to 26 cents an hour.

Chairman WALSH. And they got the increase you mentioned?

Mr. FULLER. Yes, sir; and I will give the figures before or after, whichever you prefer.

Chairman WALSH. Give them at the present time.

Mr. FULLER. From 21 to 26 cents an hour.

Chairman WALSH. And the blacksmiths?

Mr. FULLER. The blacksmiths get from 41 to 44 cents an hour.

Chairman WALSH. And the machinists?

Mr. FULLER. They get from 41 to 44 cents an hour.

Chairman WALSH. And the boiler makers?

Mr. FULLER. From 41 to 44 cents an hour.

Chairman WALSH. How does the efficiency of your present force of shopmen compare with the force prior to the strike?

Mr. FULLER. We consider our present efficiency as equal in every respect.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell has a few questions to ask you.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I want to ask a few questions.

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I want to ask a question or two first.

Did your company sue out any injunctions?

Mr. FULLER. We did not.

Chairman WALSH. Were there any fatalities during the strike—any persons killed on the Union Pacific?

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Grace said yesterday a watchman was killed. I remember something of that kind. I would not say it is so, but I guess he is correct, for I heard something of that kind; that is the only one.

Chairman WALSH. I believe the Omaha tornado occurred during this strike?

Mr. FULLER. The Omaha tornado occurred on Easter Sunday, 1913. It was a very disastrous affair, destroying hundreds of houses—I guess I might say thousands—and killed about 140 or 150 people, making a path through the city about half a mile wide and about 8 miles long.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any assistance rendered to your company by these strikers following the tornado?

Mr. FULLER. There was.

Chairman WALSH. Just describe what it was, please.

Mr. FULLER. On Monday morning I had a check made of every employee in the motive-power department to see if they were on duty and sent out about 150 men with instructions to locate those absent and report their condition, whether they or members of their families had been injured, and whether their property had been destroyed, and by 1.30 we had a very complete report. When the report came in we heard of some of our old employees who were in distress, and we immediately sent men to their homes or where they were stopping, and we checked all employees that were injured, whether in the service then or prior to the strike. We gave assistance to all our employees, both in money, furniture, fuel, grocery supplies, and everything, and even rented rooms for them. We did exactly the same for the former employees; some of them would not take it; others did. We gave them money if money was needed. If they wanted groceries, we sent them groceries. We sent them coal. We sent them anything they wanted, which was done independent of the city's relief. The city had a relief committee out, but we felt an interest in these boys. I was in the tornado zone myself, and my house was badly damaged, but no one in the house hurt. The railroad and the employees donated their money freely, and we raised a very handsome fund, which was distributed to our employees who suffered, as well as the old employees. Some of the old employees, as stated, would not take it. I do not know why, but presume they felt they did not want to take it; others took the relief.

Chairman WALSH. What was your original service with the railroad company, Mr. Fuller? How did you start in the railway service? Did you rise from the ranks of the mechanics, or how?

Mr. FULLER. I worked a year for nothing, to get a start in the drawing room of the Vandalla Railroad, and after serving four years in the drawing room and becoming chief draftsman, I then went into the shop and commenced at 50 cents a day to learn my trade, and served five years.

Chairman WALSH. What was the trade?

Mr. FULLER. I served through every branch of the mechanical department; I went to every department of the shop—machine shop and blacksmith shop, roundhouse, and so forth and obtained as good a knowledge of the entire branch of the motive-power department as I could.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just continuing that line, were you master mechanic at Olean, N. Y., at one time?

Mr. FULLER. No, sir; I was master mechanic at Jersey City.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In this circular, Mr. Fuller, that was just read into the record, of which I have a copy, dated Omaha, Nebr., August 28, 1911, in the first paragraph in this circular it reads:

"It is demanded that the Union Pacific Railroad Co. shall no longer treat directly with its own employees."

I have also a copy of the agreement presented to the Union Pacific Co. by the workmen at that time, and I find nothing in that proposed contract that would indicate that there had been any such demand made on the Union Pacific Co.; can you explain that?

Mr. FULLER. In the letters received from the chairmen of the different committees, they requested that we treat with all of the crafts together; so it was the letters or requests in addition to the schedules presented that led us to form the conclusion that they wanted, not an individual craft schedule or conference, but a conference of the federated crafts.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is true, but that would not indicate, even though you were going to treat with them as joint crafts that they would not be employees of the company, would it? This indicates that some one outside of the service of the company would come down for that purpose.

Mr. FULLER. I am glad you asked that question, because I think you misunderstood Mr. Grace yesterday. We considered him always as an employee and always dealt with him very pleasantly, but when we got communications from such men as John Scott, secretary of the shop federation of the Harriman lines, at San Luis Obispo, Cal.; and from George L. Baker, secretary district 12, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers, we felt we were receiving communications from outsiders, because the Union Pacific Railroad has dealt with and handles all its matters as the Union Pacific Railroad. In other words, the superintendents of motive power of the different lines do not get together and determine what conditions prevail on any other lines; they are just as independent as though dealing with the Rock Island, as far as the shops are concerned.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That construction might be put upon that by you, but I am speaking of the agreement presented by the men, joint agreement, covering all employees of the mechanical department; there is nothing in this agreement, if it should be made, that indicates you would have to deal with any other persons except those in your own employ, is there?

Mr. FULLER. No; I don't know that there is, so far as the boiler makers are concerned, so far as the carmen are concerned, or the pipe fitters; they did not present a schedule. The machinists presented a schedule, and one other craft that I have forgotten now; but the fact that in the case of the blacksmiths with whom we had a schedule that had been in successful and satisfactory operation, that we should be notified by an outsider instead of the local president of the blacksmiths' union, and that we received no requests from them but did receive them collectively from some one not in the employ of the Union Pacific Railway, made it look to us that way.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the third paragraph of your circular is this [reading]:

"Demand is made that the men in charge of the mechanics must be mechanics; in other words, the foreman must belong to the organization."

I do not find anything in that agreement to that effect, that the foreman must be a member of the organization.

Mr. FULLER. Clause 9 states that any employee who does not belong to the craft will be given 30 days to join it and at the expiration of 30 days we would not have anyone in our shop but members of one or the other organizations.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were any of your foremen members prior to the strike—were any of your foremen, prior to the strike, members of the organization?

Mr. FULLER. I think there were seven or eight foremen scattered over the road that were members, and I think there were others that were members that had cards not active; yes; I think we had a great many of our foremen that belonged to the organization in some way or other.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In any conferences had with the organizations prior to the presentation of the present agreement, or the agreement latterly presented, was there any demand ever made by the individual organizations that the foremen should be members of the organization?

Mr. FULLER. Not to me; no, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In paragraph 5 of your circular, it says:

"Demand is made that the workmen be not discharged or suspended without previous consent of committee of shop employees."

Again, I do not find anything in the contract presented indicating any such request.

Mr. FULLER. Well, I think, Mr. O'Connell, it is the way you read it. That is what it means.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is your construction of it?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In paragraph 10 it reads:

"The adoption of a rule is demanded, which will result in the promotion of the oldest man in the shop to the position of foreman whenever a vacancy occurs."

That is simply the application of the rule of seniority, isn't it, applying in all railroad service?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; but the application of seniority in the shop and on the road is entirely different. Seniority on the road is, if a man is not physically capable of performing the duty he would not be in the position he was; but take mechanics in the shop, we have a lot of them that are deaf and have afflictions, and we have not applied the physical and medical examination to our men to find out whether they were perfect in every particular; we have done very little of it, practically none, to tell the truth, and we have men who would not be competent as foremen.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then your idea is that the organization would demand, without regard to his physical or mental or productive ability, that he be promoted if a vacancy occurred?

Mr. FULLER. There is danger of it. We feel that we, as employers, should select our own officers; it leads up to a controversy.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is that general in the transportation service?

Mr. FULLER. What is that?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the promotion, do you select, for instance, an opportunity of a man advancing from driving a freight locomotive to running a passenger locomotive?

Mr. FULLER. No; seniority prevails.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Why should not the same rule prevail in the mechanical department?

Mr. FULLER. It does not prevail from conductor to trainmaster or from engineer to road foreman of engines for exactly the same reason.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In rule 12 [reading]:

"It is demanded that all employees be paid by the hour, abolishing all monthly bonus or premium systems."

Has it not always been the custom that the employees are rated by the hour?

Mr. FULLER. So far as the Union Pacific Railroad is concerned, it has been customary, but at one time it was not; well, I will answer that yes, as a general rule, but the pay by the hour means just what it says.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It means to be rated so much per hour?

Mr. FULLER. It means to be paid by the hour. How could you pay them piecework, if you are going to pay by the hour? I can not conceive how we could stretch the point. If we pay by the hour, we pay on the hourly basis, a stipulated amount, while in piecework the men would make more, possibly make twice as much. Now, we could not pay it and live up to the letter of the contract.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You have worked piecework on the Union Pacific?

Mr. FULLER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. To what extent?

Mr. FULLER. In the car department probably 50 per cent, in the boiler shop 25 per cent, in the blacksmith shop a little, I don't remember the percentage.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was it not the understanding some few years prior to the strike, that piecework was to be gradually eliminated by the Union Pacific by an adjustment?

Mr. FULLER. I don't know anything about it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Has piecework been increased or decreased during your administration?

Mr. FULLER. It has been to some extent decreased, because there were some operations that we did not want to continue piecework on.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you know whether it was a general impression among the workmen in the mechanical department that piecework was to be eliminated, if not instantly, gradually eliminated?

Mr. FULLER. The only place I know was in the machine shop. The piecework in the machine shop, as I understand it, was eliminated along about 1903.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The fact that piecework had not been eliminated entirely on the Union Pacific, is that not one of the causes that resulted in the strike?

Mr. FULLER. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. One of the fundamental reasons?

Mr. FULLER. No, sir. We never had one question raised. In 1909 I asked the car department committee if they wanted to eliminate piecework. It was a serious question in my mind whether we wanted to continue. They signified they wanted to continue piecework. There have been no complaints. On the contrary, it has been requested.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are there any bonuses being paid the employees at this time?

Mr. FULLER. None whatever. Well, now, wait a moment. I don't know what you mean by bonus.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, I mean outside of piecework.

Mr. FULLER. No; none whatever.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were there any bonuses promised the men who were employed to take the places of the men that went on the strike?

Mr. FULLER. None whatever.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you have the same clause in the employment contract that was read here as being used in connection with the Illinois Central, namely, that the workman who agreed to work for the Union Pacific would be compelled, if he quit his work before 30 days, he did so without compensation? In other words, the company could retain his compensation if it desired?

Mr. FULLER. No; we did not have that clause. We had a clause that they would stay a stipulated length of time in the service, which they did not do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did not do?

Mr. FULLER. No. Some of them—no; some of them did not go to work at all.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose a man agreed to work 30 days and only worked 20 days. Under the contract, if you desired to do so, could you have withheld his pay for his wages.

Mr. FULLER. Not to my knowledge, we could not. You can't withhold any man's pay.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were the men known as strike breakers as they are commonly called—

Mr. FULLER (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL (continuing). They were housed in some places at some of the shops on the road, were they not?

Mr. FULLER. Yes. We had a very handsome shop that we turned over to them at Omaha, a brand new one.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. At the commissary in Omaha—the feeding department—were the men furnished liquors of any kind there?

Mr. FULLER. Absolutely not, at any place.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. At any place?

Mr. FULLER. Not on the railroad, not a drop.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What did the commissary consist of?

Mr. FULLER. The commissary consisted of a kitchen and cooks and waiters who furnished meats, vegetables, bread, coffee, and things of that kind; the regular boarding house.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that was inside of the shop yards?

Mr. FULLER. That was inside of the shop yards and in a building.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Fence around it?

Mr. FULLER. Well, wherever there was a fence around the plant, it was inside of the plant; where there was not a fence, it was on the outside; and in some places it was in cars, where there were only a few men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were these men allowed to come and go from the boarding place?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; if they wanted to.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Down to the city, if they desired?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were there guards kept at the commissary?

Mr. FULLER. There was a guard kept at all the large commissaries.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were there any disturbances occurring in any of these commissaries?

Mr. FULLER. I don't know of any disturbances. I don't know of any, Mr. O'Connell.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were the men observed as to whether they brought alcoholic liquors into the commissary?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; they were; and it was taken away from them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And were they punished in any way for having done so?

Mr. FULLER. No; if they were unruly, and we did not want them, we put them on the train and sent them back home where they belonged.

Commissioner O'CONNELL (interrupting). What was the requirement of a man seeking employment during the past two or three years, since the strike occurred on the road? Was there any particular examination made as to his mechanical ability?

Mr. FULLER. The same examination was made of those men, Mr. O'Connell, that is made to-day and was made before the strike. Yes, sir; we had competent men examine these men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was there a physical examination?

Mr. FULLER. None whatever.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you now make a physical examination?

Mr. FULLER. We do not; never have.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Never have?

Mr. FULLER. Not to my knowledge—never made it—except the car inspectors, I think, for their hearing and eyes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were there any funds kept from the salaries of the workmen on the Union Pacific for any purpose whatsoever—kept out of their wages by the company?

Mr. FULLER. There is a hospital fund.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is that?

Mr. FULLER. That is 50 cents a month.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is taken out by the company?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; turned over to the hospital fund; yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is the fund under separate direction or under the direction of the officials of the Union Pacific Co.?

Mr. FULLER. Well, it is under the direction of the officials—comes under the medical staff.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What did the workmen get in return for the 50 cents a month?

Mr. FULLER. They get medicine and surgical attention or medical attention and hospital service.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They get attention for ordinary sickness?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; if they are injured they are attended to, or if they are sick they are attended to.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there a report of any kind made by the parties in charge of the hospital service?

Mr. FULLER. I don't know as to that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who is the chief surgeon?

Mr. FULLER. Dr. Jonas.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Where is he located?

Mr. FULLER. Omaha.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you his initials?

Mr. FULLER. A. F., I think; Dr. A. F. Jonas.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is the working agreement or arrangement under which the men now work?

Mr. FULLER. Exactly the same as it was before the walkout.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You simply promulgated the former agreement?

Mr. FULLER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. By posting up in the shops?

Mr. FULLER. I don't know whether it is posted in the shop or outside. I don't know whether it was posted in the shop before or not, but the same rules and regulations govern.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, the same articles agreed upon between your company and the workmen before the strike—

Mr. FULLER (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL (continuing). And general rules were agreed upon?

Mr. FULLER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And have been put in force to cover employees?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. To cover all the employees?

Mr. FULLER. No; exactly the same; machinists' agreement, to the machinists; boiler makers' agreement, to the boiler makers; blacksmiths' to the blacksmiths; and carmen's to the carmen. No consolidation.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, that portion that would apply generally, for instance, the hours of labor—that was promulgated as covering all employees—if there was a 9-hour or 10-hour day, as the case might be; all the rules that should apply generally to all workmen were so applied?

Mr. FULLER. They applied to the crafts as they did before. There have been no consolidation agreements in any way.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There has been no conference or committee meetings of any kind between the officers of the company and the workmen now in the employ of the company?

Mr. FULLER. Not to my knowledge.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If there was to be—if the company desired or you desired, as superintendent of motive power, to change the workings or hours and to post notice to that effect, would you do so without consultation with the men? And if you wanted to consult with the men, how would you proceed to do it? I take it they have no organization.

Mr. FULLER. Why, of course, if we were going to cut our wages, we—I think we would talk to the men about it. If we were going to increase it, as we did before, we didn't do anything; just posted it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I take it that would be acceptable?

Mr. FULLER. If we were going to make any change, for instance, in the machinists, why, we would call the machinists in and tell them what we were going to do—what we wanted to do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would you have to select from them some representatives, or call them all in?

Mr. FULLER. Oh, no; probably not call them all in; but probably ask them to send in two or three representative machinists; let them pick their own men and then let them convey the information to the balance of them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If that mode of procedure was gone through and finally you agreed with those men who came in supposedly representing the others, and an understanding was reached and then later on put into effect, and then the men simply did not pay any attention to it, there would be no means of conferring by an organized method with them. Wouldn't it be rather a chaotic condition of affairs?

Mr. FULLER. We have not found it so so far, but very acceptable.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The general experience that you have had as superintendent of motive power on a great number of roads, would that indicate or are you able to say whether strikes have been more numerous because of the greater number of organizations to treat with, or the greater number of business agreements because of so many different committees to meet that it might create friction? For instance, coming from the Erie Railroad—you said you were with that a while?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I think you will probably remember that there has been considerable difficulty on the Erie Railroad system between the mechanical department and the company in years gone by?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you think that might have been avoided by a general understanding with the employees rather than dealing with one to-day and another to-morrow, trying to adjust the different situations with each other?

Mr. FULLER. No; I do not think so. I believe the strike on the Erie was principally piecework, was it not?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes.

Mr. FULLER. That is, the first strike was. I do not know what that last strike was, really, about.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Hasn't it been the custom in railway service, in the transportation department, that the officials treat with, jointly or singly, as the case may be, the transportation organizations, and the question is never raised?

Mr. FULLER. To my personal knowledge, I have never known of any treating with the transportation department employees as a whole. There has been treating between the engineers and firemen, which we consider is the same as the machinist apprentice and his helper, because the fireman is the apprentice to the engineer. They are both at the head of the train, both perform the same function, one doing it and the other doing his share in learning the balance of the trade; so I think that is not a very fair comparison. I think that there is no reason why the engineer and fireman should not be handled together. But when you get into the shop crafts, it is a different thing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But they have dealt with them in a governmental way, and not only dealt with them as a transportation organization—transportation and mechanical. I have known of cases where there were 20 different organizations represented in the conference covering an entire territory over railroad service.

Mr. FULLER. Was it for wages, conditions, or some other subject?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The question universally affecting all, say, wages.

Mr. FULLER. I believe, if my views are well founded, it would be a rather cumbersome manner and not very satisfactory either for the men or to the company to discuss wages and conditions with shopmen, trainmen, section men, clerks, officers. Personally I would like to have them include the superintendent of motive power once in a while.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I have in mind a situation that occurred a few years ago, covering the southeast territory, of a meeting in Washington, in which the representatives of all the organizations employed by the railway system had threatened a reduction of wages.

Mr. FULLER. I think that is a little different.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The matter was amicably adjusted with a committee from all the organizations.

Mr. FULLER. I don't know—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Pardon me. If that had to be taken up with each organization at a time, it would have taken an immense amount of time, and then no satisfactory result having been reached some one organization might have gone on a strike. As it was, by bringing them together, if there was one that desired to strike where a large number probably would not, a great percentage, their influence would be against a strike.

Mr. FULLER. Well, I would not consider that it was objectionable if a general reduction of wages was made for the officers possibly to talk to the entire craft. It is an entirely different thing. Then I would not feel because that was done that we were establishing a precedent that they should deal jointly in other matters, because where it affects the whole—for if a general reduction is going into effect, why, it is a serious proposition, and I, very fortunately, have not been placed in that position where I either went up against a reduction or had to make a reduction like that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If the principle operates successfully, it would seem that it might be carried out to a greater extent to any other questions that would have a mutual interest, it possibly covering the entire service of the road, it might cover certain percentage of the road, the mechanical service or transportation department, or some other department.

Mr. FULLER. I do not feel that those are parallel cases at all. I think there are times when you can do business with the entire craft just the same as a church can do business with a lot of lawyers and doctors and shopmen, and everyone else. It is an entirely different proposition when they have got one thought, one mind. But when it comes into the settling of the intricate points involved in the employment of men and the service it is too intricate to mix up.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I just want to ask you this one question: Was the real opposition of the officials of the company that of its not wanting to recognize the federation, or the fear that by recognition it would have a stronger power or influence to bring about improved conditions of employment for the workmen, was the opposition against the federation or the result the federation would have in cementing and federating the men together as a power?

Mr. FULLER. I think I can say truthfully that there was no thought of trying to prevent bettering the conditions of our employees. I think that our action in the past emphasized that. We felt that we did not want to deal with federated crafts for various reasons. We felt that it would be cumbersome, that in dealing with committees, say five crafts, five representatives, four-fifths of the men on that committee would be absolutely ignorant of the conditions of which the one craft was talking. For instance, you take the condition of the machinists, the carmen know nothing about their condition, and the blacksmiths know very little about it, and the boiler makers know very little more about it, and the pipe fitter knows very little about it, nor the tinner nor the painter.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Of course, that was all explained away, how that was handled, by the chairman of the federation the other day.

Mr. FULLER. Yes; that was explained away. We yet feel those conditions can not and will not prevail.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. If the membership in the various unions had been confined exclusively to the railroad employees, would you feel that you might then be willing to treat with them as a system federation?

Mr. FULLER. No; I would not.

Commissioner BALLARD. Would the fact that a good many members of the various unions might be working for other industries, does that have any influence on you at all?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; we considered that; but not as seriously as we did the question of dealing with men not conversant with the subject that was under discussion.

Commissioner BALLARD. This strike that occurred, was it a spontaneous protest upon the part of the workmen against wages, or working conditions, or was it the result of probably something brought about or caused by outside agitation?

Mr. FULLER. I think I can say truthfully, and I believe the rank and file of the Union Pacific Railway will repeat it, that it was created and occasioned entirely by outsiders. Our men did not want to strike. They did not want to strike, and it took them as much as an hour and a half to get out of our shops after the strike was called. There was not a sound; there was not a bell rung; there was not a shout; they went out of our shops just as though they were going to a funeral.

Commissioner LENNON. I would just like to ask one other question. Do you understand that the joint agreement as has been talked about, presented by the shop federation, abolishes the trade or craft agreement?

Mr. FULLER. Well, we do not know to what extent that would go. We simply knew that they wanted a meeting of all crafts, and we felt, and we do yet, that eventually that demand meant the elimination of the individual craft.

Commissioner LENNON. You have been a mechanic, an experienced man. Do you believe that the machinists would permit the car workers to make their agreements, even if they were all in one room, all together on one committee?

Mr. FULLER. Well, I don't know. In this age it is very hard to tell what will happen. I think the car repairers will be in the majority and helpers will be in the majority; and if majority rules, I think they will settle the machinists' schedule before they get through with it.

Commissioner LENNON. The truth of the matter is, according to testimony that has been submitted, that no matter which organization is the larger their vote is no greater than the smaller one?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; that is true, if they follow that; that is true.

Commissioner LENNON. Men are supposed to follow their agreements which they present in writing?

Mr. FULLER. Well, we have not any reason to take any exception. They have always carried out their agreements with us.

Commissioner LENNON. And the agreement as submitted indicated that each craft are still making their own agreements, and that the joint committee met together with the representatives of the company in order to dispose of all the agreements at one time.

Mr. FULLER. That is the first I ever heard of it; was to-day, or rather this week.

Commissioner LENNON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. On this question of outsiders. I have been something of a rank outsider myself for many years.

Mr. FULLER. That is all right; go ahead.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a fact that your company, both in the crafts that were comprised in this federation, as well as transportation organizations, have always dealt with outsiders whenever either the company officers and the committee were unable to agree on any action, or when the interests of the company seemed to demand the presence of an officer, would not the companies call on him without hesitation to come there?

Mr. FULLER. I will answer that this way and try to get it clear. If the employees that you represent had anything to do with the officers of the Union Pacific Railway, they would communicate and do the business with the officers of the Union Pacific Railway themselves, wouldn't they, up to a certain time?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. FULLER. And if the time ever occurred where necessary they called on you. We don't deny that. I haven't been talking about that at all. I agree with you fully.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, to go a little further. Isn't it a fact that in various instances in the past when the company had reason to be fearful or suspicious of some event that seemed about to happen that they have not hesitated to telegraph to the outsiders themselves in common with the practice on other properties?

Mr. FULLER. I do not personally know anything about that, because I never had to do it. But if you represented the machinists, I would not hesitate to call on you if I wanted to. But with me, Mr. Scott, Mr. Baker—we don't know him. We don't know whether they represent anything or not. Nobody has told us. They are employees of the Southern Pacific.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then I have had better advertising than they have?

Mr. FULLER. Well, yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Isn't it a fact, Mr. Fuller, that for a number of years past that the four committees representing the four train services organizations have been in the habit of meeting the Union Pacific management for the purpose of adjusting the differences existing between the four of the managers or questions of application of the agreements, which are several; that is, there are three agreements for the four organizations?

Mr. FULLER. Not to my knowledge, but there may.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You do not know, then, if they are not regularly in the habit of doing so?

Mr. FULLER. I have met the engineers' and the firemen's committee.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. FULLER. But never have met with the trainmen or the conductors or the switchmen.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But the engineers and the firemen only came to you in regard to questions interesting the fraternity, did they not?

Mr. FULLER. They came to me.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I mean for adjustment of agreements on those questions?

Mr. FULLER. Oh, yes; on the railroad.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And they always call up the general manager if they can not agree with you?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; I guess they do.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And it is when they get the general manager that the four of them are together?

Mr. FULLER. I don't know that they have. They may, but I do not know it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, you don't know that they are not going there?

Mr. FULLER. No; I do not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Commissioner ARSHON. Mr. Fuller, to clear up this question of outsiders, you never knew of the Union Pacific Railroad negotiating a schedule with a committee in which any of the members were employees of other railroads, did you?

Mr. FULLER. Never.

Commissioner ARSHON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you, unless you care to volunteer something.

Mr. FULLER. I just want to say I do not know how pertinent this is, but Mr. Horton yesterday gave a lot of railroads that had accepted the federation agreement. I have a list here of 10 that I have gotten in touch with since yesterday, and they claim that they have not federated shop agreements that they know of.

Chairman WALSH. Just read that list into the record.

Mr. FULLER. The Wabash & Pittsburgh Terminal; Atlantic Coast Line; Trinity & Brazos Valley; Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac; Chicago, Indianapolis & Louisville; Canadian Northern Railroad; Frisco Lines (St. Louis & San Francisco); Missouri, Kansas & Texas; Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic; Wheeling & Lake Erie.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you.

TESTIMONY OF MR. FRANK COMERFORD.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name, residence, and occupation.

Mr. COMERFORD. Frank Comerford; Chicago, Ill.; attorney at law.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Comerford, have you had any connection with the difficulties upon the Illinois Central and Harriman lines?

Mr. COMERFORD. I have.

Chairman WALSH. What has been your connection with them, Mr. Comerford?

Mr. COMERFORD. As attorney for the Illinois Central System Federation, the Harriman lines federation, and the railway employees' department; I have had experience in handling litigation, criminal and civil, and I have made a limited social survey of the effects upon the moral tone of the communities after the strike, the effect upon the men and their families, and the methods employed by the Illinois Central Railroad Co. and the Harriman lines in prosecuting successfully up to this time their controversy with the men.

Chairman WALSH. Were you delegated to make that study by the organizations involved by the men?

Mr. COMERFORD. I was.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would first describe now the study that you have made, and the plan generally, and the result.

Mr. COMERFORD. The survey contemplated to furnish this commission with the effect in human values and in dollar values followed the preparation of a questionnaire of about fifty-odd questions which were printed and sent over the zone. By "zone" I mean the Illinois Central zone and Harriman lines zone. These questions were answered, and on the basis of those answers unselected, I made a card index and cross reference to attempt to determine the effects. I then used a check-up plan of writing to the individuals who had sent in their answers and followed that up by sending a special investigator to each of the points, with instructions to consider each point to be a unit in the plan. That dealt entirely with the question of the social effect of the industrial trouble on the Illinois Central and the Harriman lines.

It might not be amiss to state that in sending out the question sheets I distinctly advised each man who expected to respond that while he was not under oath he should be as conscientious and as fair in the making of his statements as though he were, and that he might subsequently be called upon to verify any statement that he made.

In order to give the commission an opportunity, should there be any doubt upon this somewhat scientific effort to determine the effect of this situation, at the conclusion of my testimony and with the consent and permission of the commission, I would like to file a thousand answers, giving the names and addresses of the men and the statements made by them.

I wanted, if I might, and if it is considered important by the commission, to make reference to two matters testified to by Mr. Markham in a very brief way before taking up the testimony that I expect to give as a result.

Chairman WALSH. Then you may refer to these two matters first, if you would rather do so, and then proceed to the other.

Mr. COMERFORD. For instance, Mr. Markham, president of the Illinois Central, in his testimony the first day of this hearing, referred to a conference after the difficulty in Mississippi, in which Mr. John Sharp Williams, United States Senator from that State, and the governor were present, and used that as an illustration of the attitude of the Illinois Central Railway Co. to be fair. I believe Mr. Williams's name was prominently mentioned as one who had the same point of view Mr. Markham had as to the fairness of the company's attitude.

I want to read a letter dated August 28, 1914, from United States Senator John Sharp Williams, just the portion of it that bears upon the matter, and as I have stated, and then I will file the letter:

"I do remember being somewhat astonished at Mr. Markham's position; I thought it at the time arbitrary. I can not answer your question as to what the effect of the strike of the clerks was on the service of the operation of the lines, because I do not know. I was soon afterwards, you remember, called away from Mississippi by public duties here and became not only interested but absorbed in the work here. I remember trying my best to bring about good feeling between both sides and I have a distinct recollection that you seemed to be amenable to reason.

"I am sorry that my letter must be so unsatisfactory, but the state of my memory concerning it all is dim. I remember making a suggestion, the details of which I do not now recall, that I thought ought to be accepted by both sides and which seemed to be not favorably received by the railroad. I have tried to recall just what the proposition was and I am not able to do so.

"I am, with every expression of regard,

"Very truly, yours,

"JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS."

(The witness submitted the letter testified to, and it appears among the exhibits at the end of this subject as Comerford Exhibit No. 1.)

A simple fact coming from my investigation that both parties seemed to be agreed upon is that the cause of the difficulty grew out of the refusal of the Illinois Central and the Harriman lines to recognize what they claim is a new method of collective bargaining, namely treating with the employees organized in the form of a system federation. The Illinois Central have taken the position that there was a failure to give the 30-day notice. My investigation will reveal this fact: That the men on the Illinois Central system had legally constituted representatives to present the request for a conference, and that the question, this technical question was never raised. That further, Mr. Markham had said after it was raised, nearly three months having elapsed, from the beginning of negotiations by that time, that even if that technical question were not—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). The 30 days' notice?

Mr. COMEBFORD. Yes—in the mind of the company that the company would not, under any circumstances recognize the right of the men to bargain with the company as a federation. The main reason given in the pamphlet which Mr. Markham offered as an exhibit, which bears the signature of Mr. Park, although Mr. Markham says he prepared the material, is that they could not successfully operate the property. The men, however, believe that the question of that form of bargaining was at that time not an experiment, but a demonstrated method of bargaining, one that had been economical and successful. That instead of it instigating labor trouble that it reduced to a minimum the possibility, by destroying the constant caste which prevails in a shop when men are treated with according to the particular kind of work they do.

In answer to a question of Commissioner Aishton's here, Mr. Kruttschnitt said that one experience had happened since this difficulty that confirmed his opinion and justified him in the belief that the recognition of system federations would menace the interests of the stockholders and bondholders that he, as a trustee, was trying to serve. And he said he introduced into the record a letter from a former president of the system federation on the Harriman lines suggested a calling of a general strike. However, Mr. Kruttschnitt failed to advise the commission, I presume because he did not have any information in his possession, that because of the democratic form of trades-unionism that suggestion was given consideration and a vote was taken and the men overwhelmingly refused to sanction a general strike. So if that experience indicated anything, it would confirm the position that the power was safely vested in the men because they had not, when the suggestion was presented, decided to use it.

Neither did Mr. Kruttschnitt suggest that the growth of this form of bargaining from 30 system federations that were in force and effect at the time the men asked simply to be met with, has reached the point that about 52 roads now so bargain; which indicates that from the railroad point of view either the additional railroad companies have made an absolute mistake, or that this method of bargaining is more satisfactory.

The men have taken the position that the 30-day notice was given. They have taken the position that there is a real cause back of this whole unfortunate controversy. And it is a matter of human conservation. In the railroad industry, from conferences, from contact for a long period of time in a most intimate way, not only with the officials, but with men wearing overalls and waiting for the whistle to blow, I have learned that the thing they fear is the introduction of the so-called scientific shop management. They are afraid of piecework and they are afraid of the bonus system—in connection with physical examinations and in conjunction with the repeated violation of seniority rights.

They urge another reason—the necessity of having some means of compelling the fulfillment of agreements after those agreements are made, and further that they will have some method in their hands of increasing wages at least to the extent of becoming solvent to their moral and blood and citizenship and Christian obligations to their families. It is a proposition with the men—the trades-union movement and the federated form of bargaining—of self-protection.

The men have been led to believe that the position taken by the railroad companies, the genuine position, is that in dealing with a single craft, even though their terms and conditions of employment are acceded to, that appear reasonable at the time or the best that the men can get, that as soon as the conference is over the men have no means of compelling the enforcement of those conditions. Further, the men believe that the railroad companies do not want to standardize conditions in the shop, such as the safety, sanitation, and wages; and until there does become something like a standardization of those things, particularly in what is called competitive territory, there will be the use of the figures on the road where the men are the weakest, and the conditions on the road where the men are the weakest will be used as the standard. In other words, they want to avoid the minimum of favorable conditions as the standard.

The question of the employment agencies has been touched upon. I want to call the commission's attention to just one single exhibit, in the large set of exhibits filed, many will be filed—but to show the extent to which this reprehensible practice of using employment agents to fraudulently bring decent, honest, hard-working American citizens into a zone without notice that labor difficulties are on, and as showing the attitude in one case of the president of the Illinois Central, I will read a letter written to President Markham by myself, which I never mailed, because after having dictated it, I called up over the phone. [Reading:]

"President MARKHAM,

"Illinois Central Railroad Co., Chicago, Ill.

"DEAR SIR: Clifford C. Ormes is in Chicago, penniless and without friends. His home is Minneapolis, Minn., where he lives with his wife and family. He is by occupation a wood-machine man.

"He read an advertisement in the Minneapolis Tribune on October 15, placed in that paper by the Fay Employment Agency, No. 220 Second Street, Minneapolis. The advertisement told him of steady work in Chicago. It was suggested to him that his employment would be with a new manufacturing concern. He was put on a train for Chicago and given as his destination West Pullman. He was met at West Pullman by a representative of your road and taken to Burnside. At Burnside he found a strike in progress, and being a union man he refused to go to work under the conditions offered.

"This man, not only destitute as far as money and friends are concerned, labors under the terrible misfortune of being a deaf-mute. Your company is responsible for its agent, the Fay Employment Agency, that by false and fraudulent representations induced this man to leave his home and journey to Chicago in the belief that work awaited him here in a new manufacturing plant. The least that your company can do to make amends for its wrong to this man is to provide him with transportation back to his wife and family.

"The methods employed by your subordinates in resorting to trickery of the kind illustrated by this case and catching in the net unfortunates like Clifford Ormes are indefensible. These facts can be established by investigation. I shall be glad to supply the proof.

"The man's present penniless condition in Chicago makes it imperative for me to ask you to make some decision in this matter at once."

(The letter read by the witness was filed as an exhibit and appears as Comerford Exhibit No. 2.)

I sent that man to the Illinois Central and he was refused admission to the building after he got in the elevator; and out of the quarters of men who at that time were terribly insolvent themselves on account of the strike, he was furnished with money enough to buy transportation back to his home town so he might be reunited with his family.

In the State of Colorado I have simply to make this statement. I now file as an exhibit a letter from Mr. John E. Ramer, secretary of state and labor commissioner ex officio, showing the extent to which violations took place in that State on the Harriman lines and the extent to which citizens were brought into the zone without notice of a labor disturbance, and then when they claimed transportation or asked if they were denied it, and were made victims of misrepresentation.

(The letter here presented, by the witness appears among exhibits at the end of this subject as Comerford Exhibit No. 3.)

An interesting feature of my investigation deals with the attitude of the legal machinery to both the companies and the men, and in taking that up I want to preface my observations based on facts by saying that it is an unhealthy sign in the country when the men lose confidence in the courts and in the law; that when a set of men who work for a living and have more time and opportunity to exercise their muscles than their minds are face to face with the situation that there is not any redress in the courts, those men then generally use the thing that they are best fitted and trained to use, namely, their muscles.

The first thing that happened after the so-called strike or lockout was the inauguration on the Illinois Central at least of a systematic campaign of arrests. Men were arrested and thrown by police patrol wagons and taken to police stations and moved from that station and put down behind the bars, their families were notified, the men were compelled to employ lawyers to defend them at great expense to them individually and to their trades-unions; small notices appeared in the newspapers indicating that these men had been arrested, which unfortunately in the lay reading mind carries with it the presumption of some wrongdoing. In 116 cases that I personally defended, 115 of them were found not guilty. That was not a compliment to any skill I possess as an attorney, it was simply an evidence of the fact that the arrests—at least to me—were not the result of accident, but were part of a plan. That plan did not stop at that point. The publicity given to the arrests formed a public opinion hostile to the men. That hostile public opinion then affected the United States judge before whom a general blanket bill was presented with 15 or 20 affidavits asking for a temporary restraining order. The men then found that it was necessary to hire a lawyer, to get data together, to traverse the bill by affidavits, and traverse the allegations in it by an answer and attack the restraining order. To illustrate: This paper, which I will offer as an exhibit, begins, I believe, with Mr. Commissioner O'Connell, who at that time was connected with the machinists' organization, and practically names every organization and individual that in any wise by fancy or imagination could be conceived to be a part of the situation between the Illinois Central Railroad and its men. The injunction was granted. In this case we resolved—having a little money—to make a test. I went to Springfield, Ill., before his honor, Judge Humphrey, and filed an answer. We then attacked the restraining order, which you will find on this paper, which I will present as an exhibit.

(The restraining order referred to, entitled "In the Circuit Court of the United States for the southern division of the southern district of Illinois. Illinois Central Railroad Co., a corporation organized by special charter of the law of the State of Illinois, complainant, v. International Association of Machinists," was submitted in printed form.)

The restraining order as originally drafted absolutely prohibited picketing. I believe Mr. Horton, general counsel for the Illinois Central, and Mr. John G. Drennon, its district attorney, appeared for the company. After pointing to the fact that it prohibited picketing and explaining to Judge Humphrey the status of it at length, we succeeded in getting a modification of this bill, which permitted peaceful picketing. The draft of the bill—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Pardon me. What was the return day of the restraining order? When was it served and what was the return day?

Mr. COMERFORD. I don't know whether this will show on the restraining order itself.

Chairman WALSH. Well, do you remember?

Mr. COMERFORD. I do not; but it was about—yes, it was the 6th day of November, 1911, at 10 o'clock.

Chairman WALSH. And it was issued when?

Mr. COMERFORD. The restraining order was issued on the 11th day of October, 1911.

Chairman WALSH. The 11th of October, and it was returnable on the 6th of November?

Mr. COMERFORD. The restraining order, as drafted, was an ingenious bit of English literature. By its punctuation it prevented the men from the liberty that the judge intended to give them. And I have the original copy which I had at the time and inserted, as the judge modified it, the words, "for the purpose of threatening." In other words, the intimidation of a man acting as a picket was the basis of stopping picketing. There must be some affirmative act of intimidation. And it was at that time when the whole circumstances were explained to Judge Humphrey that Judge Humphrey said there are many things that the men can do under this restraining order, now, and only a few that they are prohibited from. In every other jurisdiction I believe where the men were unable to contest this ex parte issued restraining order, peaceful picketing was entirely prohibited and the men were practically stripped of every right guaranteed to them by the Federal Constitution. It indicates, in answer to the position taken by a gentleman who testified here from another point of view, with which I have no quarrel, that one of the important features in collective bargaining, whether it is in the courts or at the council table or in publicity, is your ability to "pay the freight." I don't mean that as a reflection upon the courts, but I mean that it is necessary to hire counsel and go to the expense necessary under our judicial system to get justice. In other words, that while justice is not for sale, it costs money to go and get it.

These arrests of the men caused intense dissatisfaction. Most of the men with whom I personally associated had never been arrested before. Many of them had children of school age. Others had daughters of marriageable age; and they were vitally concerned about newspaper publicity and the execution of criminal process that held up in their neighborhood the head of the household to scandal, disgrace, and shame. That caused intense dissatisfaction.

Reference has been made to the injunction matter and to the attorneys. The firm of Lennon & Lennon were attorneys for the railroad, and the mayor of the town of Burnside was on the pay roll of the company, its surgeon, and three of the other commissioners, under their form of government, were—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). You say that the mayor has some official connection with the company?

Mr. COMERFORD. He absolutely was an employee of the company. He is a paid district surgeon of the Illinois Central Railroad Co., and three of the other commissioners under the commission form of government down there have dealings with the Illinois Central that make it to their financial interest to serve primarily the Illinois Central's interest, and the interests of the general public secondarily.

Chairman WALSH. Do you remember or recall whether the mayor of McComb, a letter from whom was read here—

Mr. COMERFORD. No; that was the mayor of McComb and Mr. Markham, I know through accident, neglected to advise the commission that he is in the employ of the Illinois Central Railroad as superintendent or foreman of its car department. You will find many of our officials who have been quoted here occupying peculiar dual relations.

Now, take this case of Meagher down there at Springfield, Ill., he was charged with contempt. I represented Meagher in that case. The woman took the witness stand and testified that Meagher lived in her rooming house and that the doors on the— that gave entrance to the individual rooms had no locks on them. Then another man took the witness stand and said he was an Illinois Central Railroad employee and that in his room were found a couple of cartons of lye. Then the master mechanic or boiler superintendent took the witness stand and swore that if the amount of lye found in that Illinois Central employee's room, if it was introduced into the boilers of the locomotives would have destroyed the motive power of the Illinois Central Railroad. Then another witness took the witness stand and testified that on the carpets in Mr. Meagher's room there were some lye burns. The confessions made on the cross-examinations of those witnesses were so astounding to Judge Humphrey, and even to the counsel for the Illinois Central Railroad Co., that they concurred in the request to the judge to dismiss the contempt proceedings based on conspiracy which involved about the evidence I have told you.

Mr. Meagher was born in Bloomington, Ill., a short distance from that point; had never been arrested before in his life. He was subjected to the expense, to the disgrace, and what he meant, I think, to convey was that at the time he was arrested and when the Illinois Central's evidence went in indicating that he was guilty of some inside conspiracy to put out of commission their rolling stock, through some strange happening, Mr. Meagher was given unusual publicity. But the action of Judge Humphrey in dismissing the case and being so disgusted with the evidence that he called up the bailiff of his court, and he said, "I sent men to Peoria on this kind of evidence yesterday, and I want them released at once." That was not given any great amount of space. I don't mean to indicate that the Illinois Central was responsible for that, or the newspapers, but it simply happened.

Now, Mr. Hooker answered a question sheet, and he says, "My name is Wallace Hooker. I live at Joliet, Ill., 493 Landon Avenue." I will just use this as a typical case of contempt proceedings in another jurisdiction, namely, before Judge Wright. I don't believe it is necessary for me to comment on the men's attitude toward Judge Wright. Mr. Wright has done that splendidly in the magnificent opinion or decision read into the record here by Mr. Markham. I think in legal literature it has not a parallel. Mr. Hooker says [reading]:

"I got my foot broke while I was working for the P. & P. U. Ry. June 15, 1912, at Peoria, Ill. I received $3,750 damages from them. That is why I have $1,200 cash now. Had it not been for that I probably would have been in the insane asylum now. I was brought before the Hon. Judge Wright, of the United States Circuit Court at Danville, Ill., January 2, 1912, on a charge of contempt of court. When he sentenced me he said that I had committed no crime. 'There was nobody hurt, nobody robbed; there was no damage done, nobody assaulted, nor nobody insulted. All there was to it was a little talk and very little of that. So I sentence you to 30 days in the Vermillion County jail. Also fine you $100 and costs.' I stayed in jail 27 days, then he released me. I had told a boarding-house lady, a neighbor of mine, not to board the I. C. strike breakers. That was the first time in my life that I ever was arrested. And I am not ashamed of that arrest. I did not strike against the I. C. R. R. I was forced to quit their services or denounce the liberty of my fellow men that our forefathers shed their blood to give to us. I love the I. C. R. R. and I loved Mattoon, my home. But I would rather suffer 10 times what I have rather than stand up and see the Illinois Central Railroad managers pick the stars off Old Glory without resenting it."

One other observation that is borne out by this investigation of mine that I want to emphasize is just a line. In this campaign of arrests and the securing of injunctions, when the campaign of arrests was inaugurated, the men arrested were generally found not guilty. I have been giving statistics in my own experience, and others by the thousands will be filed.

Chairman WALSH. Have you statistics showing the number of persons charged with violations, the number that were originally served with injunctive process, the number that were charged with violations of injunctions, and the general result of the cases—whether the men were found guilty or acquitted and whether a large number was found guilty?

Mr. COMERFORD. No; I have not compiled that, Mr. Commissioner Walsh, but I think we can give that; that we can give a copy of it at a later date.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would.

Mr. COMERFORD. When the campaign of arrests was instituted the men were found guilty, generally; but it served the purpose for which it was begun—that of influencing the public opinion first and bringing about an atmosphere in the courts that allowed the granting of writs of injunction. Without the issuance of injunctions it was necessary to arrest men and try them before juries, and they would be arrested and found not guilty; but all they had to do in the case of an injunction was to abandon the ordinary forms of procedure and go to the Federal court, where the man would be denied the customary form of trial before a jury.

To indicate another effect of this situation that emphasizes one cause of industrial discontent, I call attention to the question of car shortage. In the case of River & Rail Coal & Coke Co., of Kentucky, v. Illinois Central Railroad Co., reported in the 150th Southwestern Reporter, page 641, the Kentucky Court of Appeals held it to be the duty of the Illinois Central Railroad, at common law as well as under the Federal law, to furnish all the cars required by its shippers, and that its failure to comply with this legal duty made it responsible to the shippers in damages. This went to the upper courts and was affirmed. The mine owners—and by "mine owners" I mean "mine operators"—not receiving sufficient coal cars, were compelled to shut down their plants, and, as a consequence, sustained a damage. As a result of that, the mine operators sued the Illinois Central and recovered damages. This suit was in Illinois, and the litigation is pending, if it has not been settled. Now, the mine worker was without any redress. It is true that the failure to supply cars to the mine was the thing that caused the mine operator to close the mine down or run it on short schedule of time, and although the mine operator has a remedy by which he can compel the Illinois Central Railroad Co. to respond in damages to the extent that the railroad company has failed to supply cars, yet the men who are the victims of that have no remedy, because they are not parties, in contemplation of law, that have a right to any such remedy.

I want to read, briefly, an abstract from the 1912 session of the stockholders of the Illinois Central Railroad in which this point was emphasized by one of the stockholders, Mr. R. W. Ropiequet, of Belleville, Ill. I have not the original minutes of the stockholders' meeting, and that will account for the mood and tense. [Reading:]

"We produced before the judiciary committee of the legislature a transcript of a meeting of the stockholders of the Illinois Central held in 1912. This record showed that R. W. Ropiequet, an attorney and coal operator at Belleville, Ill., representing a minority of the stockholders, made a statement at the stockholders' meeting analyzing the report of the Illinois Central and calling attention to the fact that the annual report of the company showed that there had been an actual decrease of 219 coal cars for the period covered by 1912. At the same time he showed that the Illinois Central moved 8,608,659 tons of coal, which was 32.69 per cent of the freight traffic of the line. Mr. Ropiequet then proceeded to tell the influence this criminal shortage of cars was having on the Illinois Central. He showed the influence of this condition upon the communities local to and upon the lines of the Illinois Central. He said that the mine which can not get cars can not work, and that this means that miners employed in these mines are forced out of employment, become restless, and move away, and that this meant financial distress to such towns, and that the merchants were badly affected."

An important cause⁶ of dissatisfaction and discontent among the men has been the policy of turning the function of government over to private individuals or private or quasi-public corporations. Reference has been made here repeatedly to United States marshals. To the general layman that calls up the vision of a man who is working continuously and constantly as an employee of the Government. The United States marshals—some of them—were men from the shops of the railroad company, and men who were consequently selected and picked by the Illinois Central, and the character of some of them would not have measured up to the standard our Government would require of a man to be given authority to represent the United States Government as an executive officer. And that thing is equally true of the deputy sheriffs. Lots of them were brought into the sheriff's office, and in many instances to satisfy certain statutory requirements subterfuges were resorted to. The county itself would pay $1 each month to each special deputy sheriff, and the balance of his salary, which was the actual salary, was to be paid by the Illinois Central Railroad. The conferring of that kind of governmental function on a private or quasi-public corporation in that manner causes the men to think that the Government is conferring rights that belong to it and delegating them to their opponent in the controversy and is the cause of much discontent among the men.

One remarkable case that came under my notice, but is typical as showing the extent to which the railroad companies—and I am not referring to the Illinois Central alone in this particular—goes to defend the men they take in after a labor difficulty occurs. The men were not examined, and they did not ask for a record of them, but took them, as Mr. Markham said, wherever they could get them, because they must have them. And when they were arrested for offenses, bond was furnished for them, while the men on the other side were left to their own resources.

Now, the question of publicity is one I imagine the commission is deeply concerned in. The pamphlet signed by Mr. Park, issued October 12, 1911, is an unusual document. We believe that public opinion solves problems in this country, but as a practical proposition we know that the avenue to get to the public mind is a thing that railroad companies, the employers, have which the men who work for a living ordinarily have not. This is illustrated by the investment of money in newspaper enterprises, and in large industrial enterprises—the ability to pay for space in newspapers, such as in the campaign inaugurated by the Illinois Central, when space was bought by them in large metropolitan papers for which was paid sums equal to the salary of a man for a year. And it was used to furnish what? If it had been used to furnish facts, the naked facts, we would not have any objection; but this pamphlet, which was the basis of Mr. Markham's testimony—in fact, he read word for word in his statement from this pamphlet, with some few changes.

Now, let me call your attention to the kind of material they use. [Reading:]

"The officers of the System Federation then took a strike vote. The employees were told that if a strike was voted, it did not mean one would be called, but that it would be a force to compel the company officials to treat with the new organization."

I have prepared a questionnaire which I have submitted here, and I do not believe there is any official of the Illinois Central Railroad that charged any individual connected with any union with having said that the strike vote was taken for any purpose than to vote the strike, and 97 per cent of the men voted to strike, and when out on strike after this document was issued, which questioned the fact that the men insisted on withdrawing their services unless their form of system federation was recognized.

Further, it says [continues reading]:

"On the ground the employees voted to strike when called upon. The vote was not taken according to the laws of the union with which the company had contracts. These required secret ballots, which were not taken."

That is absolutely untrue, and its only purpose was to influence public opinion and cause the public to believe that there was a conspiracy on the part of labor agitators to get men to leave their work, and that they would withdraw their services unless recognition was given to their requests for that form of bargaining. This is another form of advertising to affect the public attitude and opinion, particularly in view of the fact that both Mr. Kruttschnitt and Mr. Markham say that public opinion is the forum in our country, before which we must all be judged.

It is charged of the Socialists that they endeavor to disrupt the union movement in getting up as many strikes as possible. It is generally known that to attach the tag of socialism to a thing in the public press will cause an unfavorable public opinion toward it among the majority of people who do not accept that principle of political economy as their guidance in the administration of governmental affairs.

No evidence has been presented here, and I take it that none can be presented, showing that the labor difficulty on the Illinois Central or Harriman lines, or both, grew out of any economic or religious or other kind of agitation, except the single agitation to get recognition of the System Federation.

As another example of the kind of publicity paid for, and the possible consequence of it on the public mind, this appears in the circular of the company [reading]:

"The company officials had no warning. They were not notified in any way that a strike was to be called. They were waiting for the results of the vote ordered by the international officials, not considering any more than the employees that the action of the machinists' convention would bring on a strike on the Illinois Central. The employees were also astounded when given orders to quit work. They had settled down to a belief that there would be no strike, and when it was called they were shocked."

I have talked to men representing every grade of employment, in every section of the so-called Illinois Central and Mississippi zones, and I never heard from any officer or workman anything that even remotely bore that out as being true.

We attempted to get an investigation of this matter by the Illinois Legislature and we set out an investigation of the Illinois Central situation particularly because of the fact that we believed the attitude of the Illinois Central in this case was foreign to labor difficulties, generally. Under the charter of the Illinois Central Railroad Co., which gives it its corporate existence, the State of Illinois has a representative on the board of directors; the Government fulfills that function. That constitutes a participation in the management of the affairs of the country.

Under the terms of that contract between the State and the Illinois Central the railroad company pays, in lieu of taxes, 7 per cent of its earnings. That constitutes, we believe, a participation in the benefits of the business. It is generally conceded that the participation in the earnings of a business and in the benefits that flow from the business defines a partnership. We were afraid that the State itself, which gave the Illinois Central the right to organize its business into a union form, was being placed in the position of establishing a precedent that allowed the company, as such a partner, to deny the same right to its men. We went to the Illinois Legislature and we presented a petition representing 300,000 men; we were joined by the farmers, grain dealers' associations of Illinois, and we were joined by other labor union men, and simply asked for an investigation. We submitted a number of facts, but the Illinois Central was able to defeat our request for an investigation, although the Illinois Central and the State of Illinois are partners at Springfield. I have no explanation except one.

Ten years ago, when I was in the Legislature of the State of Illinois, Senator Manney, then a member of the house, introduced a resolution to investigate the Illinois Central to determine whether or not that railroad company was paying in the 7 per cent that it had agreed to under its contract. That resolution was based upon evidence that had been given publicly. It was beaten in the house, and every man who voted in favor of that resolution had his annual transportation taken away from him. That is a fact that can be verified. That is an example of the pressure used by the railroad company in order to secure privileges for itself that citizens of the State can not get; whether or not it had any bearing on this situation, I do not know, but we are filing here some interesting exhibits showing efforts of the citizens of the State of Illinois—a part of the State—the kind of men that have to pay the taxes and who make up its social life and forms, giving a specific bill of reasons for the investigation, and yet the lawmaking body, committed to the function of representing them, denied, without answering any of the allegation of facts submitted, the right to have an investigation.

(At this point the witness submitted for the record various letters, and the same appear among the exhibits as "Connerford Exhibit No. 4.")

I want to cite to you one instance of the policy of the Illinois Central in regard to the matter of advertising. The Times-Democrat, of Vicksburg, Miss., published an editorial in November, 1914, in which they directly charged that the Illinois Central advertising had been taken away from them because they had printed matter favorable to the publicity agent of the striking men, Carl Person, who was at a time he was being tried for his life, having been compelled, in defense of his life, to kill.

Let me briefly sketch to you some facts concerning the efforts of the men to get publicity. Without money they could not meet the campaign of publicity launched by way of paid advertisements; neither could they afford to have matter printed to circularize the zones. They started a little newspaper, and the men who did picket duty acted as reporters for it. Those men were furnished with cameras and they produced pictures of wrecks and secured knowledge of the cause of wrecks, and difficulties at various points. These facts were printed, and at the same time the stock of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. started to fall; I think it left 160 and did not stop until it reached 110. The dividends of the Illinois Central were affected, and Mr. Markham, in the 1912 meeting of the stockholders, explained it by saying that it was due to labor troubles. They fell, I believe, from 7 to 5 per cent.

Then Carl Person, the editor of this paper, the only publicity means of the men, was suddenly seized by a United States marshal and dragged to Springfield Ill., and an indictment was returned by a Federal grand jury under an ancient Federal statute on the charge of having reflected injuriously on the conduct of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. and its officials. No one had questioned the fact that the bills filed in the Federal court by the railroad company asking writs of injunction reflected injuriously on the conduct of the men who withdrew their services. The result was that he was placed under bond under an indictment containing seven counts, the maximum penalty for which was 35 years in the Federal penitentiary and a $35,000 fine, in the discretion of the court. Maybe they thought they would be able to intimidate him, but the bulletins went out on time. After the next one, that was his bulletin printed at Decatur—he was slugged on the streets of the city, and at the same time he was told that he must stop the publication of the strike bulletins or leave town. This not stopping this avenue of publicity, Person was decoyed from his office by a fake telephone message which came from a saloon. In front of the saloon was a traveling engineer of the Illinois Central Railroad, and a number of other strike breakers, and in the saloon was an ex-chief of police, a man by the name of Tony Mussler; he asked Person to meet him at the Union Depot, using the name of a friend of Person as a decoy.

Person went down there and in the meantime this man moved over next to the depot near the door, and as Person passed he pounced upon him, and Person was compelled to kill this man in defense of his life; and in this community, controlled by the Illinois Central, the feeling was so strong against this young man who acted as a decoy to Person that it was necessary to close the saloons at 4 o'clock and for a special posse to be organized by the sheriff to protect the jail. Yet, when we went into the court room to invoke the right of trial to another county, where the Illinois Central was not the only railroad and where the sheriff's son was not in the employ of the Illinois Central, and where the mayor of the town was not an employee of the Illinois Central, and asked for 30 days to file affidavits, we found at the State attorney's office and the sheriff's office and the police department and employees of the Illinois Central were out getting affidavits to show that we could get a fair trial, and we tried to get affidavits showing we could not. But we had 30 days' election to show whether a man charged with murder and on trial for his life could get a trial in another county. A special attorney was selected to aid the regular prosecutor. The evidence showed that the State's attorney had made application to have Judge Herrick employed and paid out of the county funds. That was denied, but I know it is so, because Judge Herrick led in the prosecution of that case. We could not get a hearing on habeas corpus down in that jurisdiction, and that established a unique precedent. I am stating this so that you gentlemen may understand the feeling created in the minds of the men that worked for their living, and which, right or wrong, formed the point of view they had right along there. We had to sue out a writ of habeas corpus before Chief Justice Charles M. Walker of the criminal court of Chicago and have the sheriff of Cook County go 200 miles down into another district, coequal or coextensive, and bring a man out of jail who had been in there five and one-half months, in order to determine whether he was legally detained in jail; and the adjudication of that here established successfully at least in one particular that Person had been jailed, notwithstanding the presumption of his innocence, for the judge admitted him to bail and freedom that he should have five months before, if he had not been denied the writ of habeas corpus.

Briefly these statistics—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Before you get to that, Mr. Comerford, were these questionnaires sent out to lines other than the Illinois Central?

Mr. COMERFORD. The Harriman lines.

Chairman WALSH. Did that include the Union Pacific?

Mr. COMERFORD. It did.

Chairman WALSH. Have you given, in your investigations and in the conclusions based thereupon—have you made any separation between the lines of the Union Pacific, Illinois Central, and Southern Pacific?

Mr. COMERFORD. I have not except in so far as I have identified by particular instances, which I have defined as belonging to one or the other. The nearest approximation I have been able to make as to the number of men involved is about 30,000. The estimates vary between 28,000 and 35,000. The total years of service prior to September 30, 1911—and I want to make it clear that this represents just 1,000 men. As a consequence, on that basis, if these figures are correct, the proper estimate would be found by multiplying by 30, which shows that the men worked 7.837 years, which would show that the average period of individual service was 7.88 years, indicating that these men were not boomers; they were not of that type or the floating type, but were, rather, constant men in their devotion to their employment.

The number of single men represented in this thousand were 186. The percentage of single men, therefore, in the entire zone among the 30,000 affected would be 18.6 per cent.

The number of married men, 814. The percentage of married men, 81.4.

The number of children, 1,743, making the percentage of children to a family of 2.

I want to emphasize the significance—that is, compared with other statistics—in indicating the tendency toward race suicide, whether the piecework system, present wage scale, present shop conditions constitute deterrent to the raising of families.

Number of women and children dependents, 2,438. And when I say women dependents it includes wives, sisters, and mothers in conjunction with children whose age would unfit them for being self-supporting.

Number of children of school age, 469.

The number of children driven into child labor, 98, which would make the estimated number of children driven into child labor as a direct result of this strike, 2,940, or 20 per cent of all the children of a school age, in the members of the families of the men affected.

And it occurs to me that the passing of legislation prohibiting children working between certain ages does not mean anything, as long as the pay envelope of the head of the house is not adequate to keep them in school and to keep and feed them and to maintain the shelter.

The number of wives, 734.

The number of wives driven into wife labor, 268. The percentage of wife labor, 36.4.

The number of home owners, 429. The number of these home owners who owned their own homes in partnership with mortgages, 246, making the total number of home owners, 183, or showing that only 18 per cent of the men who worked for the Illinois Central were ever able to own a home, regardless of the fact that the average period of service was 7.88 years.

Percentage not owning their homes, 57.1.

Number of homes lost, 65, of those who owned their homes, indicating a percentage of 15.7 of the homes lost of the 24.6 per cent who did own homes before the difficulty.

Moved to cheaper quarters—and this indicates the standard of living. I have epitomized and attempted to recapitulate, and by the examination of the question sheets you will see the basis for recapitulation and can test its fairness—moved to cheaper quarters, 91 per cent of all the men, whether married or single, affected.

Broken homes, 68 per cent. And by broken homes I mean that men were compelled not only to move away, but leave their wives and children with their mothers or sisters who were dependent upon them back at the old home and take the road in seeking employment in order to maintain the family. And that separation lasted varying periods.

Compelled to ask charity, 91, which represents 10 per cent of the men. And we submit that there is not any more degrading or degenerating influence upon the character of a man in his relations to his home or in his relations to the State than to compel him to be the beneficiary of charity.

Compelled to sell furniture, 128, representing 12.8 per cent of the men who had furniture.

Compelled to borrow money and become dependent on relatives, 503, or 50 per cent of all the men.

Period of idleness, 1,079 years and 3 months.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until 10 o'clock Monday morning.

Commissioner LENNON. What period does that last item cover; what date is that examination?

Mr. COMERFORD. For the first 34 months succeeding it, meaning October and September, 1914.

(At 4:30 o'clock p. m., Saturday, April 10, an adjournment was taken until Monday, April 12, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

CHICAGO, ILL.,

Monday, April 12, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners Lennon, Alshon, O'Connell, and Garretson.

Chairman WALSH. I desire to announce that at the close of Mr. Comerford's testimony the first witness will be Mr. Koenekamp and the next Mr. Carlton. We will leave this Illinois Central controversy and proceed with the telegraphers. You may proceed, Mr. Comerford.

(Proceedings in relation to the matters mentioned by Chairman Walsh, for convenience of segregating testimony under one heading, appear heretofore under the title "Commercial Telegraph Companies.")

TESTIMONY OF MR. FRANK COMERFORD—Continued.

Mr. COMERFORD. In the interest of accuracy in the record I wish to state that the figures, a portion of which have been read, representing the survey made, are based upon answers coming not alone from employees who withdrew their services on the Illinois Central, but the Harriman lines as well, including all of the Harriman lines.

The number of wives driven into wife labor, 208; percentage of wife labor, 36.4.

Number of homes, 429; number of homes owned in partnership with mortgages, 246; number of homes owned clear, 183; percentage owning homes clear, 18.3; percentage owning homes with mortgage, 24.6; percentage not owning homes, 57.1; number of homes lost, 65; percentage of homes lost, 15.7.

Moved to cheaper quarters, 91 per cent.

Broken homes, 68 per cent.

Compelled to ask charity, 91; almost 10 per cent.

Compelled to sell furniture, 128; 12.8 per cent.

Compelled to borrow money and become dependent on relatives and friends, 503; 50 per cent.

Period of idleness, 1,079 years and 3 months; period of average individual idleness, 1 year.

Period of separation from families, 829 years and 9 months; average individual period of separation from families, 4 years and 6 months.

Total number of jobs, 4,559; average number of jobs, 4.55.

Number complaining of blacklist, 179.

Number complaining misrepresentations were made to men hired by agencies, 954.

Number of suicides, 10.

Number of insane, 9.

Deaths due to strike, 16.

Killed by strike in wrecks, explosions, and by guards (estimated), 600.

Total savings before strike, $112,148; average individual savings before strike, $112.14.

Total money owed before strike, $55,422; average individual indebtedness before strike, $55.42.

Amount of savings in excess of indebtedness before strike, $56,726; average individual solvency before strike, $56.72.

Total savings after 34 months of strike, $29,611; average individual savings after 34 months of strike, $29.61.

Total indebtedness after 34 months of strike, $134,367; average individual indebtedness after 34 months of strike, $134.36.

Aggregate indebtedness after 34 months of strike in excess of savings, $104,756; average individual indebtedness in excess of savings after 34 months of strike, $104.75.

In other words, on a basis of solvency calculated on the amount of savings and the indebtedness before strikes, each citizen, as an individual, was fifty-five dollars and some cents solvent. After 34 months of this discontent and withdrawal of service they were indebted or absolutely bankrupt and insolvent to the extent of $104.75 above and beyond any savings.

Total savings before strike, $3,361,440.

Total money owed before strike, $1,662,660.

Amount of savings in excess of indebtedness before strike, $1,701,780.

Total savings after 34 months of strike, $888,330.

Total indebtedness after 34 months of strike, $4,031,010.

Aggregate indebtedness after 34 months of strike in excess of savings, $3,142,680.

I have picked out a few typical cases from the questionnaires that are brief, and I want to read them into the record. This one is on the question of pensions, and it indicates the attitude of one old man in the service [reads]:

"After 30 years of service, which must have been satisfactory, this certainly was a hard blow to me to be locked out because they would not recognize the union I belonged to. Me, as a free United States citizen, would not give up the union. Even the risk I took in losing the pension I had been looking forward to in my old age, after many years of faithful service."

A typical case of blacklisting furnished by Edward F. Mason, 544 Washington Place, East St. Louis, Ill. [reads:]

"In making out the application for the job at the terminal railroad shops at Brooklyn, Ill., I was very careful not to mention having worked for the Illinois Central.

"I gave reference to three men who I had worked for and who had laid me off on account of a depression in business, each telling me that they wanted me to come back after business picked up.

"Nevertheless the general foreman sent word that I had the reputation of being a trouble maker in the shop. I was formerly on the shop committee at the Illinois Central shops and was secretary of the local System Federation and of the Central Trades and Labor Union of East St. Louis, Ill. In being refused the job it is still open, and they have been unable to get a machinist to take it so far."

Another case of blacklisting came from the Harriman lines [reads]:

"While standing at the depot one day watching the passengers and train Supt. Jeffrey, of the Union Pacific, came up and asked me what I was doing. I said, 'Nothing.' He then said, 'You better take what you can get, for if you go on any other road I will get you,' and then walked off."

I might suggest that the answers disclosed the fact that this particular superintendent, Jeffrey, seemed to have taken that position rather continuously, even to the extent of going to business men and suggesting that the men who withdrew their services should not be given credit, and in that way compelled them to leave town. [Continues reading:]

"The sheriff of Placer County tried to make me go back to work in the railroad yard; so did one of the trustees. Was also watched by special officers, both night and day whenever I left the house, until I left Roseville. And every job I have been on since the strike that amounted to anything, just as soon as they found out I was a striker, I would get fired. But at present I am working for myself—mining. I don't think I will get fired on my own job."

"EDWARD B. ROSE,
"Dutch Flat, Cal."

Then here is one [reading]:

"Shortly after the strike was called I was appointed superintendent of the picket line and as such came in contact with very near every one around the Albina shops, and was also one whom the guards and police were instructed to 'get'; only the presence of other strikers saved me on several occasions. On one occasion two boys came looking for work. The pickets caught them and were talking to them when a big guard named Stone and Deputy Sheriff McDonald came out in the street and with hands on their guns took the boys and forced them to go inside. Chief of Guards Mack invaded the home of Walter Seibar to arrest him for stealing wheat when it was another man that was wanted, beat him over the head with a revolver, and fractured his skull. The O. W. R. & N. paid big damages on account of it.

"There were 150 deputy sheriffs and police at the shop who received $100 per month from the city and county; the railroad paid the rest.

"W. C. LUKENBILL,

"Box 601, Rainier, Oreg.

"August 21 1914."

Here are a few typical cases of personal poverty brought about by this lockout. [Reading:]

"I was out of employment so long that I had to break up housekeeping and live with my brother-in-law in Kingsville and was separated from my family six weeks; then my baby was taken real ill and had to bring him back to Houston, Tex., for treatment and I was only making $2 a day. The union was not able to help us much.

"My sister-in-law lost her mind for nine months, over the strike; left a child 2 years old for the while she was in the asylum. My oldest brother's wife—he was a striker also—they were about to lose their home, and were both ill at the time and no work. I have no job at my trade now.

"Wishing for something better soon.

"Mr. W. P. BEAZLEY,

"2208 Decatur Street, Houston, Tex."

"My wife is a very heavy woman, weighs 240, has been obliged to wear an elastic stocking. Since the strike I could not afford to get one, the arteries of her limb have burst in consequence of it, and she is an invalid. She broke her right leg bone lengthwise and was obliged to work right on with no intermission every day for others, to try to help pay for our home, and our living was bread, butter, tea, sugar, and nothing else; $17 per month for three of us. This weakened her so as to cause complications at her age, the change of life. We have suffered great inconveniences too lengthy to tell."

This is hardly a typical case; it is an unusual case furnished by Mr. Edwards, 226 Sixteenth Street, Carroll, Ill. [Reads:]

"One man at Carroll tried to commit suicide from worry over the strike and was prevented by friends and was sent to the insane asylum at Anna, Ill. This man's name is Joe O'Loughlin and lives in Carroll. •

"It was generally supposed that Mr. Gatton's death was caused from worry over strike and his wife later hung herself and in a short time his boy Clyde, who was deputy sheriff of Pulaski County, committed suicide by blowing his brains out with a revolver in the presence of his sweetheart, saying, 'Here she goes,' and she did." • •

That is the complete extermination of a family directly attributable to worry growing out of the strike. [Reads:]

"The winter just passed was fearful for me. My wife and babe sick, only making $57 per month; was compelled to send my boy to work at messenger service in Decatur and the Western Union. I had to keep my two children out of school. They had no clothes or shoes or books, and I had no way to provide for them further than some cheap rooms and enough groceries to keep from starving. More than this, I have an injured mother depending on me since the strike. She has done light work, too much for her strength.

"WILLIAM DELL AHOLT,

"West Third Street, Moulton, Iowa."

"By being sick and out of employment I was forced to ask the Methodist orphanage at Jackson, Miss., to take my three girls and care for them, and when I got able to work would contribute to their support. My oldest sister has the boy, has cared for him since his mother's death six years ago. I, of course, send him money as I can. It was very humiliating to me to ask the home to take my little girls, as well as heartbreaking to part from them, but it was the only thing I could do. We were getting along nicely until the strike.

"F. L. REEKS,

"111 Harrison, Monroe, La."

"We sure have had a hard time since the Harriman strike and more sickness than we ever had in our lives, and my wife had to take in washings and go away and work, and now her health is so poor that she is not able to do her work hardly, but still we have to all work, everything we buy is so high and times have been so hard and work for men is surely scarce here, and I won't scab if I have to beg, although I have had lots of chances to scab.

"FRED W. WEAVER,
"409 East Elms, Salina, Kans."

"One can hardly tell with pen and ink the misery and the heartlessness the railroad corporations has caused me, my wife and I, our separation from our children and grandchildren. My wife has never once murmured. But the suffering she has passed through has plainly left its mark on her face. I am constantly in fear that I shall finally lose my home. As for myself the greatest damage the thing has done to me is that I have almost lost faith in humanity and humanity's God.

"THOMAS SCOPES,
"124 Minnesota Street, Danville, Ill."

Comparing some of these figures with statements furnished by the last report of the Census Bureau; that is, the report compiled and completed, these facts do not seem important; that we maintain in America about 1,500 almshouses; we maintain in America about 30,000 jails; about 10 per cent in even normal times of child life of America is driven into child slavery; about 1,300,000 arrests are made in 156 selected cities in the United States of America every year. We spend about $50,000,000 taking care of the insane.

The point of view of the workman, as I have found it from my observation and experience, is this: That religion and government, nature and morality tell him to marry. In obedience to these demands and laws he does marry. Incident to marriage comes the blood and moral and civic responsibility of making and maintaining of a home. That man has one thing to give—that is, his labor. He has one revenue and that is his wage. With that wage he must educate and feed and clothe and shelter his children and maintain his home. He gives all he has, the sum total of his physical and mental ability in work. If his pay envelope is not large enough to pay the burden of maintaining his home and educating and clothing his children he is absolutely helpless.

He is surrounded by laws he can not violate. He can not steal to make up the deficit in his pay envelope and discharge his responsibility to his family, because stealing is larceny, and that is a crime prohibited by law. He can not prevent his children coming into the world in order to reduce his family, because that is against the moral law and against the statutory law. He can not beg to make up the deficit, even if he is willing to, and even if organized society believes that begging would be a good thing for character, because begging is vagrancy, and that is prohibited by statute. He can not murder the children to keep from supplying them with food and clothing, because murder is a crime prohibited by statute. He can not avoid the responsibility, even if he were coward enough to want to, and leave his family and his children to the care of society, because if he does that the arm of the law will reach out and by process of extradition bring him back for having abandoned his children or his wife. He can not commit suicide if he is caught before he succeeds in the act, because committing suicide is a crime punishable by statute. And the attempt to pass legislation saying that he can not send his children out to work—why, we have failed to remedy the condition which causes his earning power to decrease as he grows older, while the expenses of his family increase as the children grow older, simply leaves him helpless.

We believe and we know that the children of the red-light district, the women of the red-light district are recruited largely from the girls that are in the beginning driven into child labor, and we believe that a girl who is denied the example of home life at a young age, who is denied a chance for education which fits her to cope with the temptations of life, underfed, with a desire for clothes to make herself attractive so that she can make a happy match of marriage in life, that girl is simply through utter weakness recruited into a thing that men of all minds agree and believe is a mar on our civilization.

We believe, too, that the tendency toward intoxication among men who work hard grows directly out of the fact that those men are underfed and overworked. They live from hand to mouth. They have the responsibility of a family to maintain and they live in the constant dread of losing their job.

and in many instances showing the effect upon morality, of the communities within the lockout zone, the direct result of the failure of the Illinois Central and the Harriman lines to even treat with the men as a State federation.

I want at this time to file officially with the commission the exhibits heretofore used in my testimony, together with the thousand-question sheets used as the basis of the investigation as to the Illinois Central and the Harriman lines, as to the social effect.

(The exhibit containing letters from business houses presented by the witness appear at the end of this subject as "Comerford Exhibit No. 5.")

The question sheets also presented by the witness were in printed form.)

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did Mr. Franklin leave with you a document to be filed?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes; I thank you, Mr. O'Connell [reads]:

"Statement from Mr. Joseph A. Franklin, international association president of the Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders of America.

"I desire to submit a few facts regarding the loss of life as a result of explosions and failures on locomotive boilers on the Southern Pacific Railway system, as compared with 14 other large railways in the United States, covering the same period of time as shown by the annual report of the chief inspectors of locomotive boilers to the Interstate Commerce Commission, issued October 8, 1912, and covering a period from July 1, 1911, to July 1, 1912:

	No. of engines.	Number killed.		No. of engines.	Number killed.
Southern Pacific.....	1,328	32	P. R. R. lines.....	5,574	2
Northern Pacific.....	1,464	0	C. & N. W.....	1,639	0
New York, N. H. & H.....	1,236	0	C. B. & Q.....	1,660	0
N. Y. C. & H. R.....	2,729	4	C. M. & St. Paul.....	1,593	0
Missouri Pacific.....	1,161	1	Erie Railway.....	1,403	0
Great Northern.....	1,192	0	Southern Railway.....	1,939	0
Baltimore & Ohio.....	2,078	1
A., T. & S. F.....	2,300	3		28,545	43
C., R. I. & P.....	1,557	0

The final figures show that the railroad companies mentioned had 28,545 engines in service, the Southern Pacific having 1,328 of them; that the total number killed were 43, and that for the 28,545 engines; and the Southern Pacific, having 1,328, killed 32.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Aishton would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner AISHTON. Regarding that last exhibit, Mr. Comerford, I suppose you have no personal knowledge of the conditions prevailing in the boilers on the Southern Pacific with regard to the character of the water used?

Mr. COMERFORD. Nothing that would be expert at all.

Commissioner AISHTON. The Southern Pacific, you know, runs largely through a desert country in the southwestern part of the United States, and the character of the water may have something to do with the boiler explosions.

Mr. COMERFORD. That would be quite as true of the Santa Fe as it would of the Southern Pacific, would it not?

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes, in a measure. Mr. Comerford, then this survey that was made, as I understand it, covered 1,000, did it?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. And it shows, does it not, the number of increases made on the lines of the Illinois Central?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. And of the Southern Pacific and the other lines interested in this affair separately?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. It shows just how it was distributed?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. Your survey indicated not only a very distressing condition to the former employees and their families of the different railroads, but also disclosed quite an interruption to the different commercial industries, along the line of the railroad?

Mr. COMERFORD. It did.

Commissioner AISHTON. And that is indicated by these letters of these business men and various industries?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. And you testified directly, I believe, regarding some suit growing out of the fact that the business of some coal company was very much interrupted and that of other lines of industry connected with the coal mining industry; that men were thrown out of work, and all that kind of thing?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. You heard Mr. Markham's testimony, I believe, as to the large financial loss to the Illinois Central Railroad during the strike?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. Now, you have given the matter, a great deal of study, I should assume, Mr. Comerford, and the commission would like to have your opinion as to a remedy—that is what we are all looking for, the corporations, the employees, the Government, and the people. Have you given the matter any thought?

Mr. COMERFORD. I have.

Commissioner AISHTON. Have you any objection to stating to the commission what your ideas are in regard to that, Mr. Comerford?

Mr. COMERFORD. I have not.

Commissioner AISHTON. We would be glad for such expression.

Mr. COMERFORD. I believe that Mr. Kruttschnitt struck the vital point when he spoke of publicity, but Mr. Kruttschnitt failed to provide in his detail a scheme by which the men would be able to secure publicity on the same terms with the companies, not having the money and not having the other methods of reaching the public. I believe that either a commission or the Department of Labor should, instead of being an unimportant department in the Government, should be made one of the most important, this being an industrial age and industrial problems being the most important, and that the powers of voluntary arbitration should be given; that a method of publicity should be devised in connection with the department; that the Government itself would issue the bulletins concerning the facts, and that the newspapers would be compelled to print them. In other words, I believe in an absolute Governmental supervision of the giving out of the news that affects that third party known as the people. It is not only the employer and the employee that have an interest, but the general social status of the State is directly connected, the shippers, the business men, the farmers, and all of the public who are affected by the general condition of the times.

I believe we should have voluntary arbitration and that in conjunction with it the Government should issue the bulletins, and it should be compulsory on the part of the newspapers to print the facts in a given situation. I believe that if the newspapers, for instance, while these negotiations were pending, had printed the actual facts, that instead of the pitched battle that was resorted to on the 30th of September, 1911, the Illinois Central and the Harriman lines would have come to the council table with the men, and these tentative agreements and rules which were simply submitted for the purpose of negotiating would not have been thrown out, and the situation that happened on the 52 roads would have happened on those roads, and there would have been no difficulty.

I believe the Government will be compelled ultimately to take the position that the men not only have the right to organize, but, for the good of the country, must always organize. I think collective bargaining makes it absolutely imperative that you have organization—an organized force among the men.

In the day of the individual being the master over individuals as employees, that man was held responsible in the community for the conditions under which his men worked, the wages that they got, and in a measure, their families, and if he drove too hard a bargain, the penalty of social disgrace was visited on him and his family. If the family of the employee was compelled to ask for charity, the community rose up against the individual employer. But when the corporation form succeeded the individual employer which gave the individual employee a chance to come in personal contact with the employer, there came a different way of doing business; there came two grades of employees, one grade you call official, and the other grade you refer to as the men. A man who can official in an industry is simply retained by the stockholders and given a certain field and told to get the best possible results, and he becomes a slave driver in many instances, not because he wants to, but because he knows that his future, his increase in salary, and his advancement is determined by the profits and dividends that he can secure for his employer. He also knows that in competition with other employers, other officials occupying the same position, that if the returns from his work do not show well, he will probably lose his place and go downward, and that stimulates a man to activity that in many cases is not human.

Commissioner Aishton. Of course, that is largely theoretical, is it not, Mr. Comerford?

Mr. COMERFORD. I think anything that has not been put in practice is theoretical.

Commissioner Aishton. Now, coming back to the remedy—you think—and I infer that in your talk, you are referring to what may be called employees of transportation companies as distinguished as purely industrial concerns?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner Aishton. You think there is a difference between the regulation, if we call it such, that should apply to employees in transportation concerns, where the distress is so widespread and the interference with commerce so great, and of purely industrial concerns?

Mr. COMERFORD. It is simply the accentuation of a condition, that is all; it might be to a larger degree in transportation companies, meaning by transportation, shopmen and such.

Commissioner Aishton. I mean men employed by transportation companies in any capacity in the transportation fields; does not collective bargaining become a proposition applying to a greater number of employees, in a greater degree, than in other business at the present time? I do not mean this present form of collective bargaining that this trouble is over, but collective bargaining where the men, as a body, negotiate with their employers, rather than as individuals.

Mr. COMERFORD. That is true.

Commissioner Aishton. Both in the shop trades and in the train service?

Mr. COMERFORD. That is true.

Commissioner Aishton. I think so. You are familiar with the Erdmann Act, and the Newlands Act, as it is now called in its amended form?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner Aishton. Does that seem to lack the feature of authoritative publicity that you think, and Mr. Kruttschnitt thinks, is one of the principal features in the elimination of the trouble?

Mr. COMERFORD. I think it absolutely lacks it; and that is its weakness.

Commissioner Aishton. Do you think it ought to be strengthened by new legislation that will bring that about?

Mr. COMERFORD. I do. I think it utterly ineffective without that.

Commissioner Aishton. I think you agree with Mr. Kruttschnitt, in his testimony, that compulsory arbitration has been a failure?

Mr. COMERFORD. I think so.

Commissioner Aishton. And would not be fair?

Mr. COMERFORD. Particularly in our country; it could not be.

Commissioner Aishton. I think that is the general opinion. I do not know. I heard some discussion the other day about this Canadian act known as the Lemieux Act, are you familiar with that?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner Aishton. The provisions of that provide for publicity, do they not, by Government authorities?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner Aishton. What are the weak points in that act, as you see it?

Mr. COMERFORD. The weak point in that act is the period of time given the employer to get ready for the difficulty.

Commissioner Aishton. Two weeks?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner Aishton. That is its only weakness, is it, Mr. Comerford?

Mr. COMERFORD. I think that is the principal weakness in the act.

Commissioner Aishton. I am not familiar with the terms of the act; I heard it discussed once or twice.

Mr. Comerford, just as a matter of correction for the record, I notice, and I think it was an inadvertence, that you used the term "lockout" in speaking of some of those typical cases on the Southern Pacific road; as a matter of fact, there was no lockout, was there?

Mr. COMERFORD. In my opinion, it was a lockout. The definition of lockout by the Supreme Court of the United States is the closing down of a factory for the purpose of putting out of employment men. Now, it is my contention that an American citizen has a right to organize, and if he has the right to organize, he has the right to organize in such form as he pleases. If that is true, the railroad company, or any other employer, that refuses to meet men for the purpose of negotiating an agreement simply because of the form the men select to meet them constitute, in my judgment, as complete a lockout of those men as though they turned the key in the factory and suspended operations. This is analytical, of course; it is a matter of analogy. I have always insisted this was a lockout, rather than a strike.

Commissioner AISHTON. Under the original interpretation, though, of those words, it would hardly apply, would it?

Mr. COMERFORD. My interpretation is based on the reasoning in the United States Supreme Court decisions, and until they are changed I have been taught as a lawyer to follow them.

Commissioner AISHTON. I judge that is very correct.

In speaking about publicity the other day, Mr. Comerford, there was a mention made to the employees publishing a paper.

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. And that was the only means of publicity the men had?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. Is there a file of that paper in existence?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. Would there be any objection to giving the commission a file of that paper?

Mr. COMERFORD. I think not; of course, if the file in existence is the only file, it would probably be furnished with the understanding that it be returned, because the file would be important to the men involved, it being the history of their efforts as to publicity.

Commissioner AISHTON. Would it be satisfactory, Mr. Chairman, that it be furnished with that understanding?

Chairman WALSH. It may be filed under those conditions. If there is an extra file we will have our investigator go and get it; and if not, it may be submitted under those conditions.

Commissioner AISHTON. I think that is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Your idea of publicity in connection with industrial strike is this, is it not, that the information upon which public opinion shall be based, should come from an authoritative governmental source so that it would be impossible to form public opinion on misinformation?

Mr. COMERFORD. That is exactly the purpose of it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Your idea would debar either side from the publication of alleged facts?

Mr. COMERFORD. Exactly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Viewed through their own glasses?

Mr. COMERFORD. Exactly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In regard to the publicity that comes under the Lemieux Act, the Dominion industrial dispute act, your idea would be that if investigation by the Government became compulsory that it should progress without halting?

Mr. COMERFORD. Exactly.

Commissioner GARRETSON (continuing). The progress of the strike?

Mr. COMERFORD. Exactly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is, it would not afford an opportunity for either side to reinforce itself while the investigation was taking place?

Mr. COMERFORD. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you ever seen—I assume you are somewhat familiar with the workings of the Lemieux Act?

Mr. COMERFORD. Not from actual contact in Canada.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What?

Mr. COMERFORD. I am not familiar with it from any actual disturbance in Canada.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then you might disclaim competence to answer the question I am going to ask; have you ever seen a report coming from any investigation made under the Lemieux Act?

Mr. COMERFORD. No, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Except what was a defense of the decision reached by that board?

Mr. COMERFORD. I have never examined a report under that act.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I have been "Lemieuxed" a few times.

That is all.

Commissioner AHSITON. May I ask one more question?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Commissioner AHSITON. I was not quite clear about your idea of the Erdmann or the Newlands Act; I did not ask this specific question, as to whether it is your opinion that that act ought to apply to all employees in transportation service, or should it apply only to shopmen—that is, the shop craft?

Mr. COMERFORD. No; it is my idea that an act based on the principles of that act, with certain amendments, should be made to apply to all men who work.

Commissioner AHSITON. That was the intent of my opinion; that is all, thank you.

Chairman WALSH. Will you, at your convenience, suggest the amendments on that basis that you have to suggest to that act?

Mr. COMERFORD. Make a rough draft?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; just a rough draft.

Mr. COMERFORD. I will be glad to.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Mr. Comerford; you will be permanently excused.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT OF MR. JULIUS KRUTTSCHNITT.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO., EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,

April 14, 1915.

To the Hon. FRANK P. WALSH,

Chairman United States Commission on Industrial Relations,

Field Headquarters, Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: One of the questions asked me when I appeared before your honorable commission in Chicago on Saturday, April 10, was what could be done to settle labor disputes and maintain industrial peace in the future. I should like, with your permission, to explain my answer in some detail.

The act of Congress approved June 15, 1913, known as the Newlands Act, providing for mediation, arbitration, and conciliation in controversies between certain employers and employees, is a great improvement on the Erdmann Act, which it superseded, but it relates to employees engaged in train service or train operation only of common carriers engaged in interstate commerce. Its usefulness would be greatly increased if it were made to apply to all railway employees engaged in the interstate business of the employer, including those engaged in keeping in repair cars, locomotives, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, and other instrumentalities of interstate commerce. The Board of Mediation and Conciliation appointed by the President under the act has proven useful in maintaining industrial peace, but as it frequently results, as a consequence of invoking the services of this board, that railway expenses are increased, it is very important to the carriers that the board should be closely coordinated with, or, better still, subordinated to the Interstate Commerce Commission, so that the same authority responsible for increasing expenses of the carriers should at the same time incur a corresponding responsibility for providing revenue to meet the expenditures. The reasonableness of such a provision is apparent when the complete control of revenues and almost equally complete control of expenditures by Government at the present time is considered.

The Newlands Act provides that when a controversy arises either party may apply to the Board of Mediation and Conciliation for its adjustment, and the board may offer its services to the parties in controversy where interruption to public service is imminent. There is no obligation, however, other than a sense of obligation to the public, on either employer or employee to submit differences to mediation. Instances have occurred where mediation and arbitration have been stubbornly refused with utter disregard of the public's interest and rights, and the act offers no remedy. This defect could apparently be remedied, as is done in the Canadian industrial disputes investigation act of 1907, which makes a combination, lockout, or strike illegal until the questions at issue shall have been thoroughly investigated and made public; and there should be a provision that where the board offers its services for investigation, mediation, and conciliation it shall be obligatory on and not optional to the parties to submit their differences so that the public may judge the dispute intelligently.

The desirable feature in the Canadian act is that it compels investigation and publicity and peace pending investigation, and paves the way, as the Newlands

Act does, to arbitration, which, however, is optional with the parties to the dispute. The Canadian department of labor, in its bulletin of April, 1914, reviews the proceedings under the industrial disputes investigation act of 1907 for a period of seven years during which it had been in effect. One hundred and sixty-two applications had been received, as a result of which 141 boards of conciliation and investigation were established. In 19 cases the matters in dispute were adjusted by mutual agreement while steps were pending for the establishment of boards. Two applications were under consideration at the end of the year. There were altogether only 18 cases in seven years in which strikes were not either averted or ended through the instrumentality of the act. Out of this total one occurred in the operation of railways, five in railway offices, shops, and yards, and one in the operation of a street railway. In a report dated December 9, 1912, on the industrial disputes investigation act of Canada, 1907, made by Sir George Askwith, chief industrial commissioner to the British Board of Trade, and presented to both Houses of Parliament of Great Britain, the purposes of the act are defined as follows:

"The simple purpose of the act is to insure the recognition of the interests of the public as a third party in trade disputes, and the insistence that that third party, through the Government, shall have a voice in regard to a dispute affecting their interests, and, accordingly to the act, before a stoppage of work takes place. In practice, the recognition extends to cases arising before or after a stoppage of work. While this principle of the recognition of the public interest in trade disputes is emphasized in the act, the actual interference with the parties in their settlement of their differences is sought to be reduced to a minimum by the act being confined—

1. To industries whose uninterrupted continuance is of high importance to the well-being of the Nation (mining, railways, shipping, and other public utilities); and

2. To a brief suspension of the right to stop, as distinct from a complete prohibition of stoppage."

And further on occur the following views, which are as applicable to our country as they are to Great Britain:

"* * * and I think that it might be feasible in the United Kingdom, with advantage both to employers and employed, to give opportunity for such investigation and recommendation as would bring into light the real causes of difficulties, and create in the public mind and in the minds of employers and employed the opinion that when opportunity exists by law such opportunity should be taken advantage of, and that strikes and lockouts ought not to be commenced, and certainly not supported by 'sympathetic' strikes, while such investigation and recommendation are pending. Investigation and recommendation would not be necessary in all cases, and could well be confined, at any rate in the first instance, to cases in which the public were likely to be seriously affected.

"From the point of view of the public the advantage of such a course is obvious. The public have no use for strikes or lockouts, and such a course might reasonably be expected to lessen their number. While the public might often have much difficulty in bringing opinion to bear in favour of acceptance or rejection of technical decisions, which in many trades it would be impossible for persons who had not examined the question to understand, their support to the principle that the ordeal of battle should give place to reasonable judgment would probably be emphatic and frequently effective.

"From the point of view of the employers such a course need not interfere with the administrative details of business or discipline, but should give better opportunity for regular and consecutive business by reducing the number of strikes, by bringing strikes to an earlier conclusion, and by the powerful effect which I am convinced would result in the direction of rendering unnecessary and ineffective the progress of those sympathetic strikes by which employers having no quarrel with their own workmen are now so frequently disturbed."

Reports of the satisfactory operation of the Canadian act, and a conviction that like benefits would accrue through the adoption of some of its provisions in the United States, induced me to send an assistant to Canada in September, 1914, to learn at first hands from the managers of Canadian railways, and from the Canadian department of labor, their experience with the operations of the act. The opinion alike of railway executives, and of the commissioner of labor, was that their disputes and investigation act was satisfactory and very successful in preventing lockouts and strikes. In discussing the results of our observations with the executive heads of some of our important railway systems the opinion was expressed, without exception, that the provisions of the Canadian act were most helpful in the interests of employers, employees, and the general public, the three parties to every industrial disturbance.

Respectfully submitted.

J. KRUTTSCHNITT.

P. S.—The report¹ of Sir George Askwith, in which the industrial disputes investigation act of 1907 is printed in full as an appendix, is of such great interest and fits so closely conditions in our own country, that I inclose a copy.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT OF MR. JULIUS KRUTTSCHNITT.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO., EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,

April 30, 1915.

HON. FRANK P. WALSH,

Chairman U. S. Commission on Industrial Relations,
Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Mr. N. H. Loomis, general solicitor of the Union Pacific, informs me we are invited to file, on or before May 10, answers to data put before the Industrial Commission by Mr. Comerford on April 10 and 12.

ARBITRARY POWER THE OBJECT OF THE STRIKE.

Mr. Comerford in his testimony, referring to a copy of a circular offered by me to show the attempt of the federation on the Harriman lines to bring about a strike on all railroads in the United States, says that the men refused to sanction it, thereby proving that the power to paralyze business throughout the country was safely vested in their hands.

The federation then existed on but few lines, and the overwhelming vote against a general strike was cast not by federationists but by members of the separate crafts in no wise connected with them. I offered the copy of the circular to prove that federation was not for convenience, economy, and celerity in treating with the employers, as frequently alleged, but for the purpose of acquiring arbitrary power and absolute and irresponsible control over the railroads. That the attempt failed was due not to the good judgment of the federated men, who did all in their power to cause a general strike, but to the good judgment of nonfederated men in the various crafts on roads not under federation control.

The aims of the federation are evidence by the following quotation from their circular:

"* * * to fire our most effective shot, to wit: The federation with other federations and union shopmen throughout the country, so that if necessary to win this strike they can be called out and force the railroads to grant our demands * * *."

The allegation that the men's demands on the railroads were for much more than they expected to get and that if audiences had been granted they would have been materially modified is proven untrue, thus:

"Let us make the federation of shop employees as nearly invincible as possible * * *, to compromise at this time would probably prevent the federation of the shopmen into a nation-wide organization. * * * Through compact organization comprising not only one craft but all crafts working in one industry, that strikes can be decisively won, enabling the workers in that industry to demand and realize conditions which they know to be just * * *."

"* * * to call out, if necessary, all other shopmen in the United States for the purpose of winning, if possible, without compromising the demands of the blanket agreement, all of which demands we consider not only fair and just, but actually conservative."

That is, the federation was to be the sole judge of the justness of the blanket demands, as to which there was to be no compromise.

We always feared the arbitrary power and the absolute and irresponsible control of the functions of the railroads that system federation would vest in the men. The candid admissions above referred to, made three or four months after the declaration of the strike, prove how well grounded were our fears, and vindicated our judgment in declining to enter into agreements that would have surrendered the trust imposed on us by the stockholders and the public.

9950 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

EMPLOYMENT OF MEN UNDER FALSE PRETENSES.

It is alleged that employment agencies deceived the men by false and fraudulent representations. Every man employed on our lines made application for employment over his signature on a form marked "A," hereto attached, one of the paragraphs of which is as follows:

"I am to take the place of any former employee of the company who is on strike or who has ceased to work for any reason."

PUNISHMENT FOR ASSAULTS, TAMPERING WITH WITNESSES, ETC.

After giving details of indiscriminate arrests on the Illinois Central and adding that in few or no cases was guilt proven or punishment inflicted, Mr. Comerford says: "I have been giving statistics in my own experience, and others by the thousand will be filed."

I have not seen the thousands of statements filed by Mr. Comerford, but for fear that he may have overlooked the record of arrests and convictions on Southern Pacific lines, I attach a statement, marked "B," which shows that out of 118 arrests made for such crimes as assault with deadly weapons, assault and battery, firing shots, etc., punishment was inflicted in 51, or 43 per cent of all cases.

One of the strikers punished was G. W. Leopold, vice president of the machinists' union, who had just been elected to the presidency but had not yet taken office. He tried to smuggle witnesses in an assault and battery case out of the country, and on being detected became a fugitive from justice for a period of six months, when he was arrested and convicted and sentenced to six months in jail.

MURDER AND ASSASSINATION CASES.

Three other cases, in which no arrests have yet been made, deserve specific mention:

J. J. Pipes, a citizen of Athens, Tex., employed as guard in the company's shops in Houston, and a number of his fellow citizens were attacked by strikers, who began by throwing rocks and ended in shooting, as a result of which Pipes was wounded and died a few days afterwards. The stereotyped claim was made that Pipes was shot by his friends.

Frank Tullis, employed as guard in the shop grounds at Houston, was separated by a rail fence from a crowd of strikers and sympathizers. At 1 o'clock in the morning of October 4, 1911, as Tullis passed on his beat, an assassin, who rested his gun on the fence, shot and instantly killed him.

Thomas Lyons, an old shop employee at Houston, who did not go out on strike, engaged in feeding his pet cats near the roundhouse in Houston in the early morning of December 16, 1911, was instantly killed by a shot fired apparently from a building patronized by striking shop employees.

All three of these American citizens lost their lives because they had not considered it necessary to obtain a license from the federation to work for the support of their wives and children.

USE OF DYNAMITE—INCENDIARISM.

In the federation meeting at Salt Lake in June, 1911, resolutions were adopted offering sympathy and moral and financial support to the union men who murdered 32 men in Los Angeles with dynamite for no offense other than failing to secure permission of the unions to work for the support of their wives and children.

On October 16, 1911, a watchman stationed at a high railroad bridge near Naples, Cal., detected a man running from under the bridge, and on investigation discovered 41 sticks of dynamite near one of the piers, with caps and fuses ready for lighting attached to 21 of the sticks. The intention was evidently to wreck the bridge in front of an early morning train, and to throw it, with its innocent passengers, to the bottom of the canyon.

On the morning of October 27, 1911, a signal inspector at Ellwood, Cal., discovered 34 sticks of dynamite placed in and around the frog of the west switch, and 34 more sticks in the frog of the house track.

November 6, 1911, section Foreman found 19 sticks of dynamite near Ellwood depot.

November 10, 1911, occurred an explosion of powder that had been placed on top of steam pipe of tourist car in passenger train at El Paso, Tex.

June 8, 1912, a quantity of dynamite was found on track near depot, Merlin, Oreg.

September 8, 1912, 30 sticks of dynamite were found under rails and six detonating caps placed on the explosive, with a wire connecting the caps and rails.

October 23, 1911, bridge near Tracy, Cal., discovered on fire with a bundle of waste and bunch of matches.

On January 30, 1912, one J. Scott, secretary of the federation, issued strike bulletin No. 100 from its office in the Hibernia Building, San Francisco, and under the heading, "Brothers, greeting," informed them that he had found a "very able" article relating to the falling earnings of the Harriman lines, one paragraph of which, reading thus: "The strike is practically over, but train movements are interfered with by bars of soap that get into the engine boilers accidentally and emery dust that somehow gets on the axles," was followed by this suggestive and illuminating comment from Scott to the brothers: "He forgot to mention the dynamite or sugar that caused so many boiler explosions. Next." The "next" probably refers to the destruction of locomotive No. 704 at San Antonio, Tex., on March 18, 1912, when 30 men were killed. Independent experts, after careful investigation, were unable to find evidence reflecting on the character of the boiler and appliances, or on the ability or conduct of the company's employees, sufficient to explain the destruction and condition of the wrecked parts of the locomotive; but their investigation resulted in creating a strong suspicion of the use of high explosives, and it is confidently expected that time will furnish the explanation of what is believed to be a crime almost without parallel.

DENIAL OF BLACKLISTING E. B. ROSE.

A statement of Ed. B. Rose, of Dutch Flat, Cal., is given to show that after the strike this man was hounded out of employment by railroad influences. He voluntarily and emphatically denies any such meaning, as evidenced in copy of his statement hereto attached, marked "C."

SUPPLYING OMISSION IN FRANKLIN'S EXHIBIT.

Mr. Franklin, president of the Boilermakers and Iron Shipbuilders of America, introduces comparative statistics of accidents due to failures of locomotive boilers on the Southern Pacific and other railroad systems.

Mr. Franklin, though evidently a close student of such matters, offers no explanation of these figures. To supply what was no doubt due to lapse of memory, we offer the following, for which we are indebted to the much better memory of the secretary of the Federation of Shop Employees, who in the fraternal greetings already referred to glouts over the effect of soap in locomotive boilers and emery on journals, and calls attention to the fact that many explosions caused by dynamite had been forgotten: On the Southern Pacific lines west of El Paso 301 locomotives, 65 passenger cars, and 3,769 freight cars were maliciously damaged, and 62 attempts to damage roundhouse and shop facilities were made. The secretary was not troubled by doubts as to what caused locomotive explosions.

PURCHASING PUBLICITY.

Mr. Comerford says the men were not able to secure publicity on the same terms with the companies, not having the money and other methods of reaching the public.

I repeat what I said in my oral testimony, that our companies spent no money to advertise their side of the case. Statements were furnished to the press, on request, when the strike was called, but thereafter little or nothing appeared from the company's side, as its officers were instructed to devote their energies to reorganize the service, to ignore statements emanating from labor headquarters, and to avoid newspaper controversies. In addition to their publications in newspapers, the employees published bulletins and circulars which were widely circulated.

9952 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

LOCKOUT OR STRIKE?

Mr. Comerford, in reply to a question, defends his use of the term "lockout" applied to the federation strike by quoting the Supreme Court's definition of a lockout to be "the closing down of a factory for the purpose of putting out of employment men."

On September 26 and 27, 1911, the following telegrams were exchanged:

[Postal telegram.]

DAVENPORT, IOWA, Sept. 26, 1911.

JULIUS KRUTTSCHNITT,

V. P. U. P. Ry. Co., 120 B'way, N. Y.:

We are officially instructed by our organization to request you to agree to meet the representatives of the shop federations or to notify you that we have no other alternative but to give our approval and permission to the men on the lines you represent to quit work. We will expect an answer so that we can arrange to meet you by noon Thursday next at Chicago for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements as above indicated. Send reply to James O'Connell, Davenport Hotel.

J. W. KLINE,
M. F. RYAN,
J. A. FRANKLIN,
M. O'SULLIVAN,
JAMES O'CONNELL.

[Western Union telegram.]

NEW YORK CITY, September 27, 1911.

JAMES O'CONNELL AND OTHERS,

Davenport Hotel, Davenport, Iowa:

Replying to your telegram of September 26, my presence here, of course, makes it impossible for me to meet you in Chicago Thursday noon.

If the essentials of admittedly fair and considerate treatment, the payment of the highest wages of any railroads in the territories served by our lines, and the guaranty of hospital and generous pension benefits have not been sufficient to deter our shopmen from terminating agreements insuring these conditions, made from time to time in conference with their labor unions, and from spending four or five months in devising new issues and means to destroy existing harmonious relations, and, moreover, are not sufficient to induce them to remain in our employ and to make them realize their duty to the public, I do not see that we can do anything more to convince them that they have no good reason to stop work or to prevent your giving approval and permission to them to leave our service.

J. KRUTTSCHNITT.

Assuming for the sake of the argument that the Supreme Court is correctly quoted, the issue on the Southern Pacific does not in the remotest degree come under the definition. At no time were the shops or factories of the company closed, and at no time was any person desiring work deprived of access to the shops, except by the strikers themselves. When the strike was declared 40 per cent of the Southern Pacific shop forces ignored the order and remained at work. It requires a good deal of ingenuity to make the Supreme Court definition apply to the 60 per cent who walked out of buildings that were not "closed down" at any time, and who, in walking out did so of their free wills and with the permission and approval of five gentlemen in Davenport, Iowa, and without the exertion of any pressure or compulsion by their employers.

Yours, very truly,

J. KRUTTSCHNITT.

OFFICE OF CHAIRMAN OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY,
New York City, Apr. 26, 1915.

"C."

STATEMENT OF MR. E. B. ROSE.

DUTCH FLAT, April 20, 1915.

About the year 1908 or 1909 I was employed by the S. P. Co. as heavy repair man in Sacramento shop in car shop No. 5, Mr. George Bottoff, foreman. I worked in the shop about four months, then I went out into the Sacramento yards and went to inspecting air, under Mr. McInerry, foreman. I worked about a year in the yard, then went to Elvas Junction and tended switches for Mr. Andy McDonough, yardmaster. I worked at Elvas about a year. From Elvas I went to Roseville as air inspector, working under Mr. Chilton, foreman. I worked at Roseville until the strike was called, September 30, 1911. I went out with the strikers. I was a member of the Brotherhood of Railroad Carmen of America at that time, but "not" the present time. The strike had been on about three months when I was appointed financial secretary of B. R. C. of A. About six months after the strike was on I was appointed chairman of the local federation of labor at Roseville. I was at Roseville about one year after the strike. I moved to Dutch Flat with my wife and three children, one 7 months, the other 2 years, and the other 4 years old. I went to work for the Utah Construction Co. as a brakeman and worked about two weeks and was sent by the Utah Construction Co. to the Whitley Construction Co. I was running an engine. I stayed with the job till it was finished.

The S. P. Co. nor any officials of the Southern Pacific Co. did not interfere with me in regards to me seeking employment. They did not point me out as a striker or did not hinder me from making a living for my family and myself; not that I know of; and if anyone connected with the S. P. Co. would have interfered with me seeking a living I would have surely known of same.

There were forms sent to all strikers to fill in from the attorney of the B. R. C. of A. Mr. Comerford was the name of one of the attorneys. The forms were in the nature of, "Where party was employed and where employed at the present time and if S. P. Co. was interfering with me in regards to getting employment." I stated in the form that I had gone to work for the P. F. E. Co. at Roseville, icing cars in the Roseville yards. That was three days after the strike was called. I worked one shift and got laid off, but I did not state in the form sent to me the cause of my discharge, because I did not know. The forms were sent from the B. R. C. of A. The financial secretary is named E. W. Weeks and is located at Kansas City. I do not know if forms were sent to me from Kansas City or Chicago. If the S. P. Co. would tender me a position, I surely would accept quickly.

E. B. ROSE.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT BY MR. J. W. KLINE.

The premium system installed in the mechanical department of the Union Pacific Railroad in 1903 was fought by the metal trades for one year. The late E. H. Harriman was instrumental in settling that strike over the head of President Burt, who was the one who attempted to force the premium system on the shop employees. The strike was settled with the understanding that the premium system would not be forced onto any one who did not care to work it, but it was not altogether withdrawn, and union men were encouraged to work it. Several cases came to my attention where an extra allowance would come on pay day, and up to date it is being worked more or less on the Union Pacific.

Mr. Markham, president of the Illinois Central; Mr. Parks, general manager; Mr. Foley, assistant manager; Mr. Barnum, general superintendent of motive power, were formerly Harriman-line officials, and shortly after their affiliation with the Illinois Central the time-study cards were introduced, and in some instances the stop watch was used, and with these innovations and other discriminations among the subordinate officers, the men became uneasy and complained that since the arrival of the new officials a speed-up policy was being inaugurated; especially were they alarmed because the officials responsible came from a road that was working the premium system more or less.

During the convention held in Kansas City, 1912, a message was sent to President Taft, signed by a committee of delegates representing the convention, appealing to him to interest himself in the strike, as the various boiler explosions and other bad conditions of the car equipment were dangerous to the travelling public. That was about the sense of the telegram. To that we received no reply.

In the early part of the year 1913 Mr. Parks, general manager of the Illinois Central, met representatives of our federation in the East and a proposition was made which was laid before the general officers of the federation in Chicago on February 26. The proposition was given consideration and a meeting was arranged with Mr. Parks and Mr. Bell, his superintendent. At this conference Mr. Parks absolutely refused to sign a federated agreement. Neither would he sign a contract with any craft, but would give us a set of rules that the strike breakers were then working under, and out of about 9,000 strikers he would give employment to 300 immediately and in the course of the summer he would take them back as needed, without discrimination as to their union affiliations.

This proposition, ridiculous as it was, was submitted to the general chairman of the various organizations on the Illinois Central in St. Louis on March 4, and by that committee unanimously rejected. They concluded that the union men would be taken back in such small numbers that they would either be forced to quit the service or be induced to leave the unions by the time another batch of strikers would be taken back. What the company wanted particularly was that the strike be called off.

At the Seattle convention of the American Federation of Labor in 1913 we wired President Wilson through President Gompers and requested that he use his good offices in behalf of the strikers. We were encouraged in this effort on account of the Harriman lines officials recognizing a federation of the transportation brotherhoods on the G. I. & S. A. at Houston, Tex., and federation being the obstacle in the way of a settlement between the mechanical crafts and the company, we thought that a precedent had been established that might possibly lead up to a settlement of our strike. No results.

At our next convention in Kansas City, April, 1914, it was decided that we open up negotiations with the general managers' association with headquarters in the Transportation Building in Chicago. This also proved unsuccessful. Later in the year (I think in August) an effort was made by the Department of Labor to mediate, and Mr. Moffitt and Mr. Smith met President Markham, of the Illinois Central, in Chicago on one or two occasions, and also Mr. Kruttschnitt, of the Harriman lines, in New York, without favorable results.

Mr. Kruttschnitt in his testimony stated that public opinion was the only logical way to settle industrial difficulties, and that publicity was necessary. I agree with him in that respect, providing the columns of the public press would be open to both contending parties without the purchase price.

Mr. Markham, president of the Illinois Central, frankly stated that advertising rates were paid for. The strikers were unable to do that. We were at a disadvantage, and public opinion was swayed by these purchased newspaper advertisements, and the public were not permitted to read the strikers' side of the case. While I am opposed to compulsory arbitration, I would favor a Government commission to hear industrial disputes and with power to lay before the public, through the press, without prejudice, both sides of the case. When I speak of Government power, I have in mind the subsidized press, and it will take some authority to compel the public press to give the working man a square deal.

STATEMENT OF MR. N. H. LOOMIS.

UNION PACIFIC SYSTEM,
Omaha, Nebr., April 19, 1915.

MR. BASIL M. MANLY,
Director of Investigation, Room 643, Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Just prior to the closing of the testimony given before the United States Commission on Industrial Relations April 12 in the Illinois Central and Harriman lines strike investigation, the following memoranda, passed between Mr. Walsh, chairman, and myself:

"MR. WALSH:

"Will an opportunity be given to file letters or written statements explaining or contradicting letters or statements or data put in evidence this morning by

9956 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. Comerford? If so, within what time should it be done? May not wish to do this, but would like the opportunity if, after checking the testimony over, it seems advisable.

"April 12, 1915.

N. H. LOOMIS."

Upon this note the chairman wrote the following indorsement.:

"These are invited, but to get into our record should be sent to Basil M. Manly, director of investigation, room 643, Transportation Building, Chicago, on or before May 10, 1915."

In view of the above I inclose herewith original letters (2) from Mr. W. M. Jeffers, superintendent, U. P. R. R. Co., Omaha, Nebr., for filing.

Will you kindly acknowledge receipt?

Very truly, yours,

N. H. LOOMIS.

[PERSONAL.]

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD CO.,
Omaha, Nebr., April 15, 1915.

Mr. N. H. LOOMIS,
General Solicitor, Omaha.

DEAR SIR: From the press dispatches I notice reference made to gunmen being employed in policing railroad property in Wyoming during the shopmen's troubles some two or three years ago.

C. B. Irwin, referred to, is stock solicitor for this company, and is a man prominent in affairs in Wyoming. He is in no sense a gunman and never has been; in fact the term "gunman" is a misnomer.

The people of Wyoming are as law-abiding, perhaps more so, than those in any other State in the Union.

With reference to statement relative to Watchman Horton at Laramie. I was not connected with that territory at the time Horton was in the employ, but am more or less familiar with his trouble at that point. This affair had no connection whatever with the shopmen—it was entirely a personal matter. He was arrested, given trial, and acquitted, it being clearly a case of self-defense.

With reference to Assistant Special Agent Lewis. Lewis was assistant special agent of the former Utah division, Rawlins to Ogden, and had been in that position for some two or three years previous to the strike, and previous to that had been warden of the State penitentiary at Rawlins. Lewis was a thoroughly competent officer, but inclined to be quick-tempered. His trouble with the brakeman at Evanston was of a personal nature, he having struck this brakeman on account of some flippant remark made by the brakeman as to Lewis's position. The matter was investigated by me personally and his resignation accepted. He then entered the service of the Illinois Central, having been offered a position with that company before having the trouble above referred to. There was no complaint made by the trainmen's organization or any other organization relative to this trouble with this brakeman, the matter being handled by me personally.

Your attention is directed to the fact that at Green River, Rawlins, and Laramie the policing of our property was under the supervision of the city authorities and there was absolutely no friction at these three terminals. What friction there was at Evanston and Cheyenne was caused by an organization of shopmen, who left our service, known as the "flying squadron." It was the business of this aggregation to slip into our works and assault workmen. Even under these provocations there was little violence, certainly none from the standpoint of the railroad company.

Yours, truly,

W. M. JEFFERS, Superintendent.

[PERSONAL.]

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD CO.,

Mr. N. H. LOOMIS,
General Solicitor, Omaha.

DEAR SIR: Following excerpt taken from testimony given before Industrial Commission at the recent Chicago hearing:

Another case of blacklisting came from the Harriman lines:

"While standing at the depot one day watching the passengers and trains, Superintendent Jeffers, of the Union Pacific, came up and asked me what I was doing. I said, 'Nothing.' He then said, 'You better take what you can get, for if you go on any other road I will get you,' and then walked off."

I might suggest that the answers disclosed the fact that this particular superintendent, Jeffers, seemed to have taken that position rather continuously, even to the extent of going to business men and suggesting that the men who withdrew their services should not be given credit, and in that way compelled them to leave town.

With reference to first paragraph, this statement is absolutely not a fact. I never at any time made the statement that men would be followed to other lines.

With reference to second paragraph, there was no attention paid to the credit of the men who had left our service, and if their credit was injured by me or subordinate officials on Wyoming division it was only through the statement, repeatedly made, that the shops were being operated successfully and fully manned. There was no friction whatever between myself and employees who left our service at Cheyenne or at any other terminal.

Yours, truly,

W. M. JEFFERS, Superintendent,

DEAR SIR: Following excerpt taken from testimony given before Industrial Commission at the recent Chicago hearing:

proximately correct. These men were in some cases carried on the superintendent's pay roll; in others on the shop pay roll; in others on the station roll—whichever might prove the most convenient way to handle. The original data, from which the rolls were made up, has been misplaced, scattered, and lost, and it would be practically impossible to locate this information. Such pay rolls as might be submitted would not show the number of men working each day. My opinion is that the exhibits which are filed will give the information desired and answer every requirement of the commission.

Sixth. I have already read into the record as a part of my oral testimony the names of all the agencies to which application was made to secure men to take the place of those who left the service of the company on strike. I take it that this information need not be duplicated.

Seventh. I herewith append, as "Exhibit D" to this communication, a statement showing the salaries of various classes of clerks, extending over a period of 20 years, as requested by the commission.

Eighth. Three thousand one hundred and ninety-six dollars and sixty-five cents.

Ninth. I am compelled to delay the furnishing of the information called for this inquiry, since it will require several weeks to compile this statement. I will answer this question as soon as it is possible to get the information.

Very truly, yours,

CHICAGO, August 9, 1911.

Mr. T. J. FOLEY,

Assistant General Manager I. C. R. R., Chicago.

DEAR SIR: The grand lodge officers, representing the machinists, boilermakers and helpers, blacksmiths and helpers, carmen, painters, steamfitters, sheet-metal workers, railway clerks, and federal labor union who are employed on the Illinois Central Railway, which road you are in charge of as assistant general manager, asked you for a conference for the purpose of arranging a date for the men we represent and who are employed on the said Illinois Central Railroad, of which you are legal representative, have refused said grand lodge officers a conference by referring us to circular that you caused to be sent out to all your employees that are a part of the present controversy. The circular attached to your letter of even date in no way answers our letter.

We beg to advise that after giving this matter due consideration we have decided inasmuch as this is a matter in which all are equally interested we must insist that you meet the international officers in a body to discuss the matter of a meeting for the representatives or the federation of the railway employees with proper officials of the Illinois Central Railroad Co.

A refusal on your part to meet this committee as a whole will be considered sufficient cause for the international officers to take such action as we deem advisable.

Any reply you may desire to make to this will reach us at the new Southern Hotel until 2 o'clock p. m. Thursday, August 10.

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF DISBURSEMENTS,
Chicago, April 30, 1915.

MARKHAM EXHIBIT NO. 2.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY,
Law Department, April 13, 1915.

Mr. GEO. P. WEST,
*Assistant to Director of Public Hearings,
United States Commission on Industrial Relations, Sherman House, Chicago.*

DEAR MR. WEST: In accordance with my promise made to you yesterday afternoon, I beg to hand you herewith copy of a statement signed by Mr. T. J. Foley, assistant general manager of this railroad, covering his negotiations with the detective agencies. I also hand you copy of letter addressed to Mr. Foley by the Frank E. Hannan Co., which is typical, and which led to the negotiations described by Mr. Foley in his memorandum.

This is for the information of the commission, and is in substantial compliance with their request.

Yours, very truly,

R. V. FLETCHER, General Attorney.

About September 28 or 29, 1911, I sent for representatives of the Frank E. Hannan Co., employment agents; the Waddell-Mahon Corporation, employment agents; and the Pinkerton National Detective Agency, seeing each of them separately, and stating to them that the employees in the mechanical department were liable to quit work on short notice, and asking each of them if they were in position to open employment offices in the principal cities to secure mechanics, and if so, on what terms.

The Hannan Co. made a written proposal that they would act as our agents to furnish competent mechanics to take the strikers' places on a commission basis of $5 per man and cost of transportation from point where secured to destination, including subsistence. In addition, they were to be paid $5 per day salary for the men employing and escorting such mechanics. We were also to pay the expense of rent, advertising, telephones, etc. They stated they were prepared to begin at once examining and employing such men in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Bethlehem, Buffalo, and Pittsburgh.

Almost similar propositions were submitted by the Waddell-Mahon Corporation and the Pinkerton National Detective Agency.

I asked these representatives to call again on the morning of September 30, which they did, and at that time I accepted their propositions to furnish competent mechanics, and gave directions as to where they were to be sent, with the understanding that these men must undergo an examination, be thoroughly competent, and in event they sent to our property any incompetent men such men would not be accepted and no commission would be paid them.

After each man had been examined, he was to be furnished an identification card bearing his written signature, and the same signature was to appear on an application for employment form. This was done to prevent imposters.

There was a thorough understanding that all men employed at this time were to receive exactly the same rate of pay as the men who had left the service on September 30, 1911.

I also had an understanding with them that this arrangement could be terminated at any time.

In October, 1911, I arranged for our officers in the mechanical department to open employment rooms in various cities, and to send our own foremen and others there to examine them, and at the expiration of about 10 days we canceled the arrangement with Waddell-Mahon and the Hannan Co., but then we entered into an arrangement with the Pinkerton National Detective Agency to open an employment agency in Chicago and in some other cities. They were to place one or two men in each of such offices, as necessity demanded, and these men were to be paid $6 per day, plus room rent, and at these offices our company would furnish an officer or representative to examine all men employed, and those passing the examination would be forwarded to where they were wanted. In this arrangement there was no per capita paid the Pinkerton Agency.

In all cases men employed were interviewed and advised that they were taking the place of strikers. They were required to fill out formal application blanks.

T. J. FOLEY,
General Manager I. C. R. R.

[The Frank E. Hannan Co., special agents, Powell Building, 105-109 Hudson Street.]

CHICAGO, September 28, 1911.

Mr. T. J. FOLEY,

Assistant General Manager, Illinois Central Railroad, Chicago.

DEAR SIR: We propose, as your agents, to furnish competent mechanics to take strikers' places on the open-shop basis in numbers as you desire on a commission basis of $5 per man and the cost of procuring and delivering him, said cost to be made up of transportation from point where we secure men to destination and subsistence. Also salary of men hiring and escorting at $5 per day transportation and subsistence; rent of premises where men apply, advertising, telephone, telegrams, car fare, etc.

We also propose to furnish any number of guards for the protection of men and property at $5 per day and expenses.

Relative conversation of yesterday, will say we have sent two men to each of the following places to list machinists, boiler makers, and blacksmiths: New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Bethlehem, Buffalo, and Pittsburgh.

Their instructions are to be prepared to ship or discontinue hiring on telegraphic instructions. If we do not make shipments, our charge for this service will be $50 per day and expenses of men hiring, examining, etc., stated in the foregoing. If we ship, we eliminate the $50 per day.

Very truly, yours,

FRANK E. HANNAN.

GEO. P. WEST, Esq.,

*U. S. Commission on Industrial Relations,
Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.*

DEAR SIR: I have before me your favor of the 19th instant in regard to the testimony of Mr. Foley. I note that the commission requests that Mr. Foley shall submit all correspondence and contracts or agreements between the company and the employment agencies and detective agencies. I have taken the matter up with Mr. Foley, and he has gone through his files in the hope that something can be found along the line suggested, which will be of interest to the commission. Formerly he submitted copy of a proposition made by one detective agency, together with a memorandum showing how the matter was handled.

Mr. Foley's further search discloses a copy of a letter from the Waddell & Mahon Corporation, copy of which is handed you herewith. I also submit a memorandum made at the time, showing what was said by Mr. Foley to Mr. Hannan, of the detective agency, in regard to the movement of men. I am also handing you a circular letter, issued by Mr. Foley at the time when he was assistant general manager, to all the superintendents, showing how men furnished by these agencies should be disposed of upon their arrival at destination. This last communication is not precisely covered by your request, but we thought it might be of some interest to the commission.

I regret my inability to submit any further documentary evidence bearing on this question. You appreciate, of course, that most of these matters were handled verbally between Mr. Foley and the representatives of the labor agencies. The necessity for supplying men arose unexpectedly, and there was further need for immediate action. The agencies made proposals, two of which have now been submitted to the commission, and thereafter their representatives called on Mr. Foley, and the matter was concluded by conference. The contracts were only such as are evidenced by the proposal of the company and the verbal acquiescence therein on the part of the assistant general manager.

I trust the matter which is herewith submitted will answer all requirements.

Very truly, yours,

R. V. FLETCHER, Attorney General.

9964 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

[Waddell & Mahon Corporation, 218 La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill.]

CHICAGO, ILL., September 29, 1911.

Mr. T. J. FOLEY,
Vice Pres. & Gen. Mgr. Illinois Central Railroad, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, Waddell & Mahon Corporation, of New York City, N. Y., beg to submit the following proposition relative to furnishing the Illinois Central Railroad with mechanics to take the "strikers" places, in the event of a strike of shopmen on the above-mentioned railroad system.

EMPLOYEES.

We propose to furnish competent machinists and helpers, handy men, boiler makers and helpers, blacksmiths and helpers, coppersmiths, tinsmiths, car repair men, car inspectors, locomotive air-brake repair men delivered on the territory to take the "strikers'" places on the open-shop basis, they to receive the same rate of wages as paid and in force at the time the strike was inaugurated. All mechanics to pass examination given them by your superintendent of motive power or whoever you elect, in numbers as you desire, for the sum of $5 per man and the cost of procuring and delivering him, as hereafter specified; no commission to be charged for men failing to pass examination at shops at destination, each man to be furnished with duplicate numbered identification card bearing his written signature (the same appearing on form of "Application for employment"), such precautions we deem necessary to prevent emissaries securing employment cards by proxy.

FIELD MEN SECURING MECHANICS.

We propose to furnish competent mechanics of the various classes needed, as field men, the number not to exceed ———, whom we will send to cities and localities where the mechanics desired are available and where the scale of wages offered will be an inducement; field men to establish headquarters in hotels or such quarters as are obtainable, and there receive and examine as to qualifications all applicants who have been secured either by advertising or personal interview at resorts, boarding houses, or places of employment; for services of field men a charge of $5 per man per diem and transportation, hotel expense, subsistence, advertising, and incidentals, not to exceed $3 per diem.

GUARDS AT SHOPS AND ESCORTS.

We further propose to furnish men for guard duty who have nerve and who have had either military, naval, or police experience, in perfect physical health, who can and will protect the men and property intrusted to their care, thorough military discipline to prevail. On escort duty guards will protect men intrusted to their care, paying special attention to intimidation, interference, or missionary work of emissaries while in transit. On escort duty where journey extends over 24 hours we provide four guards to each coach load of 30 or 40 men, which number allows one man always on duty at each end of the coach and arranges a relief and protects possible loss of men en route. For guard service we charge $5 per man per diem, transportation, and subsistence.

COMMISSARY AND SUBSISTENCE EN ROUTE.

We further propose to equip, as your agents, suitable quarters to be furnished by the Illinois Central Railroad Co. and purchase at lowest market price obtainable, for your account, all supplies for the housing and feeding of the employees at the shops of the company, with such equipment as may be deemed necessary for the proper care of same, and to employ skilled cooks, waiters, and porters for the proper operation and serving of food and keeping such quarters in a sanitary condition. Our remuneration for the management of this department to be at the rate of 10 per centum of all disbursements made in this department, and a chief steward at $10 per diem, transportation, and subsistence. Meals for men en route. We arrange with the dining-car department of the company whose lines we travel over to furnish meals after regular service at the rate of 50 cents per meal, and if party is of sufficient number, we stock a baggage car with sandwiches, fruit, and pie, procuring coffee at meal stations along the route or from dining car, the cost of same being included in bill for transportation and seldom exceeds 25 cents per meal. If number of men is sufficient to warrant it, we furnish one commissary man per car to take charge of and dispense the food and coffee at regular hours. For services of commissary men en route we charge the sum of $5 per man per diem, transportation, and subsistence.

This agreement can be terminated four days after notice has been served upon us by anyone having the authority to act for the Illinois Central Railroad Co.

Yours, very truly,

WADDELL & MAHON CORPORATION.

(Copy.)

SEPTEMBER 30, 1911.

Said to Mr. Hannan at 1.50 p. m., September 30, ship up to 500 men to New Orleans, this to include 50 escorts. His agency to furnish tickets on advice of Illinois Central ticket office of routing. Rigid examination must be made of all men before being shipped, as we will not pay for men rejected at New Orleans, and also in order to avoid paying transportation.

Downs, superintendent; Mr. A. H. Egan, superintendent; Mr. J. J. Gaven, superintendent; Mr. J. M. Egan, superintendent; Mr. T. E. Hill, superintendent; Mr. T. L. Dubbs, superintendent; Mr. J. W. Meelhan, superintendent; Mr. J. W. Dodge, superintendent.

GENTLEMEN: Please refer to my message of the 1st inst., concerning the keeping of complete records of all men received from the several agencies and accepted for service.

We are securing men from three different agencies, viz., Frank E. Hannan & Co., Waddell & Mahon, Pinkerton Detective Agency, and have agreed to pay a certain sum for each man delivered and accepted; therefore it is very important that proper records be kept of all men furnished so as to avoid duplication in payment, and so forth.

Each shipment of men is accompanied by one or more guards sent by the agency. When the men are delivered the superintendent or master mechanic should give the guard a receipt for the men, keeping a copy of same for his record.

Superintendents will please send me a statement each night, made up from their records, showing the number of men received and accepted during past twenty-four hours and from what agency.

Please see that this matter is given very careful attention.

Yours, truly,

Assistant General Manager.

9966 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

I hereby make application for employment as a freight clerk with the Illinois Central Railroad, and agree that if given such employment I will accept the same upon the following terms:

I am to go to any point designated by the company.

I am to take the place of any former employee of the company who is on strike or has ceased to work for any reason.

I am to be governed in all respects by the company's rules.

I am to receive the same rate of pay as now paid for the position to which I may be assigned.

As a condition to receiving any wages I agree to continue at least 30 days in such employment unless sooner discharged by the company, and no wages are to be payable to me if I voluntarily leave my employment within that period. The company shall have the right at any time that it may so desire to end my employment by giving me notice to that effect. So soon as such notice is given, my employment any pay shall immediately cease. If my employment shall be ended by the company for any reason other than my failure to perform my work to its satisfaction, I shall be entitled to receive pay up to the time of my discharge.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES DEPARTMENT,
St. Louis, Mo., April 15, 1915.

Mr. LEWIS K. BROWN,
*Secretary Commission of Industrial Relations,
Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.*

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find statement containing information requested by the commission. When asked, I was of the opinion that a fair estimate of the number of men in each craft on each road could be given, but I find this can not be done with sufficient accuracy to warrant even the term "approximate." The railroads can furnish the correct average number of men employed, under normal conditions, in each craft on their respective roads. This information is a matter of record, by pay-roll periods, and as easily obtainable.

Mileage, density of population, and business handled very greatly determines the number of locomotives and cars required. This, in turn, largely controls the number of men employed, and, without going into the matter very thoroughly, I could not make even a fair estimate of the number of men employed. Information of this character can be obtained from the employer, who has a clerical force in charge of the pay rolls, which, in turn, shows the rates of pay, hourly, monthly, or by the piece or bonus, as well as the occupation of every employee.

Very truly, yours,

A. O. WHARTON,
President Railway Employees Dept., A. F. of L.

Machinists, indicates International Association of Machinists.

Boiler makers, indicates International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, Iron Ship Builders and Helpers of America.

Blacksmiths, indicates International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers.

Carmen, indicates Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, and, unless otherwise specified, includes carpenters, pattern makers, painters, upholsterers, and other car-department employees.

Sheet-metal workers, indicates Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' International Alliance, and, unless otherwise specified, includes tanners, coppersmiths, and steam fitters.

All of these organizations include their respective apprentices and helpers and constitute what is known as the mechanical section of the department.

We have since reorganized this system, and the only members belonging to the six organizations affiliated to the department are recognized by this System Federation.

When new agreements are negotiated, it will be our policy to ask for the recognition of only those organizations affiliated to the department.

We have been directing our efforts toward standardizing the System Federations, as a result of this, we have the six recognized organizations in some of the System Federations that show but four organizations in their present agreements; such as the Wubash and Chicago & Eastern Illinois and others, such as the New Haven and Chicago & Alton, have eliminated organizations not recognized by the department.

When asked I was under the impression that I could furnish the approximate number of men in each craft on each road, but I find that density of population in a very great measure determines the number of engines and cars used by the various roads; some of the roads in the sparsely populated sections of the country average about one locomotive to every 6 miles of line operated, and in the more densely populated sections of the country the number of locomotives in some cases exceed the number of miles of road under operation.

It was my intention to approximate the number of men, based on miles, engines, and cars of a standard system, but looking into the matter I find that figures of this kind would not be a fair estimate.

In round figures, I believe, that the roads now working under federated agreements would employ approximately 125,000 men eligible to the organization affiliated to the railway employees department.

Below I am also giving the mileage of the roads which have been organized into System Federations, but have not yet negotiated federated agreements. I should judge that there are approximately 30,000 men employed on these roads eligible to membership in the organizations affiliated to the railway employees department.

In each of these federations, five organizations—Machinists, Boiler Makers, Blacksmiths, Carmen, and Sheet Metal Workers—are affiliated:

	Mileage.
1. Chicago & North Western Railway-----	8,000
2. Chicago, Milwaukee & Puget Sound-----	2,080
3. Central of Georgia Railway-----	1,924
4. Northern Pacific Railway-----	6,313
5. Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton-----	1,015
6. Western Maryland-----	946
7. Chicago, Indianapolis & Louisville-----	578
8. Fort Worth & Denver City-----	454
Total mileage-----	21,400

The usual manner of procedure in changing from the craft agreement to the federated agreement was as follows:

First. By calling a meeting of delegates from each craft representing the entire system of railroad and organize a System Federation; the number of delegates would vary in proportion to the mileage and method of representation. A terminal railroad company, where all shops were within a radius of 50 miles, would have about 5 men for each craft; a system like the Missouri Pacific-St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern, with over 7,000 miles of road would have,

from the Sheet Metal Workers, about 12 delegates; Blacksmiths, 16; Boiler Makers, Carmen, and Machinists, from 25 to 35 each.

Second. Each craft would select not less than three nor more than five delegates to be known as advisory board members. The inclosed by-laws fully explain manner of procedure.¹

Third. A proposed federated agreement will be drafted, and such agreements are always considered as the basis from which negotiations will be conducted, and do not in themselves represent a demand or ultimatum. We know by experience that a failure to embody in the proposed agreement any question relating to hours of services, wages, and conditions of employment precludes such matters from being introduced after the conferences start.

The railroad managers have also taught us the necessity of drafting our proposed agreements so that they would have what is commonly called "trading rules"; this places both sides in a position to justify concessions granted.

Fourth. The proposed agreement is then sent to the officials, together with the usual 30-day advance notice (as provided for in practically all craft and federated agreements entered into during the past six years), requesting a conference on or about the date the notice expires. All crafts or federated agreements last signed up continue in full force and effect until the negotiations for a new agreement have terminated.

There are two or three methods of signing a notice to open an agreement. For a craft agreement, it can be signed by the general chairman, the secretary-treasurer, or both, or by all the delegates, including the two officers mentioned. For a federated agreement, by the president and secretary of the System Federation, or by the general chairman of each craft (sometimes designated as the executive board), or by the entire advisory board, representing from three to five from each craft.

Neither prior to or since the Illinois Central and Harriman lines strike have I any knowledge that objection has been made to the manner in which notice of desire to open agreements had been served on the officials, and there have been several hundred agreements negotiated and renewed during the past few years.

Beginning with the reorganization of the department January 1, 1913, it has been our policy where craft agreements were in effect and the railroad officials objected to making a federated agreement (the Illinois Central and Harriman lines officials being the only ones who declined to meet such a committee) to advise the men to pursue the following course:

Withdraw the federated agreement, if necessary, then submit a separate agreement for each craft containing exactly the same general rules and their respective special rules, as originally presented in the federated agreement; then the federation would select and notify the company, which craft would go into conference, the craft selected would then negotiate an agreement subject to the approval of the federated committee, the company being notified that none of the committees would sign up their agreement until all were agreeable.

This manner of procedure was adopted on the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway, and resulted in the signing up of agreements having identically the same general rules for the four crafts participating, and all were effective the same date. The M., K. & T. may take the position that they have not recognized the federation. However, the desired results were obtained, and we list the M., K. & T. as having recognized the federation.

The railroad officials always know just what action is being contemplated by the employees, first, because the delegates ask for transportation to point where meetings are to be held, and, second, because these matters are of common knowledge in all shops and are freely spoken of. Our meetings are practically open to anyone, excepting known spotters, or men suspected as such. The only time we attempt to keep our business from the company is after the negotiations for conference have ceased, and the conferences are being held, the results of which are withheld from the men on the system, who understand the necessity of this policy. The inside men, or spotters, etc., are thus prevented from causing any serious division of opinion among the men while the committees are negotiating an agreement, the men being generally instructed to inform anyone who seeks information that the matter is in the hands of the committee, who has been given full power to act.

¹ Pamphlet entitled "By-Laws of the Federation of Railroad Employees, Missouri Pacific System. Affiliated with the Railroad Department of the American Federation of Labor," submitted in printed form.

This method of conducting business was born of necessity and to overcome conditions and methods of procedure instituted quite generally by the employers.

A. O. WHARTON,
President Railway Employees Department, A. F. of L.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' DEPARTMENT,
St. Louis, Mo., April 23, 1915.

MR. LEWIS K. BROWN,

Secretary United States Commission on Industrial Relations,
Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: In connection with the testimony given by Mr. Frank Comerford before the United States Commission on Industrial Relations Monday, April 12, a letter bearing my signature was read referring to certain statements made by Mr. C. E. Fuller, superintendent of motive power, Union Pacific Railroad, with respect to railroads not having recognized the System Federation. Mr. Fuller said that the following railroads had, in answer to a telegram, denied having an agreement with the System Federation; Wheeling & Lake Erie; Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic; Wabash Pittsburgh Terminal Railway Co.; Atlantic Coast Line; "Frisco System"; Trinity & Brazos Valley; Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac; Missouri, Kansas & Texas; and the Canadian Northern.

Mr. Comerford, after reading this letter referred to, submitted a copy of the "Frisco" federated agreement, and we now desire to submit a copy of the federated agreements in effect on the Wheeling & Lake Erie;¹ Wabash Pittsburgh Terminal Railway Co.

A letter from R. C. Taylor, secretary-treasurer of the Atlantic Coast Line Federation, states first federated agreement was signed up in March, 1911, and that he would try and send a copy of the last agreement, which he did not at present have in his possession.

The Trinity & Brazos Valley, agreement entered into September 1, 1911,² and renewed with a number of changes in 1913.

The Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac federated shop rules, effective July 1, 1912.

This information is submitted as per our letter of April 12 in refutation of statements made, and we believe is sufficient to establish our claim as to the incorrectness of Mr. Fuller's testimony in this respect.

Yours, very truly,

A. O. WHARTON,
President Railway Employees' Department, A. F. of L.

P. S.—If consistent, we would like to have these agreements returned after they have served your purposes.

A. O. W.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN WABASH PITTSBURGH TERMINAL RAILWAY CO. AND MACHINISTS, BOILER MAKERS, BLACKSMITHS, PIPEMEN, AND HELPERS, TO TAKE EFFECT OCTOBER 1, 1913.

RULE NO. 1.

All the above-mentioned employees, excepting apprentices, shall receive an increase in the rate of pay of one (1) cent per hour.

RULE NO. 2.

One apprentice shall be allowed to each shop and engine house, regardless of number of journeymen employed, and one additional apprentice for each ¹ Pamphlet entitled "Agreement and General Shop Rules of the W. & L. E. System, Federation No. 22, of the Machinists, Boiler Makers, Blacksmiths, Pipe Fitters, Sheet Metal Workers, and Helpers and Apprentices, and the W. & L. E. R. E. Co. In effect Oct. 1, 1913," submitted in printed form.

² Printed pamphlet submitted. It is entitled "Joint Agreement between the Boiler Makers, Helpers, and Apprentices; Machinists and Apprentices; Coppersmiths and Apprentices; Blacksmiths and Helpers; and Carmen and the Trinity & Brazos Valley Railway Co. Effective Sept. 1, 1911."

five (5) journeymen in any shop of the company. Where the ratio is more than one apprentice to every five journeymen at the time these rules take effect there shall be no dismissal on account of this agreement, but no additions made until those now employed shall have passed out of their apprenticeship.

Four years shall constitute the term of apprenticeship.

Beginning with the first year, the rate of pay will be 10 cents per hour, with an increase of $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per hour for each individual year until the four years of apprenticeship have been served. If retained in the service after the time, he shall receive the standard rate of pay.

RULE NO. 3.

Nine hours shall constitute a day's work for machinists, boiler makers, blacksmiths, pipemen, helpers, and apprentices.

Overtime shall be paid for Sunday work and for all national or legal holidays mentioned below. No blacksmith, machinist, boiler maker, pipeman, helper, or apprentice shall be required to lose any time from his regular working hours to equalize any overtime worked by him. Day men called to work after regular working hours shall receive not less than three hours' pay. This does not apply to men who are notified to work after regular working hours before going home.

Holidays shall be as follows: New Year's Day, Lincoln's Birthday, Washington's Birthday, Decoration Day, Independence Day, Labor Day, Thanksgiving Day, and Christmas Day. If any of the above-mentioned holidays should occur on Sunday, the day observed by the State or Nation shall be considered a holiday, and any time worked on those days shall be paid for in accordance with the above schedule.

RULE NO. 4.

When employees above mentioned are sent from their respective regular place of employment to perform temporary service at some outside shop or roundhouse they will be allowed straight time for traveling to or from home point and will work under regular shop rules when employed at such outside points. Their expenses while away, including meals and lodging only, will be paid, this expense, however, not to exceed $1.25 per day.

RULE NO. 5.

Any machinist, boiler maker, blacksmith, pipeman, helper, or apprentice who is discharged or suspended without just cause shall have the right to make a written appeal within five days to the master mechanic. All appeals must be made in writing and state each item of complaint. At the investigation the employee may be represented by another employee engaged in the same class of service, whom he may select. It is the intention that any employee dismissed or suspended shall have a fair and impartial hearing. The company will in no way discriminate against any member of the committee representing the above-named crafts. It must be understood that energetic, competent, and faithful employees shall be given preference of promotion.

RULE NO. 6.

Helpers and handy men shall not be advanced to the detriment of the machinists, boiler makers, blacksmiths, pipemen, helpers, and apprentices, providing a sufficient number of skilled mechanics can be procured to maintain the necessary repairs of equipment. In case of a shortage the chairman of the shop committee will be requested to furnish the number additional satisfactory skilled men that are required. A reasonable length of time (not to exceed one week) shall be given the committee to furnish the men required.

RULE NO. 7.

Employees who at times, for good and sufficient reasons, are unable to report for work at the specified time, will be allowed to go to work an hour later.

RULE NO. 8.

These rules and regulations shall become effective and be in force from and after October 1, 1913, and remain in force one year and thereafter until such

FEDERATION OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES,
ATLANTIC COAST LINE RAILWAY SYSTEM,
Montgomery, Ala., April 19, 1915.

MR. JOHN SCOTT,
Secretary-Treasurer R. E. Department, St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I am in receipt of your letter forwarded to me by Brother Dowdy of S. E. Federation, in which you are asking for information concerning federation of the A. C. L., and in reply to your letter wish to say that we have had a federation of employees on this road since 1911. It was organized in March, 1911, and we have had an agreement signed up by the company since that time. Now, Brother Scott, I am sorry that I haven't got a copy of our agreement to send you at present, but will try and get you one at an early date. If you will remember last year was a bad year with all roads, and we did not go up before the management to renew our agreement, but there is a clause in our agreement which states that this agreement shall remain in force until superseded by another, and as there hasn't been another, it still holds good.

Hoping this will be satisfactory to you, with best wishes to you and Brother Wharton, I am,

Yours, fraternally,

R. C. TAYLOR,
Sec.-Treas. A. C. L. Federation.

50 MORGAN AVENUE.

RULES GOVERNING THE HOURS AND WORKING CONDITIONS OF ALL SHOP EMPLOYEES OF THE RICHMOND, FREDERICKSBURG & POTOMAC RAILROAD CO. AND WASHINGTON SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO. AT BOULTON, POTOMAC YARD (AND OUTLYING POINTS).

RULE NO. 1.

Regular working hours of shop employees (including inspectors and other men at outlying points) are nine (9) hours per day, except those joint inspectors and shopmen whose regular working hours are twelve (12) hours per day.

RULE NO. 2.

Shop employees and inspectors at outlying points (except those employees mentioned in rule No. 1, whose regular working hours are twelve (12) hours per day and laboring help) will be paid time and one-half time for all overtime, legal holidays (New Year's Day, Decoration Day, Independence Day, Labor Day, Thanksgiving Day, Christmas Day, and Washington's Birthday), and Sunday work.

Where these holidays fall on Sunday, the following day will be observed, unless there is a notice issued by the State or National Government appointing some other day.

RULE NO. 3.

Men working regularly at night, or such men as shall fill their places temporarily, will work under the same rules as those working in daylight.

RULE NO. 4.

Shop employees will be allowed time and one-half time for road work computing from the time of leaving shops until return, and will bear their own expenses.

HARRIMAN RAILROAD SYSTEM STRIKE.

RULE NO. 5.

All employees, except laboring help, called to do work after regular hours, or on holidays and Sundays, will be paid time and one-half time, the same as in rule No. 2, but should in no case be paid less than five (5) hours for such work, or, in other words, the length of time computed at time and one-half time shall equal five (5) hours' straight time.

RULE NO. 6.

At roundhouses, on account of working nine (9) hours, it may be found necessary, on account of emergency work, to overlap the time of one (1) or two (2) men of each class by starting them to work at 8 a. m. and work nine (9) hours from that time.

RULE NO. 7.

Any employee who thinks that he has been unjustly disciplined has the right of appeal through the regular channels, and if it is decided that he has been unjustly disciplined and is put back to work, he shall be paid for time lost.

RULE NO. 8.

If at any time it becomes necessary to reduce shop expenses, the hours will be first reduced to eight (8) hours, and if further reduction is necessary, the force will be reduced; ability, merit, and length of service to govern.

RULE NO. 9.

Apprentices in all departments will be required to serve four (4) years, consisting of 2,700 hours actually worked, and will be paid time and one-half time for all overtime the same as other shop employees, but will only be allowed straight time to count for their apprenticeship. Apprentices will be given every opportunity to learn their respective trades thoroughly.

RULE NO. 10.

The company will not in any way discriminate against any employee who shall serve on committees, or represents his organization in convention, provided he has proper leave.

W. T. KOPP,
Superintendent Motive Power.

Mr. A. O. WHARTON,
*President Railway Employees' Department,
5 and 6 Ohio Building, St. Louis, Mo.*

MY DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 23d instant, with inclosures as stated. I note your request that the agreements be returned to you. Unless there is some compelling reason for their return, I greatly prefer to retain these exhibits in order that the commission shall have a complete file on the matter. Realizing the importance of these exhibits, I trust that you will see fit to advise that we may retain them.

Very truly, yours,

Mr. LEWIS K. BROWN,
*Secretary U. S. Commission on Industrial Relations,
Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.*

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 28th instant, with reference to my request for return of agreements sent you the 23d instant, permit me to say that I want the commission to retain those agreements, my request for return being made with the thought in mind that the commission would have no further use for them after they had been verified.

9976 REPORT OF 'COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

I am herewith inclosing a letter just received from Mr. Frank Munier, chairman board of adjustment, Missouri, Kansas & Texas System Federation. This is another one of the systems Mr. Fuller, superintendent of motive power, Union Pacific Railroad, stated had not recognized the system-federation plan of organization.

Kindly attach the inclosed letter to the agreements sent you under date of April 23.

A. O. WHARTON,
President Ry. E. Department, A. F. of L.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS,
Denison, Tex., April 26, 1915.

Mr. JOHN SCOTT,
Secretary-Treasurer Railway Department.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Answering your letter in which you inquire as to recognition of the system federation by the M. K. & T. Ry., wish to advise that the company agreed to meet the committee of any shop craft we selected and to grant exactly the same agreement to all the shop trades that was given to the craft selected to meet the officials first.

The machinists' committee was selected by the federation to meet the company officials first. The federated committee was in session in Parsons while the conference was being held, and no part of the schedule which all the shop trades are now working under was accepted until ratified by the federated agreement committee.

Thus the difference between our agreement and a federated agreement is in name only. Our schedule provides for an eight-hour day in shops and roundhouses, and this feature has proven beneficial to both the company and the employees.

A federation of the shop crafts on this system has strengthened our position and has been productive of much good in a number of ways.

Trusting this is the information you desire, I remain,

Yours, fraternally,

FRANK MUNIER,
*Chairman Board of Adjustment,
M. K. & T. System Federation.*

KRUTTSCHNITT EXHIBIT.

STATEMENT MADE BY MR. KRUTTSCHNITT IN REGARD TO COMPANY'S ATTITUDE AS TO STRIKE OF FEDERATED SHOPMEN, PUBLISHED IN CALIFORNIA NEWSPAPERS OF AUGUST 29, 1911.

On my trip to San Francisco I read an admirable editorial in one of our San Francisco dailies, in which was said:

"It is not very clear what grievances exist which the shopmen of the Union and Southern Pacific desire to have remedied."

I fully appreciate that the public is entitled to full information on a question which involves the surrender to a committee of employees of the right to say when the corporation shall or shall not perform its services to the public.

The policy of the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific has always been one of justice, liberality, and even generosity toward their employees.

This policy, prescribed by both Mr. Huntington and Mr. Harriman, and thoroughly indorsed by Mr. Lovett, the present executive head of both systems, has never been violated, as far as I know, and has in numberless conferences been gratefully recognized by employees.

PRAISE FROM UNION LEADER.

Indeed, on August 26 there appeared in one of the San Francisco afternoon papers the following statement, credited to the president of the federation, the spokesman for the employees:

"In the past we have had nothing but the most friendly relations with the Southern Pacific, having always been treated with the utmost consideration."

The superintendent of motive power of the Southern Pacific Co., in a circular to employees, issued on August 3, that has been freely quoted in the press, said that, coupled with considerate treatment, he was paying the highest wages of any railroad in the United States, and, in addition, was paying, within equitable limitations, a liberal scale of pensions, from which, through contributing nothing, the employee receives material assistance in his declining years.

Nearly 700 men are now carried on the pension rolls of the Harriman lines.

FREQUENTLY MEET MEN.

For many years our officers have freely met organized and unorganized employees in conferences. Conceding considerate treatment and a willingness on the part of the officers to discuss conditions at all times, the public is naturally mystified as to the issue, which, briefly, may be outlined as follows:

At a meeting in Salt Lake held last summer employees from all crafts on the Harriman lines determined to present to each line demands identical with those sent the Southern Pacific, which are substantially as follows:

First. Recognition of the shop employees' federation, representing all five crafts, viz, machinists, boiler makers, carmen, blacksmiths, and sheet metal workers.

Second. All present or future employees not members shall join the federated association within 30 days, which means, of course, the discharge of all employees who will not or can not join; that is, an absolutely closed shop.

FEARS UNREASONABLE DEMANDS.

Third. The company to agree that the control and final settlement of differences with their employees shall rest with a federated committee made up of representatives of all five crafts, instead of committees of the individual crafts, as heretofore. The effect of these demands, if conceded, would be to place the whole body of workers in all these crafts behind a demand made by any one of them, no matter how unreasonable, an arrangement which would certainly encourage the making of unreasonable demands, which are not likely to be made by individual crafts operating alone.

Fourth. To restrict the number of apprentices, denying to American boys the opportunity to fit themselves for the duties of life by learning trades.

Fifth. A flat increase of 7 cents an hour for all mechanics, apprentices, and helpers, which would mean increases of from 15 to 28 per cent, averaging for the entire shop forces 23 per cent; a reduction of hours without decrease of pay, and other demands, averaging 13 per cent additional, or an average total increase from both sources of 36 per cent. This in addition to an average increase of pay granted to all shop crafts of 12½ per cent in the last five years, and in the face of the fact that the Southern Pacific is now paying higher wages than any other railroad in the United States.

$7,000,000 INCREASE YEARLY.

The effect of all these demands would increase the shop pay rolls of the Harriman lines about $7,000,000 annually.

Sixth. No employee shall work by piece, premium, or bonus system. Where anything of this sort is in existence, it shall be discontinued. Shop foremanships shall be filled by promotion from the ranks of federation employees. All this is in direct conflict with the public will, recently emphatically expressed, that increased expenses of the carriers were to be met by increasing the efficiency of their operations and not by increasing freight rates.

Seventh. No form of physical examination or personal record shall be required; that is, the company is denied the right exercised by every citizen to require of persons entering his service evidences of competency, good character, and health. Under this rule diseased, incompetent, inefficient, and immoral persons might be employed, and if they succeeded in escaping detection for 30 days they could not be discharged without danger of a strike.

SAYS STATUTE PROHIBITS.

The fellow-servant laws of California and of many other States make the corporation responsible for damages to its employees through negligence of a coemployee. The proposed clause would deprive the corporation of all means of protection and would promote inefficient and unsafe public service.

SAN LUIS OBISPO, CAL., June 27, 1911.

Mr. J. F. GRAHAM,
Asst. General Manager, O.-W. R. R. & N.,
Wells, Fargo Bldg., Portland, Oreg.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with present shop rules and regulations I desire to give you the required 30 days' notice that a change in the same is desired.

Upon receipt of your reply we will arrange to send you a copy of the proposed new agreement at least 10 days before date of conference.

Present shop rules of the different crafts are practically the same, and we therefore request that in order to save time that you meet our committees jointly.

Waiting an early reply, I am,

Very respectfully,

JOHN SCOTT,
Secy. Shop Federation, Harriman Lines.

Address, 977 BUCHON STREET, SAN LUIS OBISPO, CAL.

JUNE 30, 1911.

Mr. JOHN SCOTT,
977 Buchon Street, San Luis Obispo, Cal.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of a letter from you dated June 27 calling attention to a change in present shop rules and regulations.

Please be advised that you are unknown to us, and inasmuch as we have not received a request from our employees on the O.-W. R. R. & N. and Southern Pacific lines in Oregon for a change in our existing agreement we will defer any action on this matter except on request of our own employees.

Yours, truly,

J. F. GRAHAM.

PORTLAND, OREG., June 28, 1911.

Mr. J. F. GRAHAM,
Genl. Supt. M. P. & M.,
Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation System.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with the present shop rules governing blacksmiths, apprentices, and helpers, 30 days' written notice is required to be given the other party when a change is desired.

I have been instructed by the members of our organization employed under your jurisdiction to notify you that a change is desired, and that later a new schedule will be submitted to you in our behalf.

As the present shop rules of all shop crafts are now practically identical we believe that a conference between yourself and representatives of the different crafts on the Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation system should be held jointly on August 1, 1911.

I am therefore requested to ask for a joint conference of all crafts, upon behalf of the blacksmiths, apprentices, and helpers.

Awaiting an early reply, I am,

Yours, respectfully,

GEORGE L. BAKER,
Secy. District Council No. 12,
International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers.

3727 WEST GRIFFIN AVENUE, LOS ANGELES, CAL.

JUNE 29, 1911.

Mr. GEORGE L. BAKER,
3727 West Griffin Avenue, Los Angeles, Cal.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter, under date of June 28, in which you advise that in accordance with the present shop rules governing blacksmiths, apprentices, and helpers a 30-day notice is required to be given the other party when a change is desired, that you have been instructed by the members of your organization to notify us that a change is desired, and that later on a new schedule will be submitted to us on your behalf.

Please be advised that we have not had any complaint or intimation from our employees on the Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation nor on Southern Pacific lines in Oregon that a change is desired, and until such time as we are notified direct by employees of either of the lines mentioned under our jurisdiction no action will be taken.

Yours, truly,

J. F. GRAHAM.

OMAHA, NEBR., June 28, 1911.

Mr. J. F. GRAHAM,
Assistant General Manager O.-W. R. R. & N. Co., Portland, Oreg.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with present shop rules and regulations governing machinists and apprentices, 30 days' written notice are required to be given the other party when a change is desired.

I have been instructed by the members of our organization, working under your jurisdiction, to notify you that a change is desired and that later a new schedule will be submitted to you in our behalf.

As the present shop rules of all crafts are now nearly identical we believe that a conference between yourself and representatives of the different crafts should be held jointly.

I am therefore requested to ask for a joint conference of all crafts on behalf of the machinists, and believe that by such a conference time will be saved you as an official of the company.

Awaiting your reply, I am,

Yours, respectfully,

SAMUEL H. GRACE,
Machinists' Representative, District No. 11,
Room 403 Bee Building, Omaha, Nebr.

JULY 3, 1911.

Mr. SAMUEL H. GRACE,
403 Bee Building, Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: This to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 28th ultimo, and wish to advise you that until such time as we are presented with a copy of demands it will not be possible for us to arrange a meeting. This, inasmuch as we have had no complaint nor request from our own employees that would indicate that they are dissatisfied with the present agreement.

Yours, truly,

J. F. GRAHAM.

JULY 29, 1911.

Mr. C. R. MERRILL,
Representing O.-W. R. R. & N. Co. Machinists, Albina, Oreg.

DEAR SIR: I will be very glad to confer with you or a committee of O.-W. R. R. & N. machinists on Tuesday, August 1, at 10 o'clock a. m., if they desire a conference, relative to any matters which they may desire to take up with me. Please advise me promptly if you desire such a conference.

Yours, truly,

J. F. GRAHAM,
Assistant General Manager.

Mr. CARL F. WOHLFARTH,
Representing S. P. L. in Oregon, Boiler Makers,
East Portland, Oreg.

DEAR SIR: I will be very glad to confer with you, or a committee of Southern Pacific Co. boiler makers on Thursday, August 3, at 10 o'clock a. m., if they desire a conference, relative to any matters which they may desire to take up with me.

Please advise me promptly if you desire such a conference.

Yours, truly,

PORTLAND, OREG., August 3, 1911.

Mr. J. F. GRAHAM,

Assistant General Manager. O.-W. R. R. & N. Co.

DEAR SIR: As your final decision refusing to meet a joint committee has been given, it will be impossible for a committee of boiler makers to confer with you August 3 at 10 o'clock.

Yours, truly,

CARL T. WOHLFARTH,
Representing Boiler Makers.

FULLER EXHIBIT.

DISTRICT LODGE No. 11, I. A. of M.,
Omaha, June 30, 1911.

Mr. C. E. FULLER,
Asst. Gen. Mgr. U. P. R. R., Omaha.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with present shop rules and regulations, governing machinists and apprentices, 30 days' written notice are required to be given the other party when a change is desired.

I have been instructed by the members of our organization working under your jurisdiction, to notify you that a change is desired, and that later a new schedule will be submitted to you in our behalf.

As the present shop rules of all crafts are now nearly identical, we believe that a conference between yourself and representatives of the different crafts should be held jointly.

I am therefore requested to ask for a joint conference of all crafts, on behalf of the machinists, and believe that by such a conference, time will be saved you as an official of the company.

Awaiting your reply, I am,

Yours, respectfully,

SAMUEL H. GRACE,
Machinists' Representative, District No. 11,
Room 403 Bee Building, Omaha, Nebr.

OMAHA, July 29, 1911.

Mr. SAMUEL H. GRACE,
403 Bee Building, Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of June 30 received, and in reply would advise that if a committee of machinists desire to meet me to discuss the machinists' working rules I will be very glad to arrange for a meeting with such committee as in the past, but can not accede to the request to meet with other crafts at the same time.

Yours, truly,

C. E. FULLER,
Assistant General Manager.

Copy to Mr. Mohler.

JOINT PROTECTIVE BOARD,
Omaha, July 13, 1911.

Mr. C. E. FULLER,
Asst. Gen. Mgr. U. P. R. R., Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with present shop rules and regulations, governing the Brotherhood Railway Carmen 30 days' written notice is required to be given the other party when a change is desired.

I have been instructed by the members of our organization working under your jurisdiction, to notify you that a change is desired, and that later a new schedule will be submitted in our behalf.

As the present shop rules of all crafts are now nearly identical, we believe that a conference between yourself and representatives of the different crafts should be held jointly.

I am therefore requested to ask for a joint conference of all crafts, on behalf of the Brotherhood Railway Carmen, and believe that by such a conference time will be saved you as an official of the company.

Awaiting your reply, I remain,

Yours, respectfully,

L. I. TUCKER,
Secretary-Treasurer.

221 CHESTNUT STREET, NORTH PLATTE.

OMAHA, July 29, 1911.

Mr. L. I. TUCKER,
221 Chestnut Street, North Platte, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of July 13 received, and in reply would advise that if a committee of carmen desire to meet me to discuss the carmen's working rules, I will be very glad to arrange for a meeting with such committee as in the past, but can not accede to the request to meet with other crafts at the same time.

Yours, truly,

C. E. FULLER,
Assistant General Manager.

Copy to Mr. Mohler.

CHEYENNE, WYO., June 26, 1911.

Mr. FULLER,
General Superintendent M. P. & M., Union Pacific System.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with the present shop rules governing blacksmiths, apprentices, and helpers 30 days' written notice is required to be given the other party when a change is desired.

I have been instructed by the members of our organization employed under your jurisdiction to notify you that a change is desired, and that later a new schedule will be submitted to you in our behalf.

As the present shop rules of all shop crafts are now practically identical, we believe that a conference between yourself and representatives of the different crafts on the Union Pacific system should be held jointly.

I am therefore requested to ask for a joint conference of all crafts upon behalf of the blacksmiths, apprentices, and helpers.

Awaiting an early reply, I am,

Yours, respectfully,

GEO. L. BAKER,
Secretary District Council No. 12,
International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers.

3727 NORTH GRIFFIN AVENUE, LOS ANGELES, CAL.

9988 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

OMAHA, July 22, 1911.

MR. GEORGE L. BAKER,
3737 North Griffin Avenue, Los Angeles, Cal.

DEAR SIR: Your letter under date of the 26th received, and in reply beg to advise that it has always been the policy of this company to deal directly with its own employees, and we can not see our way clear to deviate from this practice. If any classes of our employees desire a change in their present working rules and schedules, they fully understand that upon their direct request they will be given a hearing and full consideration.

Yours, truly,

C. E. FULLER,
Assistant General Manager.

Copy to Mr. Mohler.

MR. C. E. FULLER,
Assistant General Manager,
Union Pacific Railroad, Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with present shop rules and regulations, I desire to give you the required 30 days' notice that a change in the same is desired.

Upon receipt of your reply we will arrange to send you a copy of the proposed new agreement at least 10 days before the date of conference.

Present shop rules of the different crafts are practically the same, and we therefore request that in order to save time, that you meet our committee jointly.

Awaiting an early reply, I am,

Very respectfully,

[SEAL.]

DISTRICT LODGE, No. 11, I. A. OF M.,
Omaha, July 19, 1911.

MR. C. E. FULLER,
Assistant General Manager, U. P. R. R., Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find copy of the new schedule submitted for consideration in behalf of the machinists of the Union Pacific Co.

This same schedule will be submitted to all of the allied lines of the so-called Harriman system in behalf of the machinists employed by them, and practically the same schedule outside of rule 4 (Definition of work) by all other shop crafts.

In view of the above, we therefore trust that you can see your way clear to grant us all at this time a joint conference, and that by so doing it will give better satisfaction to all concerned and also be a saving of time and expense to all parties.

Awaiting your reply, I remain,

Yours, respectfully,

SAMUEL H. GRACE,
Machinist Representative, District 11.

(Schedule requested by federation machinists.)

RULES AND REGULATIONS GOVERNING SHOP EMPLOYEES OF THE HARRIMAN LINES.

WORKDAY.

Rule 1. The standard working time shall be 8 hours per day and 6 days per week. The working hours shall be from 8 a. m. to 12 noon; from 1 p. m. to 5 p. m. Night forces on a corresponding basis. Night men shall be allowed 9 hours' pay for 8 hours' work. There shall be no lap shift worked. Working hours shall be bulletined. Where continuous service is necessary three shifts may be worked as follows: 8 a. m. to 4 p. m.; 4 p. m. to 12 midnight; 12 midnight to 8 a. m.; 20 minutes to be allowed each shift for lunch, with pay. All employees will be allowed one hour, with pay, at the close of the week irrespective of the number of hours worked.

REDUCTION OF EXPENSES.

Rule 2. When any reduction of expenses is to be made, employees shall first have the privilege of a 90-day leave of absence. If any further reduction is necessary, the last man hired within the jurisdiction where the reduction is to be made, shall be given a 90-day leave of absence, or until such time as forces are to be increased, when the last man given leave of absence shall be the first man put back to work. Men granted leave of absence shall be furnished with transportation over the Harriman lines. Committee shall be notified by foreman that the services of employees are again required and employees on leave of absence shall be given 10 days to return to work.

OVERTIME.

Rule 3. All time worked other than bulletined hours shall be considered overtime. Overtime shall be paid for at the rate of time and one-half up to midnight. After midnight double time shall be paid until relieved. No employee shall work longer than 1 hour without being allowed time for meals. Employees required to work after bulletined hours shall be paid 4 hours for 2 hours and 40 minutes' service or fraction thereof, if worked before midnight. If after midnight, they shall be paid 4 hours for 2 hours or fraction thereof. Sundays and all holidays designated by the State or Nation shall be paid for at the rate of time and one-half. Holidays falling on Sundays and another day observed by the State or Nation, this day shall be considered a holiday and paid for as such. No employees shall be required to work overtime more than two nights per week, or two consecutive Sundays. When overtime is required, it shall be distributed. Employees shall not be laid off from regular working hours to equalize overtime worked. Overtime shall be confined to emergency cases. Men transferred from one shift to another shall be paid overtime for the first night or day, as the case may be. Employees when sent out on the road from their home station shall receive continuous time from the time called until the time they return, as follows: Overtime rates for all overtime hours, whether waiting, traveling, or working, and straight time for what are straight-time hours at the home station, whether waiting, traveling, or working, with an allowance of $1.50 per day for expenses, provided that when away for a period of 36 hours, and have been given time for sleep and rest, that the regular rule for time and overtime shall apply thereafter. Expense money to be paid on the following pay day, except in the case of employee leaving the service of the company, he shall be paid at the time of leaving service.

DEFINITION OF WORK.

Rule 4. None but machinists and machinists' apprentices shall be allowed to do machinists' work. Machinists' work shall consist of erecting and dismantling locomotives (engines—steam, gasoline, electrical, and turbine), building and repairing of all machinery and finished tools, and the operation of all machines used in such work, except nut tappers, bolt cutters, and drill presses (except where drill presses are equipped with a facing head and turning head or boring bar).

Men in direct charge of machinists' work shall themselves be machinists. Men not having the title of foremen, with pay accordingly, shall not direct machinists nor assume the responsibility of machinists' work.

9990 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

COMPETENCY.

Rule 5. Competency of the employees entering the service shall be determined within 30 days.

EMPLOYMENT.

Rule 6. Employees shall not be requested to undergo any form of physical examination or make out any form of personal record.

SAFEGUARDING EMPLOYEES.

Rule 7. Men shall not be required to work on engines outside of shop in bad weather. This not to apply to work in engine cabs. Before work on engines undergoing repairs in shops and roundhouses is distributed, it shall be cleaned. Roundhouses shall be piped or otherwise arranged so that when the engines are being blown down the steam will be carried from the roundhouse and the danger eliminated. This work to be completed within 90 days after the signing of this agreement.

APPRENTICES.

Rule 8. There may be 1 apprentice to every 5 mechanics in the shop. No apprentice shall be allowed to serve his apprenticeship where there are not proper facilities for learning the trade. Apprentices must know the first four rules of arithmetic, and be able to read and write the English language. If within 6 months an apprentice shows no aptitude to learn the trade, he shall be transferred or released from the service. Shop foreman and shop committee shall be the judges in the case. Apprentices shall be subject to same regulations as mechanics unless otherwise stated in this agreement. Apprentices shall not be permitted to work nights and overtime; neither shall they be sent out on the road. When force of mechanics are reduced the number of apprentices shall be reduced to maintain ratio (except apprentices employed previous to this agreement), seniority to govern in their reduction and reemployment. At the expiration of their apprenticeship, if retained in the service of the company, they shall receive the rate of pay paid mechanics at that point. Apprentices when indentured must be between 16 and 21 years of age, and must serve 4 years, consisting of 280 days per year. Apprentices shall serve 3 years on machines and special work and not more than 4 months on any one machine or special work and 1 year on general work. The financial secretary or shop committee shall be furnished with a list containing the dates of employment of all machinists and apprentices every 3 months.

DISCHARGE AND SUSPENSION.

Rule 9. No employee shall be discharged or suspended without a just and sufficient cause. If after due investigation, it is found that an employee has been unjustly discharged or suspended, he shall be reinstated with full pay for all time lost, investigation to take place within five days after date of his suspension or dismissal. Before discharge or suspension takes place foreman shall notify employee and committee. In case of any doubt, employee shall be left at work pending investigation.

ADJUSTMENT OF GRIEVANCES.

Rule 10. It is understood in the adjustment of grievances the officials of the company will receive a duly authorized committee to act in the premises at any time. Grievances shall be first submitted to shop foreman, and in the event of his decision being unsatisfactory an appeal may be taken by the committee and their duly authorized representatives to the higher officials. The company will not in any way discriminate against employees who are called upon at any time to serve on any committee or to act in the adjustment of grievances, and shall grant leave of absence and free transportation to those delegated to go before the management in the adjustment of grievances. Transportation shall be granted to employees representing their organization to all conventions or meetings. *

SANITATION.

Rule 11. Special efforts shall be made to furnish good ice water for drinking purposes, and all pits and floors in shops and roundhouses shall be maintained in a dry, clean, sanitary, and safe condition. Proper toilets shall be provided at all points, inclosed from public view, the doors of which shall be kept closed. Also a suitable place for washing purposes.

TIME CHECKS.

Rule 12. Employees leaving the service of the company shall be furnished with a time check covering all time due within 24 hours at all division points where time checks are issued, and 48 hours at all other points. When employees are being paid it shall be during working hours, night men excepted.

RELIEF SERVICE.

Rule 13. When an employee at any of the outlying points requests leave of absence and transportation, same shall be granted. Employees shall give 10 days' notice to proper officer of the company. Before the expiration of notice another employee shall be sent to relieve applicant.

TRANSPORTATION.

Rule 14. Employees and dependent members of their families and employees' representatives of the mechanical departments shall enjoy the same privileges in regard to free transportation as that now granted employees and their representatives of the operating department.

ASSOCIATES.

Rule 15. Employees now and hereafter employed and not members of the association represented as the second party in this agreement shall have 30 days in which to obtain membership.

PROMOTION.

Rule 16. When vacancies occur in shop foremanships the company shall consider mechanics of the craft in the shop where vacancy occurs for promotion to foremanship, seniority to govern.

SPECIAL CONSIDERATION.

Rule 17. Employees who by long and faithful service for the company have become unable to handle the heavy work to an advantage will be given preference of such light work as they may be able to handle without any reduction in their rate and without any discrimination.

HOSPITAL DEPARTMENT.

Rule 18. Employees injured or becoming sick while in the service shall, if necessary, be sent to hospital for treatment, such treatment to be given free of charge as long as the patient and members of his organization think he requires it. Hospital department shall furnish financial statement of receipts and expenditures to be given employees at least once a year. Employees shall be given equal membership on the board of directors of the hospital department.

WAGES.

Rule 19. All work performed shall be paid for by the hour. All mechanics, apprentices, semiskilled men, and helpers shall be granted a 7-cent flat increase per hour. No employee shall be employed for less than the established minimum rate of pay paid at that point. No employee shall work by piece, premium, or bonus system. Where same is now in existence it shall be discontinued upon the signing of this agreement.

CHANGE OF RULES.

Rule 20. These rules and regulations with rates of pay shall supersede all others, and shall take effect when signed by contracting parties and remain in effect until change by either party giving 30 days' notice in writing to the other party, during which time a conference shall take place. A copy of these rules and regulations shall be posted on bulletin boards in shop and round-houses and shall remain in force until superseded by another agreement.

INTERNATIONAL BOILER MAKERS, IRON-SHIP BUILDERS, AND HELPERS.

NORTH PLATTE, July 28, 1911.

Mr. C. E. FULLER,
Superintendent Motive Power and Machine of Union Pacific Railway, Omaha, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: Please inclosed find copy of "Definition of Boiler Maker Work" that the boiler makers are asking for on the Union Pacific, which will come up for your approval.

Their agreement is the same as the machinists', which was presented some time ago.

Respectfully, yours,

J. C. CARROLL,
Secretary.
 EDWARD WEEKS,
 JOHN SETH.

(Schedule requested by federation boiler makers.)

DEFINITION OF BOILER MAKERS' WORK.

Rule 4, section 1. All such work as laying out, marking off, shearing, punching and rolling, flanging and cutting apart, fitting up, and riveting of all steel tank frames, angle iron, I beams, and channel iron, and all street car work made from No. 16 gauge iron and steel and up.

Sec. 2. All patching, riveting, shipping and caiking, inspecting and testing of all steam, oil, water, gas, and air-tight work; all forms of stay-bolt work and tube work front and back end.

Sec. 3. All steel cab work, running boards, front end, grates and ash pans.

Sec. 4. Boiler makers will hold all handle tools and bars. Shall handle all new appliances in regard to gas machines and all gas welding machines, electric machines and all electric welding machines; boiler makers shall handle and operate all air hammers and motors, all pneumatic tubes and hydraulic riveting machines, and be furnished sufficient help to do same. When boiler makers are using pneumatic hammers, driving rivets $\frac{3}{4}$ inch or over, or when using any long-stroke pneumatic hammer on any class of work they will be given an advanced apprentice or another boiler maker to assist them.

Sec. 5. Boiler makers shall not be required to enter boilers to perform any work until after steam has been blown off, brick arches removed, and boiler reasonably cool. Water tanks and oil tanks must first be properly cleaned out before boiler makers are requested to work in them.

Sec. 6. When boiler makers are required to fill places of layer-outs, inspectors, flanges, or fitters up, for six days or less, their wages shall not be changed; if required to fill aforesaid vacancies for a term of days exceeding six in number, they shall receive the prevailing rate of pay for such occupation for full time worked.

APPRENTICES.

Rule 8, sec. 2. There will be two classes of apprentices—the regular apprentice and the helper apprentice. Fifty per cent of the apprentices may be selected from the ranks of the helpers. Regular apprentices must be within 16 and 21 years of age and shall serve 4 years of not less than 280 days per year. No apprentice shall be kept on one class of work more than 6 months.

Regular apprentices: Seventeen cents per hour for the first year; 19½ cents per hour for the first half of second year; 22 cents per hour for the second half of second year; 24½ cents per hour for the first half of third year; 27 cents per hour for the second half of third year; 29½ cents per hour for the first half of fourth year; 32 cents per hour for the last half of fourth year.

Rule 8, sec. 3. Helper apprentices shall be selected from the force of helpers who have been in the service two years or more, seniority to prevail; the age to be between 21 and 25 years. Helpers' apprentices must serve 3 years of not less than 280 days per year, their rate to be as follows:¹

Helpers' apprentices: Helpers' apprentices shall not be reduced in wages upon serving time of apprenticeship, and shall receive 2½ cents increase every six months.

Sec. 4. Helpers and laborers shall not be advanced to the detriment of boiler makers or apprentices except as defined in rule 8.

COMERFORD EXHIBIT NO. 1.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
August 28, 1914.

Mr. W. W. GARNER,

President Brotherhood Railroad Clerks, Lodge 141, Lawrence House, Jackson, Miss.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter of August 24, which reads as follows:

"You will recall that during the year 1912 a conference was held in the office of Gov. Noel, looking to a settlement between the strikers and the Illinois Central Railroad Co., at which were present the governor, the mayor of Jackson, yourself, Mr. Markham, and other Illinois Central officials.

"Now, what I want to ask of you is that you give me a letter with reference to this conference, giving an idea of its purpose and what things were brought out there. In order to refresh your memory, you will no doubt recall that Mr. Markham, president of the I. C. system, admitted, in the presence of the members of the conference, that the railroad company would not recognize the 'clerks' as an organization, because they were 'too intelligent' and might sometime cause the company some embarrassment; said he would be willing to recall all of the other organizations in the federation and renew their contracts, but simply would not give recognition to the railroad clerical men. This was a surprise to the distinguished gentlemen present, who could not understand Mr. Markham's position, nor could he satisfactorily explain it.

"I would also appreciate it very much if you would give me your impressions of what effect the strike of the clerks of the I. C. R. has had on the service and operation of their lines.

"I would like to get this letter from you because the Industrial Relations Committee is going to investigate the strike referred to sometime next month and because other parties to this conference have also furnished letters."

I recall the conference to which you refer, though I do not recall the details. It seemed to me that you and the men operating with you at that time were very reasonable, and I did not quite understand why the clerical force should be especially selected as not to be forgiven. I do not quite remember Mr. Markham's remarks as you do; I do not remember that he said that "his objection" to recognizing the clerks was that they were "too intelligent and might some day cause the company embarrassment." He may have said that, but I do not remember. My recollection is somewhat dim about the whole affair at this late date, but as I remember it, he said, substantially, that the clerks were in a position of privileged communication with the company and occupied a confidential relation toward the company, and that for that reason he made somewhat of a distinction between them and other employees in his mind. It struck me that this was all the more reason why they ought to be dealt with in a friendly spirit. I do remember being somewhat astonished at Mr. Markham's position; I thought it at the time arbitrary.

I can not answer your question as to what the effect of the strike of the clerks was on the service in the operation of the lines, because I do not know. I was soon afterwards, you remember, called away from Mississippi by public duties here, and became not only interested but absorbed in the work here. I remember trying my best to bring about good feeling between both sides, and I have a distinct recollection that you seemed to be amenable to reason.

I am sorry that my letter must be so unsatisfactory, but the state of my memory concerning it all is dim. I remember making a suggestion, the details of which I do not now recall, that I thought ought to be accepted by both sides and which seemed to be not favorably received by the railroad. I have tried to recall just what the proposition was, but I am not able to do so.

9994 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

I am, with every expression of regard,

Very truly, yours,

JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS.

COMERFORD EXHIBIT NO. 2.

FRANK COMERFORD,
ATTORNEY AT LAW,
Chicago, October 19, 1911.

President MARKHAM,
Illinois Central Railroad Co., Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Clifford C. Ormes is in Chicago, penniless and without friends. His home is Minneapolis, Minn., where he lives with his wife and family. He is by occupation a wood-machine man.

He read an advertisement in the Minneapolis Tribune on October 15, placed in that paper by the Fay Employment Agency, No. 220 Second Street, Minneapolis. The advertisement told him of steady work in Chicago. It was suggested to him that his employment would be with a new manufacturing concern. He was put on a train for Chicago and given as his destination West Pullman. He was met at West Pullman by a representative of your road and taken to Burnside. At Burnside he found a strike in progress, and being a union man he refused to go to work under the conditions offered.

This man, not only destitute so far as money and friends are concerned, labors under the terrible misfortune of being a deaf-mute. Your company is responsible for its agent, the Fay Employment Agency, that by false and fraudulent representations induced this man to leave his home and journey to Chicago in the belief that work awaited him here in a new manufacturing plant. The least that your company can do to make amends for its wrong to this man is to provide him with transportation back to his wife and family.

The methods employed by your subordinates in resorting to trickery of the kind illustrated by this case and catching in the net unfortunates like Clifford Ormes are indefensible. These facts can be established by investigation. I shall be glad to supply the proof.

The man's present penniless condition in Chicago makes it imperative for me to ask you to make some decision in this matter at once.

Sincerely,

COMERFORD EXHIBIT NO. 3.

[John F. Ramer, secretary of state and labor commissioner ex officio. Axel Swanson, deputy labor commissioner and chief factory inspector.]

STATE OF COLORADO,
OFFICE OF BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS,
Denver, Colo., April 6, 1915.

HON. FRANK COMERFORD,
4714 Clarendon Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of recent date, inquiring the particulars as to the work of this office in enforcing the laws on matters pertaining to the strike on the Harriman lines, I will say that we have a law requiring, in substance, that when a strike is called anywhere then employment offices are required to tell all applicants for positions in places where the said strike is in operation of this fact, and this office has further required that the words "strike job" be written across the slip given the applicant for said job, so that no mistake can be made.

Mr. John Aften, running an employment office, had orders for strikebreakers and was found sending them without said notification of a strike being on the said lines. The strikers complained, and this office immediately took the matter up with Mr. Allan and forced him to comply with the law. This is about all this office had to do with the matter. This occurred before my taking the office and during the term of my predecessor, Mr. Edwin V. Brake. I have, however, investigated the matter and find these to be the facts. I therefore do not think that I can be of assistance to you by accepting a call to Chicago to testify.

Assuring you of my desire to assist you when possible, I am,
Very truly, yours,

AXEL SWANSON,
Deputy State Labor Commissioner.

COMERFORD EXHIBIT NO. 4.

(House resolution No. 60, General Assembly, State of Illinois, offered Apr. 3, 1913, submitted in printed form.)

(A roll call of the judiciary committee of the Illinois Assembly of 1913—yeas, 17; nays, 6—was submitted in printed form.)

PEOPLE V. MIKE CANE } Charged with carrying concealed weapons.
PEOPLE V. HUGH CLARK }

BRIEF AND ARGUMENT ON BEHALF OF DEFENDANTS.

FACTS.

The undisputed evidence in this case is that each of the defendants is employed by the Illinois Central Railroad Co., for the purpose of guarding its property at its Burnside shops in the city of Chicago, and had been so employed for some time prior to their apprehension. On the day of their arrest a policeman in full uniform, wearing his official star, without any warrant whatever, stopped each of these defendants upon the street, without consent on their part, and searched them. In making the search he felt in the pocket of each of these defendants, what, in his judgment, was a revolver. The policeman thereupon arrested each of the defendants, took them to the police station, and upon the defendants being searched it was found that each had a revolver in his pocket.

This information was revealed to the complaining witness, who swore to the complaint upon which the defendants were tried.

There was no evidence offered tending to show that each of the defendants carried a concealed weapon except that of the policeman. When this evidence was offered the attorney for each of the defendants objected on the ground that the search was unlawful and was a violation of the constitutional rights of the defendants, and that evidence so obtained could not be introduced in evidence. The court heard the evidence subject to the objection. If the objection is well grounded, then the defendants must be acquitted.

The fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution of the United States are as follows:

"IV. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

"V. No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land and naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Paragraphs 6 and 10 of Article II of the constitution of the State of Illinois, entitled, "Bill of rights," are as follows:

"6. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue without probable cause, supported by affidavit, particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

"10. No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to give evidence against himself, or be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense."

While we will cite a number of authorities exactly in point, yet we feel that the case that is most conclusive upon principle is that of Boyd v. United States (116 U. S., 616). It will be noted in that case that the Supreme Court of the United States held an act of Congress in relation to revenue laws unconstitutional because it authorized the court to compel a defendant to produce evidence of his guilt, because the court said it was a violation of the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution of the United States. If an act of Congress would be so held as unconstitutional, then surely an ordinance of the city of Chicago would be unconstitutional as violating the same right; and the court, at page 631, in condemning this law said that such compulsory process "is contrary to the principles of a free government. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman; it is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purpose of despotic power; but it can not abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom."

In the case of Hughes v. State (58 S. E., 390) the facts are as follows:

A city policeman saw two men walking down a passageway. The policeman followed them, searched them, and found upon the person of the defendant a revolver. He was taken to the police station and booked on the charge of carrying concealed weapons. He was not drunk, was violating no law, and was walking along leisurely with his companion. The lower court found the defendant guilty of carrying concealed weapons, but case was appealed by the defendant. The supreme court held that where a person not in legal custody is compelled to furnish incriminating evidence against himself the evidence is not admissible.

In the case of Pickett v. State (99 Ga., 15; 25 S. E., 609) the court said:

"While an officer may, without a warrant, make an arrest for an offense committed in his presence, he has no authority upon bare suspicion, or upon mere information derived from others, to arrest a citizen and search his person in order to ascertain whether or not he was carrying a concealed weapon in violation of law. * * * Even if the person arrested did in fact have a concealed weapon, the fact not being discoverable without a search, the offense of thus carrying it was not, in legal contemplation, committed in the presence of the officer, and the latter violated a sacred constitutional right of the citizen in assuming to exercise a pretended authority to search his person in order to expose his suspected criminality."

In the case of Davis v. State (61 S. E., 404), Georgia, the defendant, Davis, was suspected of having stolen some money. He permitted himself to be searched to see if he had the money, but between his overalls and his pants he had a concealed weapon, but he did not consent to that search, and held his hands between his legs. However, he was compelled to take his hands away and the weapon was found. The court held in substance that evidence of guilt, which a defendant is either directly or indirectly compelled to disclose is not admissible in a criminal prosecution against him. This case was affirmed, however, for the reason that in the court below the defendant did not object to this evidence.

In the case of Gray v. State (61 S. E., 848), Georgia, the court held that while evidence which a defendant has been compelled to disclose through the coercion of a search of his person by an officer pending an illegal arrest is not admissible against him, it is no violation of this principle to receive testimony of witnesses that the defendant intentionally or through accident or inadvertence exposed to view a pistol previously concealed while resisting an arrest, legal or illegal, or while such arrest and consequent detention were pending.

In the case of Jackson v. State (66 S. E., 982), Georgia, the chief of police without a warrant arrested the defendant on suspicion that he had committed a burglary, and while searching him found a concealed weapon. He was then booked on the charge of carrying concealed weapons. There is no question but that the arrest was illegal. It was not the defendant but the arresting officer who produced the evidence. The disclosure was not voluntary. The case was reversed.

In the case of Evans v. State (32 S. E., 658) a policeman arrested the defendant for carrying concealed weapons. The policeman testified, in substance: "I told him to give up that pistol." The defendant said: "What pistol." He was then forced to give it up. The court held this evidence to be inadmissible.

In the case of Day v. State (63 Ga., 667) it was held that evidence that a witness forcibly placed defendant's foot in certain tracks near the scene of the burglary, and that they were of the same size, is not admissible. The court held that a defendant can not be compelled to incriminate himself by acts or words. In this case the defendant was taken hold of and carried along and compelled to put his foot in the track. The first time he was told to put his foot in the track he refused; his foot was then taken hold of and put in the track. He did not consent to it. The shoe fitted the track. The evidence was admitted over the objection of the accused on the ground that it was compelling him to furnish evidence against himself, contrary to the constitution of the State. Chief Justice Warner said, in substance: "Nor can one by force compel another, against his consent, to put his foot in a shoe track for the purpose of using it against him on the criminal side of the court, the more especially when the person using such force has no lawful warrant or authority for so doing."

In the case of Stewart v. State (58 S. E., 395) it was held that an arrest without a warrant and search of the person of the accused for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not he is violating the law prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons is unreasonable.

In the case of Boyd v. United States (116 U. S., 616) the court said, on page 629, in part, as follows:

"Lastly, it is urged as an argument of utility that such a search is a means of detecting offenders by discovering evidence. I wish some cases had been shown where the law forceth evidence out of the owner's custody by process. There is no process against papers in civil cases. It has been often tried and never prevailed. Nay, where the adversary has by force or fraud got possession of your own proper evidence there is no way to get it back but by action. In the criminal law such a proceeding was never heard of; and yet there are some crimes, such, for instance, as murder, rape, robbery, and housebreaking, to say nothing of forgery and perjury, that are more atrocious than libeling. But our law has provided no paper search in these cases to help forward the conviction. Whether this proceedeth from the gentleness of the law toward criminals, or from a consideration that such a power would be more pernicious to the innocent than useful to the public, I will not say. It is very certain that the law obligeth no man to accuse himself, because the necessary means of compelling self-accusation, falling upon the innocent as well as the guilty, would be both cruel and unjust, and it would seem that search for evidence is disallowed upon the same principle. Then, too, the innocent would be confounded with the guilty."

Again, on page 631, it is said:

"And any compulsory discovery by extorting the party's oath, or compelling the production of his private books and papers, to convict him of crime or to forfeit his property is contrary to the principles of a free Government. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman; it is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purposes of despotic power, but it can not abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom."

Again on pages 633, 634, and 635 it is said:

"We have already noticed the intimate relation between the two amendments. They throw great light on each other. For the 'unreasonable searches and seizures' condemned in the fourth amendment are almost always made for the purpose of compelling a man to give evidence against himself, which in criminal cases is condemned in the fifth amendment; and compelling a man 'in a criminal case to be a witness against himself,' which is condemned in the fifth amendment, throws light on the question as to what is an unreasonable search and seizure within the meaning of the fourth amendment. And we have been unable to perceive that the seizure of a man's private books and papers to be used in evidence against him is substantially different from compelling him to be a witness against himself. We think it is within the clear intent and meaning of these terms. We are also clearly of the opinion that proceedings instituted for the purpose of declaring the forfeitures of a man's property by reason of offenses committed by him, though they may be civil in form, are in their nature criminal. In this very case, the ground of forfeiture as declared in the twelfth section of the act of 1874, on which the information is based, consists of certain acts of fraud committed against the public revenue

Paragraphs 6 and 10 of Article II of the constitution of the State of Illinois, entitled, "Bill of rights," are as follows:

"6. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue without probable cause, supported by affidavit, particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

"10. No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to give evidence against himself, or be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense."

While we will cite a number of authorities exactly in point, yet we feel that the case that is most conclusive upon principle is that of Boyd v. United States (116 U. S., 616). It will be noted in that case that the Supreme Court of the United States held an act of Congress in relation to revenue laws unconstitutional because it authorized the court to compel a defendant to produce evidence of his guilt, because the court said it was a violation of the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution of the United States. If an act of Congress would be so held as unconstitutional, then surely an ordinance of the city of Chicago would be unconstitutional as violating the same right; and the court, at page 631, in condemning this law said that such compulsory process "is contrary to the principles of a free government. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman; it is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purpose of despotic power; but it can not abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom."

In the case of Hughes v. State (58 S. E., 390) the facts are as follows:

A city policeman saw two men walking down a passageway. The policeman followed them, searched them, and found upon the person of the defendant a revolver. He was taken to the police station and booked on the charge of carrying concealed weapons. He was not drunk, was violating no law, and was walking along leisurely with his companion. The lower court found the defendant guilty of carrying concealed weapons, but case was appealed by the defendant. The supreme court held that where a person not in legal custody is compelled to furnish incriminating evidence against himself the evidence is not admissible.

In the case of Pickett v. State (99 Ga., 15; 25 S. E., 609) the court said:

"While an officer may, without a warrant, make an arrest for an offense committed in his presence, he has no authority upon bare suspicion, or upon mere information derived from others, to arrest a citizen and search his person in order to ascertain whether or not he was carrying a concealed weapon in violation of law. * * * Even if the person arrested did in fact have a concealed weapon, the fact not being discoverable without a search, the offense of thus carrying it was not, in legal contemplation, committed in the presence of the officer, and the latter violated a sacred constitutional right of the citizen in assuming to exercise a pretended authority to search his person in order to expose his suspected criminality."

In the case of Davis v. State (61 S. E., 404), Georgia, the defendant, Davis, was suspected of having stolen some money. He permitted himself to be searched to see if he had the money, but between his overalls and his pants he had a concealed weapon, but he did not consent to that search, and held his hands between his legs. However, he was compelled to take his hands away and the weapon was found. The court held in substance that evidence of guilt, which a defendant is either directly or indirectly compelled to disclose is not admissible in a criminal prosecution against him. This case was affirmed, however, for the reason that in the court below the defendant did not object to this evidence.

In the case of Gray v. State (61 S. E., 848), Georgia, the court held that while evidence which a defendant has been compelled to disclose through the coercion of a search of his person by an officer pending an illegal arrest is not admissible against him, it is no violation of this principle to receive testimony of witnesses that the defendant intentionally or through accident or inadvertence exposed to view a pistol previously concealed while resisting an arrest, legal or illegal, or while such arrest and consequent detention were pending.

In the case of Jackson v. State (66 S. E., 982), Georgia, the chief of police without a warrant arrested the defendant on suspicion that he had committed a burglary, and while searching him found a concealed weapon. He was then booked on the charge of carrying concealed weapons. There is no question but that the arrest was illegal. It was not the defendant but the arresting officer who produced the evidence. The disclosure was not voluntary. The case was reversed.

the distinction between this case and the one this Court now has under consideration. In the Chastang case the officer had a warrant for the defendant.

While I have not been able to give this case as much attention as I would like to, I respectfully submit that the weight of authority, backed by these opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, reported in the One hundred and sixteenth United States, sustains the contention of these defendants.

Respectfully submitted,

J. E. DENNAN,
Attorney for Defendants.

FARMERS' NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA,
Chicago, May 8, 1913.

HON. FRANK COMERFORD,
Press Club, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. COMERFORD: If you will write to Mr. A. N. Steinhart, secretary Farmer's Grain Dealers' Association of Illinois, Bloomington, Ill., he will tell you of the trouble that farmers have had to get cars over the Illinois Central Railroad. I am certain that he can give you more of the information that you want than anyone else in Illinois.

There is also an association of farmers that ship live stock to Chicago, but their territory is in the west central part of the State, and I doubt if any of them wishes to use the Illinois Central. Further, I do not know the name of the association or the names of its officers. Possibly Mr. Steinhart can give you this information also.

With hearty good wishes,

Respectfully yours,

JOHN M. STAHL

MAY 8, 1913.

MR. A. N. STEINHART,
Secretary Farmers' Grain Dealers' Association of Illinois, Bloomington, Ill.

MY DEAR SIR: I am taking the liberty to write to you with the consent of our mutual friend, Mr. John M. Stahl. I am seeking information concerning the trouble and expense the farmers of Illinois have been put to during the past year because of the Illinois Central Railroad Co.'s lack of cars, etc. I want general and specific information to present to the Legislature of the State of Illinois.

I am anxious to get this information by Tuesday of next week, which is May 13. Am advised that there is an association for farmers that ship live stock to Chicago who live in the west central part of the State, and that these men have had great trouble with the Illinois Central. I have in hand information from the coal interests of the State and am sending for information from the manufacturing interests of the State. I want to supplement this with information showing that the farmers and handlers of live stock have been handicapped—put to expense and trouble by the Illinois Central Railroad Co.

If you wish, I shall keep the source of my information confidential.

Thanking you in advance for the courtesy of an early reply, I am, sir,

Yours, very truly,

P. S.—If you know the name and address of the executive officers of the farmers' association referred to above, I shall appreciate receiving it.

10000 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

THE FARMERS' GRAIN DEALERS' ASSOCIATION,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Bloomington, Ill., May 12, 1913.

COMERFORD & COHEN, Chicago, Ill.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to your favor of the 8th instant relative to losses to shippers on account of delay in the furnishing of equipment on the Illinois Central Railroad.

We have more elevators located on the lines of the Illinois Central Railroad than on any other railway in the State, and I do not know of a single station that did not lose money account of inability of that line to furnish cars when needed, and especially heavy loss occurred at most points in handling the last end of the old corn crop when we had a declining market, and sales had to be canceled and put out each time at a much lower figure. Many stations at this time lost up in the thousand figures, and I think practically all of them came through the year with a good deficit instead of a profit.

We had serious complaint of car shortage on that line only last week.

Yours, very truly,

A. N. STEINHART, Secretary.

MAY 10, 1913.

HONORABLE SIR: The following resolution was unanimously passed at a meeting on May 10, 1913, and ordered mailed to each one of our representatives in the Chicago district:

Whereas the Illinois Central Railway operates under a special charter from the State of Illinois, the said State sharing in the gross receipts of the Illinois Central Railway, the governor being a director therein, and is therefore a partner of this corporation; and

Whereas the Illinois Central Railway refused to treat with us as a system federation of union labor and have let this road equipment deteriorate to the danger of human life, thus placing this State of Illinois in opposition to organized labor and the safety of its citizens: It is therefore

Resolved, That our 257 members demand the passage of house bill No. 60 as presented by Representative Stedman and by our representative before your honorable committee.

Yours, truly,

[SEAL] INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BLACKSMITHS AND HELPERS,
J. E. LARSON, President,

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of Garden City Branch, No. 11, National Association of Letter Carriers, held on the above date, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That Garden City Branch, No. 11, National Association of Letter Carriers, consisting of 2500 members, hereby indorses the joint resolution pending in the Illinois Legislature to investigate the Illinois Central Railroad Co."

[Local Union No. 321, United Mine Workers of America.]

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., May 8, 1913.

I. J. CUNDIFF, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Yours to hand, concerning joint resolution pending in the legislature regarding investigation of Illinois Central Railroad.

You ask that I send a letter to the "undersigned" to have this resolution passed. Whom do you mean by the undersigned? Is it the governor or yourself and president? I think it means the latter. Am I right? If so, I will do as you ask. Let me know at once.

I received some petition blanks asking for the support of the legislators to the resolution for investigation of I. C. R. R.

I got them filled and sent them on to the representative from this district and inclosed letter will show you the result.

I will do all in my power to assist you in your troubles, as I am very interested in your strike. You say that they refuse to treat with you as a federation. Stick to your "federation strike" until you win, but I hope the next time you may have occasion to strike it will be as "one big union." That is the only hope for workers to win their strikes. I do not believe in one craft going in and scabbing on the other, and (so-called) union engine drivers pulling trainloads of scabs into shops where there is a strike. In these cases unionism becomes a farce. Let us try and get them all into one union, and then we will not scab on each other, but will pull together and strike together and win.

With best wishes for success in your investigation and strike, I am,

Yours, for the one big union,

JOE MULHOLLAND,

1112 North Thirteenth Street, Springfield, Ill.

CHICAGO, ILL., May 5, 1913.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: A joint resolution is pending before the Illinois Legislature calling for an investigation of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. A hearing is to be had on this resolution on or about May 14. Organized labor all over Illinois is asked to help in the passage of this resolution. The Chicago Federation of Labor unanimously indorse this resolution.

Will you send the undersigned a letter with the seal of your local, stating in substance that your local, composed of 2,500 members, unanimously asks the passage of this resolution. Please do this at once, as we desire to present these letters as a petition on or before the 12th day of May, 1913.

As you know the following organizations have been on a strike since September 30, 1911: International Association of Machinists, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers, International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Helpers, Railway Carmen of America, Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers, International Brotherhood of Painters, Order of Railway Clerks, and Federal Labor Union.

The Illinois Central refuses to treat with us as a system federation. The Illinois Central operates under a special charter from the State of Illinois. Under the terms of this charter the governor of Illinois is a director of the Illinois Central, and the State shares in the earnings of the company. The importance of this is that the State of Illinois, a partner with the Illinois Central, is put in a position of being opposed to the right of labor to organize, and this is vital to every member of organized labor.

Make your letter strong in its indorsement, and send it at once under the seal of your organization, and in this way contribute your share toward this fight, which, although it involves directly the men at present on strike, at the same time is of vital importance to the very existence of organized labor.

Fraternally, yours,

[SEAL.]

President.

I. J. CUNDIFF.

6029 Madison Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: We beg to call your attention to the resolution or bill to be presented at this term of the State legislature, asking for an investigation of the Illinois Central Railroad Co.'s motive power and car equipment. The said railroad company is chartered under the laws of the State of Illinois as a common carrier, with provisions covering the welfare and safety of the traveling public and the commercial interests of the State. To prove to you that the said company is not complying with its charter rights we refer you to the numerous wrecks on their lines, extending from Omaha, Nebr., to New Orleans, La., but especially do we call your attention to the wrecks in our own State, namely, Kimundy, Farmer City, Van Buren Street (Chicago), and the Daylight Special at Melvin, and others.

Investigation proved that all these wrecks were caused by defective equipment. Continuous complaint of the mine operators of car shortage, as well as the complaint of shippers along the line, also proves conclusively that the Illinois Central management is giving but little concern to the welfare of those whom it is their duty to serve.

Therefore, we, the organized Cigar Makers' Local No. 14, of Chicago, numbering 1,600 members, earnestly request that you, as our representative, do what you can to have this measure passed.

Yours, sincerely,

There is an end to all things, and we believe and know that there should be an investigation made of this company's business and the facts made known to

[Grand Crossing Lodge No. 265, International Association of Machinists, Odd Fellows' Hall, northeast corner Seventy-fifth Street and Ellis Avenue.]

CHICAGO, May 7, 1913.

At the regular meeting of Grand Crossing Lodge, No. 265, held May 7, 1913, the following resolutions were presented and unanimously adopted:

"Whereas there is pending before the House of Representatives of the State of Illinois house resolution No. 60, asking for an investigation of the Illinois Central Railroad Co., its assets, liabilities, and the numerous wrecks that have occurred since the strike of the shopmen September 30, 1911; and

"Whereas the State of Illinois (by virtue of the special charter granted the Illinois Central Railroad Co.) is a partner in this railroad and vitally interested in the financial transactions, and should be as equally interested in the shopmen, who are citizens and property owners of the State of Illinois; and

"Whereas this strike was caused and has been prolonged by the arbitrary stand of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. denying their employees the right to federate and assert themselves as free, liberty-loving people, according to their constitutional rights granted to them by the State of Illinois and the United States of America: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, as citizens of the State of Illinois, demand of the representatives of the State of Illinois favorable consideration of house resolution No. 60; that we request those that have promised to support said resolution No. 60 to demand on the floor of the House a roll-call vote for the information of the voters who sent them there: And be it further

"Resolved, That these resolutions be signed by the president and secretary of this local, representing 400 members, with the official seal of this organization attached, and a copy sent to each and every representative."

10008 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

[Local Union No. 453, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.]

CENTRALIA, ILL., May 10, 1913.

Mr. I. J. CUNDIFF, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: We understand that a joint resolution is pending before the Illinois Legislature calling for an investigation of the Illinois Central Railroad Co., on which a hearing is to be had about May 14. The Centralia Local, No. 453, of the International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers, composed of 26 members, is strongly in favor of this resolution and the members are unanimously asking the passage of the same. We feel that such an investigation will be of interest and advantage not only to organized labor, but to all the people of the State in general. Each member of the legislature by his position in regard to this resolution will have an opportunity of showing what his stand is toward labor organizations, as also his general interest in the welfare of the State.

We trust that all possible will be done toward urging the passage of the resolution.

Fraternally, yours,

[SEAL.]

CHICAGO, May 10, 1913.

Mr. I. J. CUNDIFF.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: At our meeting May 10 your letter regarding a resolution to investigate the Illinois Central Railroad Co. and its operating methods was read and discussed at length.

This local union has 96 members in good standing—95 per cent of whom were present, and by a unanimous vote of this local union we expressed our desire that the Illinois Central Railroad should be investigated by our State legislature in the interest not only of union labor, but especially of the traveling public, and also of those engaged in industries which require the transportation of their wares or commerce.

MARISSA, ILL., May 10, 1913.

Mr. I. J. CUNDIFF, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: This local union, with a membership of 400, has unanimously indorsed the proposition as presented in a joint resolution which is pending before the Illinois Legislature, asking for an investigation of the equipment and condition of the Illinois Central Railroad.

We believe that in the interest of public safety, and the inability of said road to properly serve the business and commercial interest of its patrons, should be evidence enough to warrant the legislature in making this investigation. No other class of business, I believe, has felt that something should be done in this matter more keenly than those interested in coal mining, especially when having to depend entirely on this road.

With best wishes for the success of this just and reasonable demand, I am,
Yours, very truly,

tion. The Illinois Central refuses to treat with us as a system federation. The Illinois Central operates under a special charter from the State of Illinois. Under the terms of this charter the governor of Illinois is a director of the Illinois Central, and the State shares in the earnings of the company. The importance of this is that the State of Illinois, a partner with the Illinois Central, is put in a position of being opposed to the right of labor to organize, and this is vital to every member of organized labor.

Mr. I. J. CUNDIFF,

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Your letter received May 8, and I am answering in behalf of your request. Local Union No. 1237, U. M. W. of A., Sesser, Ill., as a body of 456 United Mine Workers of district 12, do hereby earnestly pledge the governor of our State to give the joint resolution that is pending before the Illinois Legislature calling for an investigation of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. for refusing to treat with organized labor of all various labor unions, some of which are still on strike since September 30, 1911. We, as a body of U. M. W. of A., personally know that the Illinois Central Railroad Co. has shown partiality against organized labor by employing scabs to run its trains when the union firemen lay down and came out on strike, causing hundreds of miners to move in the dead of winter from the mining camps along the Illinois Central lines in 1911. Furthermore, it discriminated against certain coal operators on the Illinois Central Railroad, and by not distributing its cars on equal basis, therefore causing some of the mines to shut down on that account, some of which had to sue the Illinois Central Railroad Co. in order to get an equal share of cars. We, as a body, in whole unanimously ask for a proper investigation of the joint resolution before the legislature, and we sincerely hope that the governor acts in harmony with organized labor of all crafts and will make the Illinois Central Railroad Co. put out the real stuff and not be lurking in the background of discrimination. United we stand, divided we fall. In union there is strength, but discrimination means hell.

P. S.—Hoping the governor will act and use good common sense, so that the working class, who elected him for that position, can reap the benefits of their voting power,

[Local Union No. 22, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.]

MAY 11, 1913.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned members of Freeport Local No. 22, of I. B. of B. & H., composed of 11 members, unanimously ask the passage of this resolution.

an investigation of the Illinois Central Railroad, was read at last night's meeting of our local union, and the undersigned instructed to inform you that the 110 members of our local, one and all, take a keen delight in being put into a position where they can support a measure calculated to shed some light on the dark and devious ways of predatory wealth. "Big business" must of necessity operate under the cover of darkness. If our class were acquainted with the nature of the ills that human society suffers from and the causes thereof, a cure would readily suggest itself. The true function of the State, the only justification for the existence of government, must be that it promote the "greatest good of the greatest number." Where "the State" deviates from that course, there the protests of "the greatest number" are in order, and where those protests are not heeded by those in power revolution becomes a necessity—a duty.

Therefore, by all means, light! more light! so we may know and understand,
Yours, for the working class,

HON. EDW. F. DUNNE,
Governor State of Illinois, Springfield, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Woodlawn Lodge, No. 492, International Association of Machinists, asks you, as chief executive of the State of Illinois, to use your influence on behalf of house bill No. 60, which, if passed, will bring about an investigation of the Illinois Central Railroad.

We believe, as this railroad holds their charter under the laws of the State of Illinois, it should be compelled to conform with the laws governing their charter and look well to the safety and comfort of the traveling public and the commercial interests of the State.

We have been informed that their power is in bad shape; that there is a continual shortage of cars; that mine operators and other shippers find it a hard matter to carry on their business along the line of this road.

There have been numerous wrecks along the entire system and several within our own State, and the claim has been made that it is due to the poor equipment, which, if true, is a violation of provisions covered by their charter.

We believe that you, as governor of the State of Illinois, wish to give people of the State, and especially those that cast their vote for you, all the rights coming to them under the laws of the State, and we also believe you wish to treat the corporations fairly; therefore we believe that you can safely work to have the investigation carried on, for if the Illinois Central Railroad is carrying on its business strictly within the laws and conforming to their charter rights, the investigation can not hurt them, and if they are not it is the right of your constituents to know it.

This local has a membership of 200, and the membership of our association throughout the State is fully 15,000, and it is safe to say that all are vitally interested in having this bill passed.

Yours, sincerely,

BRICK, TILE, AND TERRA COTTA WORKERS, LOCAL NO. 6.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: A joint resolution is pending before the Illinois legislature calling for an investigation of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. A hearing is to be had on this resolution on or about May 14. Organized labor all over Illinois is asked to help in the passage of this resolution. The Chicago Federation of Labor unanimously indorse this resolution.

Will you send the undersigned a letter with the seal of your local, stating in substance that your local, composed of 200 (number of members), unanimously asks the passage of this resolution? Please do this at once, as we desire to present these letters as a petition on or before the 12th day of May, 1913.

As you know, the following organizations have been on a strike since September 30, 1911: International Association of Machinists, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths & Helpers, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers & Helpers, Railway Carmen of America, Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers, International Brotherhood of Painters, Order of Railway Clerks, Federal Labor Union.

The Illinois Central refuses to treat with us as a system federation. The Illinois Central operates under a special charter from the State of Illinois. Under the terms of this charter the governor of Illinois is a director of the Illinois Central, and the State shares in the earnings of the company. The importance of this is that the State of Illinois, a partner with the Illinois Central, is put in a position of being opposed to the right of labor to organize, and this is vital to every member of organized labor.

10020 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Make your letter strong in its indorsement and send it at once under the seal of your organization; and in this way contribute your share toward this fight, which, although it involves directly the men at present on strike, at the same time is of vital importance to the very existence of organized labor.

Faternally, yours,

TO THE UNITED STATES INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMISSION.

DEAR SIR: This is to certify that the strike of the employees of the mechanical and clerical departments caused me to have to dispose of my grocery business on account of the men being out of employment and the class of people that took their places was of no benefit to my business.

GENTLEMEN: Being actively engaged in the shoe, hosiery, and furnishing business in Algiers, and being thoroughly acquainted with the strike on the Southern Pacific Railroad, I think it has and is still working a great hardship in this territory, and if it could be settled it would be of great benefit all through this locality.

JACKSON, Miss., June 20, 1914.

To the Officers and Members of the United States Industrial Relations Commission:

We have been in the furniture business here for nearly 12 years and have had things well lined up. We had the patronage of a large per cent of the employees of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. at this place, which is quite an item to us every pay day. But since the strike the greater per cent of the boys have gone, out of employment, and we have had to repossess the furniture. The accounts and the business that we get from this source now is not satisfactory.

We would that your honorable body might bring about some way or means by which an amicable settlement can be made and get everything working in harmony again.

Yours, truly,

THE INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I have been requested to give my opinion as to the class of workmen sent here by the Illinois Central Railroad Co. during the strike of 1911-12.

I was a deputy United States marshal at the time and had the very best opportunity of studying these men, being stationed at a large building in which the men were lodged and fed. I was stationed there for the purpose of protecting the strike breakers from the strikers, but, as it turned out, we had more trouble with the strike breakers than with the strikers. They seemed to think that the railroad company owed them almost everything and wanted to go out into the city and start trouble. They seemed to be the toughs from the larger cities of the North, and out of two or three hundred that were sent here to fill the vacant positions only about a half dozen were qualified to fill any position at all. Most all of the clerical positions were filled by local people.

The whole crowd looked like they were recruited from Coxey's army, and, of course, were looked upon as such by the citizens.

Respectfully,

JAMES McWELLIE,
Ex-Deputy United States Marshal.

WATER VALLEY, MISS., June 11, 1914.

To the Industrial Relation Committee:

GENTLEMEN: As a citizen and business man of Water Valley, Miss., I wish to state to the honorable board what the conditions have been in the city since the lockout or labor war. Owing to the company not being able to deliver freight, has caused heavy loss to the business men. Of the class of men that the company imported into our town there scarcely has been a day that some of them have not been put in jail—some days as high as 15 in a day—keeping our city in a constant turmoil and disturbance. This same class of people has caused our best citizens to leave town, causing a great loss and sacrifice, and has caused a great deal of suffering among the women and children of our very best class, known as our best laboring people.

This foreign element, since their wages have been reduced by the Illinois Central Railroad, are now deserting their families and leaving them on the hands of the town, to be kept up by charity. No one can realize how bad conditions have been here, except he has been here and witnesses the thing as it is.

Trade has fallen off at least 50 per cent since this labor trouble began, growing from bad to worse. We hoped for a long time that it would improve, but it is getting worse all the time, and about all you can hear on the street is, "I wish I could leave this old town," and the good people are leaving as fast as they can.

It would mean a Godsend to this city and country if this strike could be settled and the old and honorable employees could be reinstated, for a nobler class of men never lived. Such a thing as one of them being a beat was never heard of; but now it is different; this class never pays unless made to.

Hoping for the best, I am,

Yours truly,

A. B. PORTER.

DEAR SIR: Since the strike on the I. C. and Y. & M. V. R. R. Vicksburg has lost quite a good many families on account of the men folks being unable to secure work. [The Sauls-King Co., dealers in staple and fancy groceries.]

McCOMB CITY, MISS., July 28, 1914.

Hon. FRANK COMERFORD, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: I have frequently been asked questions regarding the conditions as I have observed them under union labor and nonunion labor.

I would like to make a short statement of the conditions as they have occurred under my observation. I came to McComb about 15 years ago and most of the time since have been engaged in the mercantile business. When I came to McComb very near all the buildings in the business part of the town were wood structures. There was only one schoolhouse and it was an old wood structure. All the churches were of the same class. There was not a paved street in town, except the part of Main Street occupied by stores. It was thought that a mercantile business could not survive in McComb.

At that time the shop was nonunion. Wages were so low the men could barely make a support for their families. Car repairers were getting 16½ cents and machinists 31 cents.

The working conditions were very bad. Very few shelters for the men to work under. A short time after I came to McComb the different crafts organized their unions. Conditions began to improve and the town began to prosper. It is evident the railroad company prospered in the same proportion, for it was during that period the railroad company put in double track through the Mississippi and Louisiana division. They prepared better accommodations for their men. Shelter to work under and many other things that I have not space to mention. Everybody was happy and prosperous. The town grew rapidly. The old wood store buildings were moved away and handsome brick stores were rebuilt in their places. The principal streets were paved. The old wood school building was discarded and two handsome brick buildings were erected. We boast of having the most commodious brick public-school buildings in the State.

The same can be said of the churches. The old wood buildings were moved away and handsome pressed-brick buildings erected in their stead. We boast of having at least two churches that would be a credit to any city.

All this was done during the time of organized union labor in the Illinois Central Railroad shops. I contribute all this to the result of organized union labor.

It has been nearly three years since the strike. Every style of business has suffered greatly. Real estate has gone down. Business is not so satisfactory. A few years ago we boasted of having the best produce market in the country. Now the farmers find great difficulty in selling their produce.

Space will not permit me to say more at this time, but the above are undeniable facts as they have come under my observation.

Respectfully,

B. N. SAULS,

President and Business Manager the Sauls-King Co.

McCOMB WHOLESALE GROCERY CO.,
McComb, Miss., July 7, 1914.

To the Officers and Members of the United States Industrial Commission.

GENTLEMEN: The writer understands that your honorable body is to be asked to investigate the strike of union employees of the Illinois Central system. It is the opinion of the writer that the safety and welfare of the public in general would be better conserved if the employees of public carriers are members of trade unions. The reason for this opinion is that union men are, first, citizens of permanent places of abode; second, that owing to this fact they make more reliable workmen, because of their desire to acquire and maintain a permanent place in the social and religious affairs of the community in which they reside. On the other hand, the nonunion workman is on the job to-day and gone to-morrow, taking little or no interest in his work for that reason. The union workman has ever before him that on the retaining of his job depends the comforts of a home for himself and family and a place in society of which he need not be ashamed. The undersigned most certainly believes that it would be to the advantage of the business world of McComb if the striking employees of the Illinois Central were reinstated in their former positions.

Sincerely, yours,

J. D. WEATHERSBY.

McCOMB, Miss., July 28, 1914.

To the Officers and Members of the United States Industrial Commission.

GENTLEMEN: The writers understand that your honorable body is to be asked to investigate the strike of the Illinois Central system. It is the opinion of the writers in regards to trade conditions since the men went out on a strike nearly three years ago, will say at the time of the men going out this firm was doing a good, healthy charge account business with the employees, and we were getting our money promptly each pay day. For some time after the strike we carried these men, but finally had to stop. About 50 per cent of the old men have moved away and procured work at other places. As to the new men, we do nothing but cash business with them, as we do not know them well enough to extend them credit. We feel that if the strike was settled our city would be doing more business than at present. We feel that real estate has suffered materially during this strike.

We would be very much pleased to see this matter settled in a way that would be beneficial both to the company and the men.

Respectfully,

STOKES & GAFFNEY.

McComb City, Miss., August 3, 1914.

To the Officers and Members of the United States Industrial Commission.

GENTLEMEN: The writer understands that your honorable body is to be asked to investigate the strike of the union employees now in progress on the Illinois Central and Harriman lines.

It is the opinion of the writer, who has been here for the past 20 years, that the matter should be adjusted some way in favor of the men. I have seen the time when there was very poor conditions here for the workmen in the shops before the days of the organization of the men.

After the organization of the different crafts everything began to grow and prosper. The conditions of the men were better, the city began to grow and was more prosperous. Conditions began to be better socially, religiously, and financially. Business was better in every respect.

Since the men were forced out on strike conditions have got to be worse than I have ever seen in my lifetime here of over 20 years. Business has gone to the bad since our citizens have had to move away and our town has been filled with a very undesirable bunch of people.

It is my opinion, after seeing both sides of the question, that the union men should be put back on their former jobs.

I believe that right will prevail, and I trust that your honorable body will see fit to (in the name of right and justice) adjust this matter in favor of the union men. If so, social conditions will be restored, business will be better, and last but not least, the several hundred of the best of our citizenship can return to their homes that they have labored a lifetime to build.

I am, sincerely, yours,

ERNEST T. JACKSON.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMISSION, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I have been requested to give my views of the lockout or strike caused by the Illinois Central Railroad Co. refusing to recognize the System Federation, composed of the shopmen and railroad clerks, which started September 25, 1911, and which is still on.

I have been in business for a number of years, and I am very sure that the lockout or strike on the Illinois Central Railroad has made a hardship on every merchant in our city. By the long delays in receiving our freight from the manufacturer caused by the incompetency of their motive power and other incompetent labor and which the railroad has hired to take the places of the old employees. Therefore, I among many others in this city and along the line of the Illinois Central Railroad are in hopes that your honorable body will soon bring the two factions together, thereby bringing this lockout or strike to a just end; and by so doing you will be conferring an everlasting favor to this city and this section of the country.

I am, yours, very truly,

W. C. WELCH.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMISSION, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: As per request we are furnishing you with the statement as to our opinion of the effects of the Illinois Central lockout or strike, which started on September 25, 1911, and which is still in vogue. The writer's business brings him in personal contact with practically every merchant in Jackson, and naturally I am familiar with their opinion. Almost without exception the lockout or strike has been a detriment to business in Jackson. The men now employed are not as a rule permanent residents, being largely transient, and naturally being to a large extent without families, they spend their money in channels that do not do the merchants much good.

Yours, truly,

M. B. HERNDON, Manager.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMISSION,

GENTLEMEN: I have been asked for my opinion of the railway clerks' strike in this section in the winter of 1911 and 1912. It did not affect my business directly but it did affect it indirectly through other business that was affected directly. Immediately after the strike was called there was a complaint from all quarters of business dropping off; everything was quiet for a long time, in fact I don't think we have recovered from it yet. So far as any personal violence is concerned the striking employees were very quiet here with an occasional fist fight, but in other towns in this State there was some blood shed which could have been avoided if the railroad had not tried to fill the strikers' places with the kind of people they did. I am confident that if the railroad and its employees will agree to settle all their future differences by arbitration, and then stand by the agreement, they will both be better off.

Yours, truly,

P. N. Cox.

JACKSON, MISS., June 19, 1914.

To the Officers and Members of the United States Industrial Relations Commission, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: The writer understands that your honorable body is to be called upon to investigate the strike of the union employees of the Illinois Central Railroad Co.

It is, and has been for several years, the opinion of the writer that the public in general would be materially benefited if the employees of common carriers were members of trade-unions for a number of reasons. First, that union men, as a class, are trained workmen and citizens of permanent places of abode; second, that in view of these facts they make more reliable workmen because of their desire to better their condition, acquire property, and maintain a permanent place in the social and religious affairs of the community in which they reside. Then, too, the nonunion workman as a rule is on the job to-day and gone to-morrow, and for that reason he does not take the interest in his work that the man who is permanently located will.

The writer is of the opinion that it would be to the interest of the business section along their lines if due consideration were given to the striking employees and proper adjustments made.

Yours, sincerely,

W. F. WEST.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMISSION,

GENTLEMEN: It has been a matter of much concern here that there has been a misunderstanding between the Illinois Central Railroad Co. and its employees, which has resulted in a strike.

This condition is more or less demoralizing and depressing to business and the general utility of the railroad itself.

When men who have seen long service in a particular employment are superseded by those who are comparatively inexperienced, the efficiency of service of the employer is bound to be more or less impaired by the change.

This community earnestly hopes that you may be able to arrange an amicable adjustment of the differences between the railroad and its former employees.

Very respectfully,

PERCY L. CLIFTON.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: For two years or more there has existed some degree of demoralization owing to a strike among the employees of the Illinois Central Railroad. For a time the situation was acute, but things have quieted down for the past year. However, where so many men are thrown out of work because of misunderstandings between them and their employers, business depression must result. I think it is the desire of the people of Jackson that with your assistance the differences between the railroad company and their former employees may be amicably adjusted in a manner satisfactory to all parties.

Trusting that your good offices may bring results,

I am, yours, very truly,

JAS. R. McDOWELL.

JACKSON, MISS., June 15, 1914.

To the Industrial Relations Commission, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I have been informed that you will soon take up the investigation of the strike (or lockout) on the Illinois Central Railroad Co., which has been on for nearly three years, which has hurt the strikers and the railroad to a great extent, but by far it has hurt the farmer and the merchant most, and all kinds of business in general throughout this section of the country; and although not familiar with the true facts of this great struggle between capital and labor, I should think that through your thorough investigations of all the facts that you will be able to bring this strike to an honorable end which will be satisfactory to both of the contending parties. The class of labor which the railroad has brought to this section of the country has proven a great loss to the business world in more ways than one; they are coming and going and not paying their debts before leaving. I have been in business here for over 30 years and the service that the Illinois Central Railroad Co. is giving to the public is worse now than what it was before it was known as the Illinois Central. The class of labor employed by the above road is such that it can not nor ever will bring it back to the high standard such as it was before the strike (or lockout), and now it is placed in your honorable power to bring this long-drawn-out controversy to a just settlement to all parties concerned, and which I am sure you will do.

Yours, truly,

GENTLEMEN: We are taking the liberty of writing you in the matter of the strike of the railroad employees of the Illinois Central Railroad Co., which began here about two years ago.

We are informed that the inability of the railroad company and its employees to effect a satisfactory settlement of their differences has resulted in some demoralization of business in this community, and we would be very glad indeed to see some arrangement made by which a satisfactory settlement could be arranged.

Very respectfully,

L. M. GADDIS, Vice President.

JACKSON, MISS., June 17, 1914.

To the Industrial Relation Commission:

GENTLEMEN: I have been connected very closely in my business interests with the handling of freight by the Illinois Central Railroad Co. from points in this State for about six years. Up to the time of the strike trouble in 1911, this road was always very prompt in the handling of freight and reasonably efficient in the matter of the clerical work. Since that time there has been a marked difference. Nothing is certain now, and delays and inefficiency are in evidence everywhere in connection with the handling of the freight and freight bill at central points. I do not undertake to say what is the reason for this. I know that it is not like it used to be for some reason. This condition hurts both the railroad company and the shippers, and should be remedied.

Respectfully,

VIRGIL HOWIE.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMISSION.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to the recent strike of the Illinois Central Railroad employees in this section of Mississippi, we would suggest that you investigate the matter and see if satisfactory relations can not be established among the force.

We believe that union labor would work better in the interest of all parties concerned; that is, the railroad and the public.

A full investigation of the matter will reveal this fact.

We shall hope to learn of an early and satisfactory adjustment of the matters in question.

DEAR SIR: The strike of the employees of the freight department resulted in a great deal of inconvenience to the merchants at that time, and I was very much in hopes that the matter had been settled some time since, and I hope the investigation will result in a settlement of the matter, which will be to the better interests of the employees, the merchants, the railroads, and this section of the country.

Thanking you, I beg to remain,

UNITED STATES INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION:

GENTLEMEN: I have been requested to make a statement in regard to the effect the Illinois Central Railroad strike has had on business in Jackson, Tenn., and will say that it is my opinion that business is not and never will be as good as it was before the strike or not at least until this strike has been satisfactorily settled. We have a number of strike-breaking citizens that we are not at all proud of, and therefore there is not harmony along business lines as there was before the strike. Therefore we hope there could be something done to bring about a settlement between the Illinois Central and the men out on this strike.

Yours, truly,

DEAR SIR: It would severely tax human ingenuity to devise a clumsier and more expensive method than either the strike or the lockout for settling such differences as may arise between employer and employed.

10030 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

We need not refer to any one of a number of simpler and saner ways of composing controversies of this nature; but it may have a salutary effect upon those in authority on either side of such conflicts if the public at large calls attention in emphatic terms to the fact that strikes cause fearful havoc in that particular community and especially so in the case of merchants.

The Illinois Central Railroad strike has done Memphis more harm, perhaps, than any other calamity that has visited our town, and it will take years for many of us to recover lost ground even after the whole matter is adjusted to the satisfaction of both parties to the contest.

Let us hope that there may be no recurrence of such a misfortune in these parts.

Mr. JOHN WRAY,

Secretary Illinois Central Railroad Federation, 1022 Barton Avenue.

SIR: Am occupied in the grocery and dry-goods business on the corner of McLemore Avenue and Illinois Central Railroad crossing, and have been for the past 15 years. Being right in the heart of the railroad yards, it is but natural that the majority of the railroad employees should patronize me. But since November, 1911, my business practically has gone to nothing, I having fully lost 60 per cent of my trade. I also had a piece of property which stood vacant for 13 months, probably because no one wished to take the risk of opening a business near the railroad during such grave conditions.

Respectfully,

J. SHAINBERG,

MEMPHIS, TENN., June 2, 1914.

Mr. JOHN WRAY,

Secretary Illinois Central Railroad Federation, 1022 Barton Avenue.

DEAR SIR: I have been engaged in the barber business at 682 S. Main Street for the past 20 years. Since October, 1911, and including the present time, my business has dropped off fully 50 per cent. I have made careful investigation and can truthfully say that the labor trouble with the Illinois Central Railroad is the direct cause. My business comprises about 75 per cent railroad men, and fully 50 per cent employed by Illinois Central Railroad. These men are out of employment and unable to patronize me. There are also a great many vacant houses in this neighborhood on account of this same trouble.

Respectfully, yours,

W. G. ACKERMANN.

[Criminal Court, Shelby County, Jerome E. Richards, clerk.]

MEMPHIS, TENN., July 29, 1914.

Mr. FRANK COMERFORD,

Attorney, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Having been requested to give a statement as of the effect of the strike of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. shopmen, about September 30, 1911, on the city of Memphis, in a business as well as moral way, beg to state that, knowing a good many of the men involved, can state that a good many of them were forced to break up their homes and leave the city to seek employment elsewhere on other railroads, while others, on failure to find employment, were reduced to poverty; and, as a rule, these men formerly employed by the Illinois Central Railroad Co., who were forced on strike in defense of their organization, were property owners and taxpayers of this community, many of them being forced to take their children out of public schools and put them into the factories and mills in order to help support the family.

In regard to the men imported to fill the places of the strike men, they were a different class of men from the strikers, mostly transient, and could not be depended upon in a business way, and were of no benefit to this community.

The inability of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. to furnish proper service to our shipping and business interests was the cause of many losses, and resulted in a number of suits being filed for damages and loss of freight. I will state that I would desire very much to see an honorable and early adjustment of this strike reached, which would benefit the public at large served by the Illinois Central Railroad Co. in this city.

Very truly,

JEROME E. RICHARDS,
Clerk of the Criminal Court of Shelby County, Tenn.

[New York Life Insurance Co., 346 and 348 Broadway, New York. Darwin P. Kingsley, president.]

MEMPHIS, TENN., June 4, 1914.

Mr. JOHN WRAY,
Secretary Illinois Central Federation.

DEAR SIR: In response to your committee concerning the effect on local business on account of strike, will say that I have been engaged in the life insurance business here for 14 years, and had during the time of the union conditions been able to do quite a satisfactory business amongst the Illinois Central employees, but since the strike the class of people now employed are in the main floaters, people who could not assume an obligation to do anything, also a class who have no desire to do anything looking to a future provision to a dependent family, and I know personally that it has depreciated values in a very large section of the city at least 25 per cent; I mean, of course, real estate, and to change a large area of permanent home owners to a lot of floaters is very detrimental to the general welfare of any community; and I feel safe in saying it is one of the most deplorable happenings that has happened to this city since the yellow-fever epidemic.

Hoping you will finally succeed in your heroic struggle to uplift humanity, I am,

Very truly, yours,

W. A. WEATHERALL,
Special Agent New York Life, Box 1107.

[Tripp & Gardner, Pure Food Grocers, 176 Gilbert Avenue.]

MEMPHIS, TENN., May 25, 1914.

This is to state that my business fell off $700 per month at the Illinois Central strike about three years ago, and has never recuperated from it.

I am in favor of settling this strike at any cost or sacrifice.

Mr. FRANK COMERFORD, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Having been asked as to the effects of the shopmen's strike on the Illinois Central Railroad of September, 1911, in regard to business, we will state that it has affected our business very materially, as we enjoyed a good trade from the men formerly employed by the Illinois Central Railroad before the strike, and who have since been forced to leave the city and seek employment elsewhere. Therefore our business has never fully recovered to what it was previous to the strike.

We would desire very much to see some legislation enacted to prevent such strikes in the future.

Mr. J. F. McCREERY,

DEAR SIR: Relative to our conversation this morning as to the effect of the recent Illinois Central strike.

Will say that in our opinion this strike has had a very depressing effect both upon the business and social life of Jackson. The men formerly employed by the Illinois Central Railroad who are involved in this strike consists very largely of members of our best families. A great many of these men have had to seek employment elsewhere, which is a loss to the business and social life of our city.

In our opinion a large percentage of the men employed to take the places of the strikers are transients and only live here a short length of time, which, of course, makes them of very little value as citizens. If a way can be found to settle this controversy and to avoid future strikes it will be of untold benefit to the business and social life of our city.

We trust that this condition may be brought about at an early date.

President Illinois Central Railroad Co., Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: You will find inclosed herewith a petition addressed to your company and to the System Federation of Illinois Central Railroad shop employees. The subscribers thereon are representative business men of Freeport, and the bulk of them are patrons of the Illinois Central Railroad. We trust it may receive due consideration from you and that it may be instrumental, at least in part, in bringing your road and the federation together to your mutual advantage.

Trusting a settlement may be effected in the immediate future, we are,

Yours, very truly,

CITIZENS COMMERCIAL ASSOCIATION,
_____, Secretary.

To the Illinois Central Railroad Co. and to the federation of shop employees lately employed by said company:

We, the undersigned business men of the city of Freeport, deploring the present strike upon the Illinois Central Railroad, detrimental as it is to our business, do respectfully ask both sides to this unfortunate controversy to make an effort to settle this trouble. We do not desire to take sides in this matter, but we believe that it would be to the best interests of everyone if each side gave in a little so that the employer and the employees might get together on the common ground of mutual concession and end this strike.

CITY CLERK'S OFFICE,
Freeport, Ill., July 21, 1914.

To the Industrial Relations Committee:

GENTLEMEN: As a citizen and city clerk of the city of Freeport, Ill. I wish to bring to the attention of your honorable body for consideration and action the conditions prevailing as a result of the labor war which has been carried on for nearly three years by the Illinois Central Railroad Co. against its former employees.

Not being fully informed, I will not attempt to explain same, but as to conditions resulting therefrom I wish to say that not only the men concerned directly, but the business men and citizens generally, have sustained heavy losses.

Their losses have been caused partly by the fact that honest, hard-working men have been replaced by those who will evade payments of all bills possible, this entailing a double loss and partly by delayed or damaged goods owing to the demoralized conditions of the road.

As a citizen of Freeport and of the United States, and being vitally concerned in the welfare of this community, I can not urge upon you too strongly to give this matter your earliest and most rigid investigation, with a view to an early termination of the trouble.

Very truly, yours,

WM. H. GOFF,
City Clerk, City of Freeport.

BROTHERHOOD RAILWAY CARMEN OF AMERICA,
Paducah, Ky., July 16, 1914.

Mr. FRANK COMERFORD,
Attorney, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find a few question sheets filled out by a few stragglers I ran across.

Congratulations on your success of securing a change of venue for Brother Person's trial.

J. F. McCREERY.

Inclosed statements made by business men and city officials in Centralia, Ill., five in all. I expect to secure more from that city later on. I find that some are willing to make statements, while others acknowledge that the strike has been very disastrous to their business, but when you ask them to make a statement they balk. I think this is on account of their fear that when the I. C. found that they had made a statement that they would be discriminated against.

Following is a statement I secured from Brother Haun, our picket at Centralia: Men working before lockout, 525; came out September 30, 1911, 98 per cent; number in Centraalia now, 90; left Centraalia to secure employment, 435; homes broken up on account of men having to leave, 350. We also find that a good many of the men shipped into Centraalia to take the place of the men locked out did not know that there was any trouble of any kind. They were told that no trouble was on.

I instructed the men in regards to filling out question blanks and sending them to your office. I also met with some of the miners in that city, and they told me that they would get up a statement as to their losses caused by being out of employment on account of not receiving sufficient cars to keep them employed.

For any further information desired from Centraalia, Ill., write William Haun, 502 South Maple Street. He has been on the job there ever since the inception of the strike and an employee of the I. C. for 25 years previous.

Before reaching Centraalia I stopped over at Champlain and secured the following information from George Riley, our picket there: Men working at Champlain before September 30, 1911, 100; men now working, between 100 and 125.

As Brother Haun is to cover Champlain later on I did not stay over to get statements. I next visited Cairo and Mounds, Ill. There were only a few men working at Cairo at time of lockout. Cairo was not very much affected, but business in Mounds, 9 miles from Cairo, is dependent on the employees of the I. C. shops. There was a force of 500 men before September 30, 1911; 96 per cent of these men were white men. At the present time the negroes compose at least 60 per cent of the crew of 500 now employed.

I find that the special agents and gunmen brought in here during the strike were very active in trying to stir up trouble, and on several occasions strikers caught out by themselves were beat up, and on one occasion one of the strikers was forced to kill one of these gunmen in self-defense. He was exonerated. I was told while in Mounds that gunmen had killed men in the yards at night and that no arrests were ever made; also that gunmen were continually having trouble with the city police. On another occasion a striker was shot in the leg by one of the men employed in the shops. I found that there was a great deal of suffering and poverty caused by the strike or lockout, and that one striker and his wife and son committed suicide, supposedly over worry at being out of work and unable to provide for themselves.

As to the lawlessness in Mounds caused by the gunmen, I would refer you to Charles Waldbridge and Harry Cole, police at Mounds all through the strike until lately. I am inclosing a statement from the mayor of Mounds, and will have several more to send in later on. I find that the merchants are not willing to make statements, as they now are having to depend almost entirely on the men now working in the shops, as all of the former employees were forced to leave to secure work elsewhere, with but few exceptions. I think that some very damaging evidence will be given in the question sheets from these men that are now in Mounds and also from those that were forced to leave there.

For further particulars write to John Waldbridge, Mounds, Ill.

I am in Paducah, Ky., now, and expect to get some damaging evidence, as I have a good many statements promised me by men that I have been able to see on my other visits here. From here I will go to Princeton, Ky., and from there to Central City, Ky., where I will be able to get evidence from miners and others who went to court for damages sustained caused by the inability of the I. C. to furnish cars.

Frank, I think that there should be some form for us to fill out, covering our visits at the different points. In that way we would not overlook anything.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I am,

Faternally,

J. F. McCREERY.

MOUNDS, ILL., July 14, 1914.

MR. FRANK COMERFORD,
Attorney at Law, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: The effect of the shopmen's strike or lockout on the moral, social, and business relations of our city and community has been deplorable indeed. It has caused many of our best citizens to be thrown out of employment. It has caused others to leave their happy homes and loved ones and go into strange and far-off fields to seek new employment, or perhaps fall in the effort to begin life anew.

The old line-up of boys in the employ of the I. C. R. R. Co. at the time of the walkout could not have been improved on anywhere in the civilized world. All departments here were filled by good, honest, sober, industrious boys fresh from the rural districts, who were loyal to their convictions and true to their company's interests. Those boys are just as firm and loyal to their convictions of right to-day as they were on September 30, 1912, and if this great struggle could be settled with credit and honor to all parties concerned, I feel confident that the boys would all return to their former positions with new zeal, and the I. C. system would be stimulated into new business life.

On the other hand, the class of men imported into this city by the railroad company were failures from the start and up to the present time. They only stay and barely fill the places for a few days and then they run off, or are garnisheed, or come before some justice of the peace and sign over what little wages are coming to them and are gone to try and insinuate themselves into the job of some honest toiler at some other place.

These two classes of men can never live and work side by side in the same town and build up its interests until there is a settlement, once for all, of these great questions.

Hoping that these great issues may be brought before the board of arbitration and that a speedy and impartial settlement may be had, I am,

Yours, very truly,

E. C. FLETCHER, Mayor.

MOUNDS, ILL., July 14, 1914.

Mr. FRANK COMERFORD,
Attorney at Law, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Having been asked to give a statement as to the effect the shop-men's strike or lockout on the I. C. R. R. has had on the business and morals of Mounds, I will state that I am a barber and that my business has decreased 50 per cent since the strike or lockout; and as to the moral effect on the city I will state that the moral standing of Mounds to-day is nothing compared to what it was before the strike or lockout September 30, 1911. The men involved were all good citizens of Mounds, on whom the entire business interest of the city depended for the support of their business. The majority of these men were forced to break up their homes and go elsewhere to secure employment. The men brought in here by the I. C. to take the places of the men locked out were an entirely different class of men as far as moral character is concerned, which is proven by the reign of lawlessness that took place immediately upon their arrival. Several killings took place here in Mounds. I would very much desire to see a settlement reached whereby the old employees could return and reestablish their homes in Mounds again.

CENTRALIA, ILL., July 11, 1914.

FRANK COMERFORD, Attorney.

DEAR SIR: I am of the opinion that the Illinois Central strike in Centralia, Ill., has not been for the best interests of either the citizens of Centralia, the strikers, or the Illinois Central Railroad Co. As to the effect produced thereby, because the citizens and business men have felt the strike in a commercial and social way, I am of the opinion that some method or remedy ought diligently to be sought by which such strikes could be prevented, and the matters settled amicably and by committees, or in some manner that loss of time, money, property, occupations, profits, dividends, and earning power generally could be averted.

Respectfully submitted.

CENTRALIA, ILL., July 11, 1914.

Mr. FRANK COMERFORD,
Attorney at Law, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Ever since the strike or lockout September 30, 1911, we have noticed a marked decrease of about 40 per cent of our business, and we accredit it to the above cause. Before the lockout the shops were filled with a different class of men from what they have been since, which our police records will prove. They have revolutionized the business standard of our community as to business methods, as no dependence could be placed with the majority of the men who have replaced the men locked out, who were our citizens. From a moral as well as a business standpoint it would be very desirable if an honorable agreement between the company and the men could be reached.

CENTRALIA, ILL., July 10, 1914.

Mr. FRANK COMERFORD,
Attorney at Law, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Having been asked to give from my own observation the effects of the shopmen's strike or lockout has had on business and morals in the city of Centralia, Ill., I will state that the effect has been very disastrous to me and my business, from the loss of trade due to the men being out of employment.

These men before the strike or lockout composed a large part of the citizenship of this community, a good many of them owning their own homes, and were taxpayers having their children in the public and private schools of the city, and on account of being thrown out of work and unable to secure work in the city were forced to break up their homes and move to other cities where they were able to secure employment, and in this way the effect on the business interest of the city was disastrous.

The class of men brought in here by the railroad to fill the places of the men who were out were altogether a different type of men, a good many of them being undesirable from a moral viewpoint, and have been of very little good to us from a business standpoint; as they spend very little of their money in Centralia, but get passes from the company and go to other cities and make their purchases.

I would very much desire to see some kind of a settlement of the differences between the railroad and the men brought about and thereby reestablish the harmonious relation that formerly existed, which would enable these men that were forced to leave Centralia to secure employment, to return to the city and reestablish their homes, which would greatly benefit the city from a business and moral standpoint.

[Wm. Gordon Murphey, lawyer.]

JULY 11, 1914.

To whom it may concern:

I am of the opinion that the Illinois Central strike in Centralia, Ill., has not been for the best interests of either the citizens of Centralia, the strikers, or the Illinois Central Railroad Co., as to the effects produced thereby, because the citizens have felt the strike in a commercial and social way, the strikers have felt it in financial and many other ways, and the railroad company has felt it in money matters and inconvenience.

I am of the further opinion that some method or remedy ought diligently to be sought by which such strikes could be prevented and the matters settled amicably and by committees, or in some manner that loss of time, money, property, occupations, profits, dividends, and earning power generally could be averted.

Respectfully submitted.

CENTRALIA, ILL., July 11, 1914.

Mr. FRANK COMERFORD,
Attorney at Law, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Having been requested to give, from our own observation, the effect the shopmen's strike or lockout has had on business morals in the city of Centralia, Ill., we will state that the effect has been very bad on our business, from the loss of trade due to the men being out of employment.

The men who were formerly employed in the shops here, or a large part of them, were reared here. We knew them from their boyhood, and knew whom we were dealing with; knew they could be trusted. A great number of them owned their homes, hence took a pride in the upbuilding of our community. On account of being thrown out of work, these men were forced to seek work elsewhere, disposing of their homes in many instances at a sacrifice, this having a tendency to hurt real estate values and otherwise injuring business generally. In our own case, being cigar manufacturers, we had spent years building up our business through the friendships we had formed with the shopmen. Since the strike these men have left Centralia, leaving us practically where we were when we began business many years ago. We simply mention this in our case, believing the same condition applies to the other business men of Centralia.

The class of men brought here by the railroad to fill the places of the old employees are a different class of men, most of them being of that floating type who stay at no place for any length of time, some of them being undesirables from a moral viewpoint, and have done us but very little good from a business point of view.

We would very much desire to see some kind of settlement between the railroad and the old employees made whereby they may return to Centralia and take up their old positions with the company and again become citizens of our city. If this could be done, we firmly believe the railroad, the business men, and the old employees would be mutually benefited.

With the wish that this long-drawn-out strike will soon be adjusted, we are,

Very truly,

VASS & BROEKER.

CENTRALIA, ILL. May 14, 1914.

GENTLEMEN: The strike of 1911 has affected our local business very much. We wish that some agreement could be made so the men could go back to work. If we at any time can be any service to you in regards to a settlement we will willingly do our part.

Respectfully, yours,

SCHUCHMANN & SANDERS.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD CO.,
Chicago, April 23, 1915.

Mr. LEWIS K. BROWN,
Secretary United States Commission on Industrial Relations,
Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Complying with your request of the 14th instant for certain information which I undertook to furnish at the time I gave oral testimony in this case, I beg to comply with your request, as follows:

First. I submit herewith a statement showing the ruling rates of pay to all mechanical employees at the time of the strike, this being marked "Exhibit 1" to my testimony. I also append as "Exhibit 2" a statement showing the rates of pay applying to shop clerks at the time of the strike. These rates are now precisely the same as they were at the time of the strike, there having been no increases or decreases since September, 1911. These rates were those which prevailed after the increase put into effect in the early part of the year 1910.

Second. I ask to be excused from furnishing a statement as to acts of violence which interfered with the operation of the railroad, since all these were carefully collected by the different departments and were read into the record by President Markham in his testimony. Any information which I might collect from my files would be a mere duplication of this statement. Mr. Markham's testimony was based upon information furnished by this office as well as other departments of the railroad.

Third. I append to my testimony, as "Exhibit 3" thereto, a statement showing the details of a shop-craft meeting held in the office of the shop superintendent at Burnside on March 31, 1915. This shows the names of the committeemen present and indicates the character of the discussion. These meetings are held pursuant to a circular issued November 20, 1911, by the then general superintendent of motive power, a copy of which is herewith appended, marked "Exhibit 4." I may say that this statement is a sample of the character of meetings which are held from time to time at the various shops located on the Illinois Central system.

I believe this covers all the matters mentioned by you in your letter.

Very truly, yours,

R. W. BELL,
General Superintendent of Motive Power.

RULES AND REGULATIONS GOVERNING SHOP EMPLOYEES OF THE HARRIMAN LINES.

WORK DAY.

Rule 1. The standard working time shall be 8 hours per day and 6 days per week. The working hours shall be from 8 a. m. to 12 noon; from 1 p. m. to 5 p. m. Night forges on a corresponding basis. Night men shall be allowed 9 hours' pay for 8 hours' work. There shall be no lap shift worked. Working hours shall be bulletined. Where continuous service is necessary, three shifts may be worked, as follows: 8 a. m. to 4 p. m.; 4 p. m. to 12 midnight; 12 midnight to 8 a. m. Twenty minutes to be allowed each shift for lunch with pay. All employees will be allowed 1 hour with pay at the close of the week, irrespective of the number of hours worked.

REDUCTION OF EXPENSES.

Rule 2. When any reduction of expenses is to be made, employees shall first have the privilege of a 90-day leave of absence. If any further reduction is necessary, the last man hired within the jurisdiction where the reduction is to be made shall be given a 90-day leave of absence, or until such time as forces are to be increased, when the last man given leave of absence shall be the first man put back to work. Men granted leave of absence shall be furnished with transportation over the Harriman lines. Committee shall be notified by foreman that the services of employees are again required, and employees on leave of absence shall be given 10 days to return to work.

OVERTIME.

Rule 3. All time worked other than bulletined hours shall be considered overtime. Overtime shall be paid for at the rate of time and one-half up to midnight. After midnight double time shall be paid until relieved. No employee shall work longer than 1 hour without being allowed time for meals. Employees required to work after bulletin hours shall be paid 4 hours for 2 hours and 40 minutes' service, or fraction thereof, if worked before midnight. If after midnight, they shall be paid 4 hours for 2 hours or fraction thereof. Sundays and all holidays designated by the State or Nation shall be paid for at the rate of time and one-half. Holidays falling on Sundays and another day observed by the State or Nation shall be considered a holiday and paid for as such. No employees shall be required to work overtime more than two nights per week or two consecutive Sundays. When overtime is required, it shall be distributed. Employees shall not be laid off from regular working hours to equalize overtime worked. Overtime shall be confined to emergency cases. Men transferred from one shift to another shall be paid overtime for the first night or day, as the case may be. Employees when sent out on the road from their home station shall receive continuous time from the time called until the time they return, as follows: Overtime rates for all overtime hours, whether waiting, traveling, or working, and straight time for what are straight-time hours at the home station, whether waiting, traveling, or working, with an allowance of $1.50 per day for expenses, provided that when away for a period of 36 hours and have been given time for sleep and rest, that the regular rule for time and overtime shall apply thereafter. Expense money to be paid on the following pay day, except in the case of employee leaving the service of the company he shall be paid at the time of leaving service.

DEFINITION OF WORK.

Rule 4. None but machinists and machinists' apprentices shall be allowed to do machinists' work. Machinists' work shall consist of erecting and dismantling locomotives (engines, steam, gasoline, electrical, and turbine), building and repairing of all machinery and finished tools, and the operation of all machines used in such work, except nut tappers, bolt cutters, and drill presses (except where drill presses are equipped with a facing head and turning head or boring bar).

Men in direct charge of machinists' work shall themselves be machinists. Men not having the title of foremen, with pay accordingly, shall not direct machinists nor assume the responsibility of machinists' work.

COMPETENCY.

Rule 5. Competency of the employees entering the service shall be determined within 30 days.

EMPLOYMENT.

Rule 6. Employees shall not be requested to undergo any form of physical examination or make out any form of personal record.

SAFEGUARDING EMPLOYEES.

Rule 7. Men shall not be required to work on engines outside of shop in bad weather. This not to apply to work in engine cabs. Before work on engines undergoing repairs in shops and roundhouses is distributed it shall be cleaned. Roundhouses shall be piped or otherwise arranged so that when the engines are being blown down the steam will be carried from the roundhouse and the danger eliminated. This work to be completed within 90 days after the signing of this agreement.

APPRENTICES.

Rule 8. There may be 1 apprentice to every 5 mechanics in the shop. No apprentice shall be allowed to serve his apprenticeship where there are not proper facilities for learning the trade. Apprentices must know the first four rules of arithmetic and be able to read and write the English language. If within six months an apprentice shows no aptitude to learn the trade, he shall be transferred or released from the service. Shop foreman and shop committee shall be the judges in the case. Apprentices shall be subject to same regulations as mechanics, unless otherwise stated in this agreement. Apprentices shall not be permitted to work nights and overtime, neither shall they be sent out on the road. When force of mechanics are reduced, the number of apprentices shall be reduced to maintain ratio (except apprentices employed previous to this agreement), seniority to govern in their reduction and reemployment. At the expiration of their apprenticeship, if retained in the service of the company, they shall receive the rate of pay paid mechanics at that point. Apprentices when indentured must be between 16 and 21 years of age and must serve 4 years, consisting of 280 days per year. Apprentices shall serve 3 years on machines and special work and not more than 4 months on any one machine or special work and 1 year on general work. The financial secretary or shop committee shall be furnished with a list containing the dates of employment of all machinists and apprentices every 3 months.

DISCHARGE AND SUSPENSION.

Rule 9. No employee shall be discharged or suspended without a just and sufficient cause. If after due investigation it is found that an employee has been unjustly discharged or suspended, he shall be reinstated with full pay for all time lost, investigation to take place within five days after date of his suspension or dismissal. Before discharge or suspension takes place, foreman shall notify employee and committee. In case of any doubt, employee shall be left at work pending investigation.

ADJUSTMENT OF GRIEVANCES.

Rule 10. It is understood in the adjustment of grievances the officials of the company will receive a duly authorized committee to act in the premises at any time. Grievances shall be first submitted to shop foreman, and in the event of his decision being unsatisfactory an appeal may be taken by the committee and their duly authorized representatives to the higher officials. The company will not in any way discriminate against employees who are called upon at any time to serve on any committee or to act in the adjustment of grievances, and shall grant leave of absence and free transportation to those delegated to go before the management in the adjustment of grievances. Transportation shall be granted to employees representing their organization to all conventions or meetings.

SANITATION.

Rule 11. Special efforts shall be made to furnish good ice water for drinking purposes, and all pits and floors in shops and roundhouses shall be maintained in a dry, clean, sanitary, and safe condition. Proper toilets shall be provided at all points inclosed from public view, the doors of which shall be kept closed. Also a suitable place for washing purposes.

TIME CHECKS.

Rule 12. Employees leaving the service of the company shall be furnished with a time check covering all time due within 24 hours at all division points where time checks are issued, and 48 hours at all other points. When employees are being paid it shall be during working hours, night men excepted.

RELIEF SERVICE.

Rule 13. When an employee at any of the outlying points requests leave of absence and transportation same shall be granted. Employees shall give 10 days' notice to proper officer of the company. Before the expiration of notice another employee shall be sent to relieve applicant.

TRANSPORTATION.

Rule 14. Employees and dependent members of their families and employees' representatives of the mechanical departments shall enjoy the same privileges in regard to free transportation as that now granted employees and their representatives of the operating department.

ASSOCIATES.

Rule 15. Employees now and hereafter employed and not members of the association represented as the second party in this agreement shall have 30 days in which to obtain membership.

10048 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

PROMOTION.

Rule 16. When vacancies occur in shop foremanships the company shall consider mechanics of the craft in the shop where vacancy occurs for promotion to foremanship, seniority to govern.

SPECIAL CONSIDERATION.

Rule 17. Employees who by long and faithful service for the company have become unable to handle the heavy work to an advantage will be given preference of such light work as they may be able to handle without any reduction in their rate and without any discrimination.

HOSPITAL DEPARTMENT.

Rule 18. Employees injured or becoming sick while in the service, shall, if necessary, be sent to hospital for treatment, such treatment to be given free of charge, as long as the patient and members of his organization think he requires it. Hospital department shall furnish financial statement of receipts and expenditures to be given employees at least once a year. Employees shall be given equal membership on the board of directors of the hospital department.

WAGES.

Rule 19. All work performed shall be paid for by the hour. All mechanics, apprentices, semiskilled men, and helpers shall be granted a 7-cent flat increase per hour. No employee shall be employed for less than the established minimum rate of pay paid at that point. No employee shall work by piece, premium, or bonus system. Where same is now in existence it shall be discontinued upon the signing of this agreement.

CHANGE OF RULES.

Rule 20. These rules and regulations with rates of pay shall supersede all others, and shall take effect when signed by contracting parties, and remain in effect until change by either party giving 30 days' notice in writing to the other party, during which time a conference shall take place. A copy of these rules and regulations shall be posted on bulletin boards in shops and roundhouses and shall remain in force until superseded by another agreement.

TAYLOR EXHIBIT.

The territory assigned to me comprises the S. P. L. A. and S. L. (hereinafter called the Salt Lake), the Southern Pacific (S. P.), and the O. W. R. & N. Ry. Co. The Salt Lake from terminal to terminal, i. e., from Los Angeles, Cal., to Salt Lake City, Utah; the S. P. from Montello, Nev., to San Francisco, Cal., and from Los Angeles, Cal., to Portland, Oreg., inclusive; the O. W. R. & N. Co. from Portland, Oreg. to Huntington, Oreg., and Spokane, Wash., inclusive.

In cases where I have been unable to obtain exact information and which may come to me at a later date, same will be sent as a supplement to this report.

OTIS, CAL.

Twenty-two men of all crafts came out on strike. All of them have left the vicinity. Some were men of families and homes, but they have scattered in every direction. To date I have been unable to locate any of them.

LOS VEGAS, NEV.

Three hundred men were employed just previous to this strike; 120 quit and 180 walked out of the strike call. There have been as high as 1,182 names on the pay roll in the month. This was during July and August, 1913. At the present time 120 are employed. These are mainly Negroes and Japs.

(1) There was and is a general complaint because of car shortage, failure, and delay in delivery. Los Vegas is entirely a railroad desert point. No. 7 mail train has been annulled on many occasions.

(2) A mechanic helper named Long, an escaped convict from Canyon City, and one hold-up man from Los Angeles were captured in the Los Vegas shops. There have been 99 arrests of scabs for various causes and 66 garnishees known.

E. S. Lee, a timekeeper, padded the pay rolls and was assisted by a number of scabs. He was given three years in Carson City, and the company took its money from the pay checks of the scabs who had assisted in the looting. Many of these drew no pay check for June, 1914.

One scab killed another with a buggy bar; the murderer is serving a life sentence in Carson City.

(3) No known cases of children taken from school.

(4) Fifty-seven families were forced to move from Los Vegas.

(5) Twelve of the strikers have been arrested during the strike; all were released without trial.

(6) About 100 gunmen were employed. On one occasion during 1911 the gunmen beat up a striker at the railroad station. The striker had purchased a ticket and was leaving town; there were no arrests. Many fights took place between gunmen and strikers, but none of a serious nature.

(7) A majority of the men who came from the East claim that they were not informed by the employment agencies that there was a strike on. Following are the particular cases:

During 1911 one carload which left Buffalo, N. Y., with 45 men landed in Los Vegas with 34, 6 of these went to work, the rest refused. About January, 1912, a carload from Chicago and Omaha arrived with 32 men, 16 of whom went to work. In the spring of 1912 the carload which left Denver with 60 men arrived at Vegas with 20. These men claim the company had agreed to ship them to Los Angeles; 8 went to work. During 1914 an average of 3 mechanics per day was shipped by the Municipal Employment Bureau of Los Angeles. There was some scandal among the city officials of Los Angeles on account of this case. April, 1914, 10 Negroes were shipped from Memphis, Tenn., but 2 have remained to date.

(8) There are no factories at Los Vegas, therefore no child labor. Twelve wives work to assist husbands (notable case, Mrs. John Fagan, now deceased). No strikers owned homes, there were no deaths or suicides. Arnold Ganders, whose family resides in St. Louis, was and is supported by strikers.

(9) Morris Newkirk, Los Vegas, Nev., available witness.

CALIENTE, NEV.

Fifty men compose the normal force of this shop; 45 men came out on strike; 5 old men were allowed to stay in by strikers. The greatest number ever employed was 150. They have 40 men of all classes there now.

(1) Charles Wing, a business man, claims to have lost several thousand dollars; all other merchants make the same complaint. There has been and is now serious complaint on account of delays in shipment.

(2) A white machinist, who is still working at Caliente, was fined $100 for shooting up the town during February, 1912. During the same year a woman was killed by a scab. There has been no investigation of this case. Robinson, a scab machinist, and two gunmen beat up a striker. The picket killed Robinson and wounded the other two. A coroner's jury exonerated the picket. Ten scabs have been arrested and fined for disorderly conduct.

Tom Pippin, Earnest Kents, Jack Hains, Louis Meyers, and Si Land (the two latter still in Caliente) were the most notorious of the gunmen. Jack Hains was particularly lawless. He shot up the "Old Crow" bar; was accused of shooting switchlights and trying to fasten the blame on strikers. The citizens finally raised a general howl on his account and company agents ran him out of town. No scab took the bankruptcy act; about 50 have been garnisheed and 100 beat board and bar bills and skipped town.

(3) About 25 children have been taken out of school.

(4) Fifteen families, all with children, moved out of town. All the strikers are gone except two of the old men, who were among the number allowed to stay in by the strikers.

(5) None of the strikers were ever arrested.

(6) Gunmen story is told under question 3.

10050 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

(7) Many men were brought in and refused to go to work because they claimed that the matter had been misrepresented to them by the employment agency. I have no authentic cases.

(8) I have no cases except those mentioned in (3).

(9) John Cashin and Isaac Blanchard lost everything they had. Their address is Santa Rita, N. Mex. The majority of the strikers of Callente lost their all.

MILFORD, UTAH.

Normal force prior to the strike was about 90 men; 85 men came out on strike. During September, 1912, 150 men were employed. At the present time there are about 90.

(1) There were serious delays of freight for the first year. Mrs. Beard, a wall-paper merchant, had one car delayed three weeks. During this spring wool was loaded in refrigerator cars. The Moscoe mines have been seriously hampered all of the time and have been forced to shut down repeatedly. (See Luke & Gibson, teaming freighters.)

(2) The first batch of scabs was classed by the citizens as an "outrageous" bunch. Thirty have been arrested since the strike. In many cases where warrants were issued it is claimed that the company gave scabs passes in order to get them out of town. The strikers have no knowledge of any scabs taking the bankruptcy act, and have only one case of garnishee.

(3) Ten children were taken from school.

(4) Thirty families were compelled to break up their homes and move away.

(5) There are 30 cases of arrests of strikers, and in seven instances these men were fined, and in some of these instances the fine was remitted. Allen Hedges, a local gunman, who had been appointed deputy sheriff, arrested three strikers for looking over the company fence, marched them down town at the point of the gun. The men were reprimanded by the judge and turned loose. David Sedgewick and son were arrested for calling "Scab" and fined $50. The railroad attorney is on record as stating that the whole affair was one of outrageous delay and illegal proceedings. The case was finally dismissed.

(6) Harvey Hedges, a gunman, who was paid by the city, county, and railroad company, and another, name unknown, assaulted Pete Peterson. Marshal Hedges brought the other gunman into a saloon where Peterson was playing cards and, pointing out Peterson, told the gunman to kill the S. O. B. During the fight Peterson was badly hurt, and managed to whip the gunman, and while Peterson was being held by other men Marshal Hedges struck him in the mouth. The citizens rose en masse over this offense. The town board finally fined Marshal Hedges $25 for ungentlemanly conduct in an officer. This fine has not been collected to date, and Hedges is still a company gunman and a town marshal. Company gunmen use force in driving pickets from the county road, and at various times shot up the town. During the fall of 1912, 13 gunmen came down town at night with the avowed intention of "cleaning" Deputy Marshal Kirk, claiming that Kirk was unfair to them. By false statements one of them induced Kirk to come outside, and as he came out of the door three of them struck him and all crowded him. Although Kirk appealed to Marshal Hedges for assistance, Hedges only laughed. Finally citizens interfered and ran the gunmen off. During the latter part of May, this year, two gunmen went into the union pool hall and demanded a table. The result was a row, and the proprietor threw them out. They returned in force and rushed the place. Citizens interfered and the entire crowd of gunmen were thrown out.

(7) Fifty men stated to the pickets that they were brought into Milford under misrepresentation. All of these men refused to do the company's service. Walter Ames, vice president of the I. A. of M., has evidence of these cases.

(8) No cases of child labor. Eight cases of wife labor. One home has been mortgaged. Frank Hacker lost his life in the mines and left a destitute family.

(9) David Sedgewick, of Milford, Utah, is an especial case, and would make an excellent witness.

(10) The entire business element of Milford profess friendship for the strikers' side and are desirous of seeing the end of the trouble.

LYNNDYLL, UTAH.

(1) A total of 40 men struck at this place. It was a clean sweep. At times there has been three times that number, and at the present time there are about 40 men. Lynndyl is a desert point, and is entirely a shop town.

(2) Most of the men brought in were of the very lowest type. One scab made lead quarters and played the slot machines with them at Meade's store. Mr. Meade was also postmaster, and he had the counterfeit quarter dollars passed on him. Meade claims to know who made them, but was afraid to squeal because of the attitude of the company. No cases of the bankruptcy act or of garnishee; however, I know of 15 cases of scabs beating their bills.

(3) But one child was taken from school. In the remaining cases the children refused to go to school with the children of the scabs.

(4) Ten families were compelled to break up their homes and move away.

(5) None of the strikers were ever arrested.

(6) A man named Tidwell, a deputy sheriff and also a gunman for the company, was particularly obnoxious. On one occasion he followed Miss Morris and a party of her friends to a dance at Lemington, shot up the dance hall, and then followed the strikers' team on its home trip, shouting insults at the strikers and shooting. Shot up Lynndyl, in the vicinity of the strikers' homes. At various times he, accompanied by gangs of scabs, threatened to burn the homes of strikers, and finally terrorized all of them into leaving the town. He made claim to be a United States deputy marshal. He is now serving a term in the penitentiary for cattle rustling. The strikers claim that scabs conducted three blind pigs.

The railroad company owns the well and pumps and furnishes water to the entire town. Water was given free to everybody prior to the strike. After the strike the company put locks on the hydrants and refused water to strikers. The latter were forced to haul water from the river, practically a mudhole, 2 miles away. Hoffman, the hotel keeper, was threatened with a refusal of water because he gave water to strikers from his hydrant.

(7) There are only two cases known to the strikers of men sent in under false pretenses.

(8) One child of the Morris family was put to work. Five cases of wives who worked to assist husbands on strike. The child of Arthur Meade died and his wife was near death. Messrs. Morris, Meade, Lyle, Jerome, and Ivey lost their homes. While there were no cases of extreme poverty, I would suggest the name of Vaughn Morris, 915 West First Street North, Salt Lake City, Utah, as a witness, especially in the water case.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

This point is the terminal of the Salt Lake and also of the Oregon Short Line. The shops of the two roads are combined. In normal times and before the strike about 190 men were employed. One hundred and seventy men struck. There have been as high as 340 men employed, and at the present time there are about 200.

(1) There has been and now is a serious car and power shortage; an exasperating delay of trains, especially on the Salt Lake. Many of their cars were overhauled by the Pullman Co.

(2) So far as the strikers know, none of the scabs had criminal records. About 15 of them have been arrested for disturbing the peace and carrying concealed weapons. One scab took the bankruptcy act and there is 1 case of beating grocery bill and desertion of family (the address 723 North Second Street West), about 10 cases of garnishees.

(3) No positive cases known of children being taken from school.

(4) Twenty cases of families breaking up and moving away.

(5) Two strikers were arrested, but were released.

(6) J. C. Hayden, a carman, was going home on the street car; this car had several gunmen on board. Hayden left the car and was followed by an Italian gunman, shot, and killed. The railroad company's attorney defended the gunman and the courts turned him free. Strikers are bitter in their denunciation of the courts and the company over this affair, claiming it to be wanton murder and a miscarriage of justice.

Detrick Olson, a crippled carman, was standing on the street. Gunmen made a general and unprovoked attack on pickets. Olson was struck by a bullet. Again the company attorney defended the gunmen, and again the gunmen were turned free. The strikers considered the earlier scabs as a gang of Waddell & Mahon cutthroats who were continuously hunting fights. They consider the city courts as fair and impartial; they do not so consider the higher courts. There were many small riots and fist fights, and many fights occurred among the scabs themselves.

10052 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

(7) The company tried to force four men who were employed by a Kansas City agency for the B. & B. department to go into the shops and scab. These men refused, and all quit. Ten other cases of misrepresentation came to the notice of the strikers. Henry Glaze, of Salt Lake City, is charged with hiring men under false representation. There are affidavits to this effect in Mr. Webber's office. Many men who were hired in Dunkirk and Buffalo, N. Y., claimed misrepresentation. The majority of these men either quit or refused to go to work, and the company refused to ship them back to their starting point.

(8) No known cases of child labor. Five known cases of wife labor. No cases of homes lost by foreclosure. One striker, J. H. Benz, was killed at Garfield, Utah, and left a destitute family. A blacksmith, Bert Lemon, lost a child. His wife was taken to the hospital. There were no suicides among the strikers.

(9) The following are cases of severe effect of strike on families: Deane, William Myrick, a helper (extreme case, address care D. & R. G. shops, Salt Lake City); Bert Lemon (28 Harmony Place, Salt Lake City); and Charles Kluder, with a family of 10 children, is another extreme case.

OGDEN, UTAH.

Report sent in by Mr. S. H. Grace, of the machinists.

MONTELEO, NEV.

Fifteen men struck at this point. There are about 25 employed at the present time. Six of the strikers had families with children. All of the strikers are gone; scattered everywhere. I was unable to trace any of them, except a man named Clark now at Elko, Nev., and I was unable to see him.

CARRIN, NEV.

The normal force was 35 men. Thirty men struck. The greatest number employed since the strike began was 150, and there are now 40 men employed.

1. Stock shippers were and are complaining on account of the shortage of cars and delay of shipments. Mr. Thomas Griffin, although a renter of the company lands, is one of these.

2. During 1911, three scabs were arrested on requisition from eastern States. Their subsequent history is unknown. There have been numerous arrests since then for highway robbery, burglary, and like crimes, and 20 cases for fighting, assault, etc. No cases of the bankruptcy act. About 50 cases of garnishee. There are continuous and innumerable cases of beating bills, petty theft, etc. J. A. Isola, of the Overland Hotel, is bitter in his denunciation of the scabs on account of them beating bills.

3. No children were taken out of school.

4. Four families were broken up and moved out of town.

5. None of the strikers were ever arrested.

6. On or about July 4, 1912, 20 scabs led by John Crouch, a boiler maker, now supposed to be employed by the company at Pajaro, Cal., and a machinist named George Lamb made a general attack on the citizens of Pajaro (no pickets were engaged in this battle). The encounter resulted disastrously for the attacking party, especially Crouch.

7. No cases of men being shipped in under false representations came to the notice of the strikers. Strikers and citizens characterized the scabs as being "an abominable, vicious bunch."

8. No cases of child or wife labor, of homes lost, death, or suicide among the strikers.

9. S. C. Rae's family suffered severely because of the strike. A child was born to them during the early part of the trouble. Care was taken of them by the strikers, men in fair circumstances giving them their share of the benefits.

IMLAY, NEV.

Twelve men came out on strike at this place and are completely scattered. I got word of Joe Daugherty and Stangler. These men were machinists and can be traced through Lodge 78, I. A. M., of Reno, Nev.

MINA, NEV.

Thirty men came out on strike at this place. Some had families, and all are gone. I could trace none of them, even by inquiry of the machinists' local at Reno.

SPARKS, NEV.

Six hundred men came out on strike. The greatest number ever employed was 800, and at the present time there are about 500.

1. There were no cases of business failure. Shortage of cars and general delay were and are the grievances of stockmen. A special case happened in January, 1914, at which time a shipment of hogs was delayed two days.

2. There are no cases known of criminal records. There were 100 cases of arrests of scabs for various offenses ranging from burglary to plain drunk during the first year of the strike. The police-court fines amounted to $300 during the year 1911; in 1912 they amounted to $1,000. There are 50 known cases of burglary committed by the scabs. "The Toggery" is an especial case; this store has been robbed a number of times. No cases known of scabs taking the bankruptcy act. There were 125 cases of garnishee during the first year; no record was kept after that time. The constant complaint is the beating of board and bar bills.

3. Twenty of the strikers' children were forced to leave school.

4. Sixty families were forced to move away.

5. None of the strikers were arrested.

6. During February or March of 1912 about 150 armed scabs decided to make a general attack on the pickets and citizens of the town, but were forced to desist by one of the foremen threatening to lock the gates, after they had left the bull pen, thus giving them no chance to retreat.

7. Most of the men who were brought to Sparks were of the genuine strike-breaker order. They came from Pittsburgh and Chicago. There were not over 15 cases of men who even claimed to have been deceived.

8. There were 10 cases of child labor and 10 cases of wife labor. There are several cases of men who had to sell their homes and several cases of homes that had to be and are now mortgaged, although there are no cases of homes lost by foreclosure. No deaths among strikers or their families are known. Arthur Hyde committed suicide in Australia, and his wife is now in the Reno Hospital.

9. John Schwanze and Otto Sorrenson suffered severely because of the strike. L. E. Johnson is an exceptional case. Johnson is an elderly man and was given permission to stay in the shop by the strikers. He could not bear the idea and came out anyway. He afterwards applied for reinstatement, but was refused by the company. He has lost his home and all that he had. He may be found by addressing in care of the secretaries of Lodge 610 or 284, I. A. of M., at Oakland, Cal.

TRUCKEE, CAL.

Ten men struck and they are all gone.

COLFAX, CAL.

Five men struck and I have been unable to locate any of them.

ROSEVILLE, CAL.

Two hundred and twenty-five men were employed prior to the strike, 210 men struck; 500 men were employed about September, 1912. The present force is ———.

(1) Mr. E. N. Scribner went out of business lately. Mr. Scribner was especially friendly to strikers.

Roseville is entirely a railroad town and is said to be in company control.

The town is the great clearing yard of the S. P. and has no other industry.

(2) Phipps, a notorious Chicago gunman, was eventually run out of the town by citizens. Ten scabs were arrested and fined for carrying concealed weapons, drunkenness, etc. No cases of the bankruptcy or garnishee known to the strikers. (I personally know of one case of garnishee.)

(3) Twenty-five children were taken from school.

10054 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

(4) Twenty-five families were compelled to break up their homes and move away.

(5) Six of the strikers were arrested. Each took trial before the local justice and conducted their own cases. Each was finally dismissed.

(6) Company employed 25 extra guards. The railroad police at Roseville were not inclined to be vicious, but the gunmen were insulting to pickets and their families, this provoking many fights. There was no general assault of gunmen on pickets, but there was an incessant war of a guerilla nature.

(7) There were a few cases known to the strikers of men who claimed when approached by the pickets that facts had been misrepresented to them by the employment agencies, and in each case these men quit and left town.

(8) There were no cases of child labor; 10 cases of wife labor; no deaths; no homes lost by foreclosure; and no suicides.

(9) John Veal, now at the W. P. shops at Sacramento, will make the best witness.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Four shops at the Sacramento plant (the largest by far in the strike zone) were not struck, namely, the foundry, rolling mill, electric, and bridge shops. These shops employed probably 700 men. Most of them were and still are unionized. Two thousand men were employed in the struck shops; 1,068 men struck. During January, 1913, the company claimed that 4,000 men were at work. About 2,000 men are now employed.

(1) There were no failures of any magnitude. Members of the Retail Grocers' and also Retail Butchers' Association extended credit to individual strikers and also the strike committee. The strike committee has paid all of its debts and so have the majority of individual strikers. There was and is a continuous complaint because of car shortage and delay of trains. Appeals were made to the Post Office Department on account of delayed mail trains, but no redress was ever attained. There are no cases known of the bankruptcy act. The strikers have about 60 cases of garnishee. It was impossible to get good data on paragraphs a and d at Sacramento. What follows is given from memory, newspaper clippings, etc.

(2) One scab wanted for murder in Mexico; one named Marshall, from Salt Lake City, got six years for forgery; and one killed two women and committed suicide. Strikers never attempted to keep any record for fighting, drunkenness, and petty thievery because it was an everyday occurrence. The various officers having police authority would not give this information to me.

(3) About 40 children were taken out of school.

(4) One hundred cases of families breaking up and leaving town.

(5) Ten cases of arrest of strikers and but one conviction. In this case it was a fight on the streets between a striker and a scab; both were arrested for disturbing the peace and both plead guilty. The striker was fined $20 and the scab was released by Justice Anderson.

(6) There was not many cases of lawlessness on the part of the gunmen. In one case, however, a marauding band jumped on a machinist named John Thomas, not a striker, knocked him into the gutter and jumped on his leg and broke it. There were innumerable small riots provoked by company officials and gunmen. The last row occurred in the early part of September, 1912. One hundred and twenty-five men, led by 2 scabs named Klipp and Simms, came out of the gates armed with nuts, bolts, etc., and made a general assault on the 25 pickets. Five of the pickets were seriously but not dangerously hurt. One scab, Simms, and 3 pickets were arrested. The scab was turned loose by the city prosecutor without trial; the pickets stood jury trial and were acquitted. The strikers claimed that this assault was planned by company officials. All expenses of the trial were paid by the strike committee, the general expense being about $600.

(7) As high as 3,000 men were hired during one month. Most of these claimed deception, especially newly arrived foreigners.

(8) About 20 cases of child labor; 50 known cases of wife labor (was probably more); 12 cases of death (the strike committee still owes undertaker bills); no homes lost by foreclosure; no suicides.

(9) W. M. Trefery, City Hall; J. W. Neathercott, Labor Temple, Sacramento, Cal.; and James Allen, of 7 Lake Street, River Forest, Ill., are special cases and Allen is the worst.

TRACY, CAL.

One hundred and fifty men were employed in all capacities prior to the strike; 100 men struck. About 150 men have been employed constantly since that time. Much of the work formerly done at Tracy is now sent to other shops.

(1) There was general complaint by the grain shippers, and the S. P. lost many of its customers to the W. P. There are no factories at Tracy. It is a railroad and wheat community.

(2) No cases of criminal records. Twenty scabs have been arrested and fined, mainly for fighting amongst themselves. No cases of the bankruptcy act and about 20 cases of garnishee.

(3) No children taken from school.

(4) Four families were compelled to break up and move away.

(5) Four of the strikers were arrested for disturbing the peace. All hired lawyers (expense borne by strike committee), stood judge trial, and were acquitted.

(6) About 20 gunmen were employed; and although these men were generally insulting to the strikers and their families, no outbreaks ever occurred.

(7) Eight cases of men claiming deception were made to the pickets. All quit and left town. In each case they were hired in San Francisco.

(8) No cases of child labor; 2 cases of wife labor; 1 striker died from exposure; no homes lost by foreclosure; and no suicides.

(9) J. W. Jones, Box 152, Tracy, Cal., an exceptional case.

STOCKTON, CAL.

Seven men came out on strike, four had families, and all are gone.

SAN JOSE, CAL.

About 150 men were employed during normal times prior to the strike; 97 men struck. The place has been gradually reduced since that time, and 60 men now employed. Mainly white foreigners and Japanese.

(1) Two failures of small business men are reported. Men have been laid off on a number of occasions at the freight sheds, and the canneries have been seriously hampered because of the delay of trains and car shortage. There was general complaint by the fruit shippers on the same account, and cases were reported of fruit being shipped in stock cars that were 6 inches deep with manure.

(2) No cases of criminal records; 3 cases of arrest; no cases of the bankruptcy; and 15 known cases of garnishee. Merchants class the scabs generally as "dead beats" and extend but little credit to them.

(3) No children taken from school.

(4) Twelve families broke up their homes and have moved away.

(5) Fifteen cases of arrest of strikers; 13 cases were dismissed without trial; 2 were convicted. In the case of O. L. Davis, the strikers claim that Davis was absolutely innocent, but took the blame for a man named Ebling. Ebling had a family and afterwards proved to be a spotter. Ebling is now in the employ of the company at San Jose. Davis was fined $100.

(6) During October, 1911, a gunman shot from a bunk car at a crowd of pickets. The bullet lodged in a packing plant by the heads of a number of girls employed there. The gunman laid in jail for one month, but was finally released without prosecution. During December, 1911, a gunman beat up and afterwards shot at two pickets. About 100 gunmen were employed until January, 1912, and after that time were gradually reduced. Many of their guards incessantly insulted the strikers, and one guard especially went around town daring the strikers to fight. He was rewarded with a job switching in the yards.

(7) About 30 men claim deception and left at the solicitation of the pickets. They claim San Francisco as their starting point. (See report on San Francisco.) It is also claimed that Clark Rickett, a local employment agent, has been and is now violating the law.

(8) No cases of child labor; 30 cases of wife labor; 1 home lost by foreclosure and 2 now mortgaged; 3 deaths in families of strikers, mainly because of poverty; no suicides.

(9) B. Van Hagen, 10 Garland Avenue, San Jose, Cal.

10056 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

SAN LUIS OBISPO, CAL.

Eighty-five men composed the normal force prior to the strike; 80 men struck; 160 men were the greatest number after the strike; 112 men now employed.

(1) There is nor was no general complaint on account of shortage of cars or delay of shipments. This town is not a shipping point.

(2) No scabs with criminal records. Five scabs were arrested, but all were released. The strikers claimed the sheriff failed to do his duty. No cases of bankruptcy or garnishee.

(3) No children taken out of school.

(4) Thirty-five families were compelled to break up their homes and move away.

(5) Eight cases of arrest of strikers; lawyers hired in each case. None were convicted on the charges against them.

(6) Nine gunmen led by one Macy made a general assault on six pickets. Macy shot at the pickets and after shooting used the butt of the gun on Picket William Brown. Shooting again, he struck Picket Brown, inflicting a flesh wound. In the riot that followed Picket Simmons was hit with a blackjack and wounded, but not seriously. Although the police and sheriff were notified by citizens, neither appeared for some time after. When they did arrive the riot was over. Two pickets and one gunman were arrested. Case was compromised the next day. Two guards, one named Parsons, attempted to run a picket named Dumphy away from the streets. In the fight that followed honors were even. Gunman Macy became so obnoxious that the company was forced to remove him from town. Gunman Parsons and one other were accused of robbing cars, but were never arrested. Hobos were taken from the trains by the gunmen, who locked them in the bull pen and tried to force them to scab. There are affidavits to this effect in the district attorney's office.

(7) Many men told the pickets that facts had been misrepresented to them by the employment agencies in San Francisco and Los Angeles.

(8) No cases of child labor; five cases of wife labor; no cases of homes lost, but two have since been mortgaged. Several strikers were paying for lots on the installment plan; lost the lots and their payments also. Several deaths occurred among our families, but strikers do not attribute the cause as being directly due to the strike. McClellan, a striker, and Morgan, alias Norris, a scab, committed suicide; both because of grief occasioned by the strike.

(9) George Hunn is an especial case of poverty. He finally took to drink. Hunn is not vicious. His family of six children were taken by the court. His address is 2482 Howard Street, San Francisco, Cal.

(10) The Rockdale store, the stock of which was mainly owned by strikers, has failed.

PAJARO, CAL.

Twenty men came out on strike. Majority had families, and they scattered everywhere. Up to the present time I have been unable to locate any of them.

SANTA CRUZ, CAL.

Six or more men came out. Several had families, and all are gone.

SANTA MARGARITA, CAL.

Two men struck; both had families and have left.

OAKLAND, CAL.

One thousand men were employed before the strike. Nine hundred and seven men struck. It is estimated that 2,700 was the greatest number employed since. About 650 are now employed.

(1) Three cases of business failure on account of the strike. The chamber of commerce at Hayward, a suburb of Oakland, made a strenuous complaint on account of the shortage of cars and delay of shipments. There was general complaint by all shippers around the bay on this account. The Van Emmons Elevator Co. was forced to shut down in their foundry three times since the inception of the trouble on account of delay in shipments; 18 men were employed.

(2) One Army deserter was captured in Oakland. Twenty-five known arrests for various misdemeanors. No cases of bankruptcy; about 50 cases of garnishee. Mrs. Robinson, of 1840 Seventh Street, running a boarding house, claims to have been beat out of $532 by scabs.

(3) No children taken out of school.

(4) One hundred families were compelled to break up their homes and leave.

(5) There were more than 200 cases of arrests of strikers; but 4 convictions. Twenty per cent of the cases were set free without trial. Judges Smith and Samuels refused to hear many cases, stating that the company was making "goats" of several prominent picket leaders.

(6) There were continuous assaults by the State railroad police on the strikers. (See San Francisco report.) This lasted for one year, and then a committee of business and union men called on the commissioner of public safety, Mr. F. C. Turner, and made a demand that the S. P. keep its gunmen and State police away from the public thoroughfare. The demand was complied with and good results have followed. On April 12, 1912, scabs, gunmen, and State police led by Master Mechanic Hinckley made a general assault under Hinckley's orders on the picket line. The rioting that followed lasted for 30 minutes. Five of the pickets were seriously wounded, and one, Al Bourlan, was unmercifully clubbed by a State policeman. Bourlan finally died from the effect. Seven of the pickets were arrested by direction of Mr. Hinckley and turned over to the city police. All of them were set free.

Especially during the time that women were on the picket line outrageously obscene insults were hurled at the strikers and their wives by the State police. One called "I handsome Harry" was slapped by a woman to whom he had passed a particularly obscene sign; a small riot followed.

(7) The majority of the men who arrived in the early part of the strike claimed to have come from the East and had been hired with the impression that there was no trouble. Most of these men quit at the solicitation of the pickets. Sullivan's Employment Agency, of San Francisco, contrary to State law, hired men without telling them of the strike.

(8) No cases of child labor known; 50 cases of wife labor, an especial case being that of Mrs. R. D. Oliver, who was run over and killed while on her way to work. Twelve cases of death due directly or indirectly to the strike; no suicides.

(9) Henry Byron, Jamestown, Cal.; William Matson, 4105 Boyd Street, Fruitvale, Cal.; and Charles O'Toole, corner Eighth and Pine Streets, Oakland, Cal.; either of these would make special cases, and I have no choice.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Three hundred and twenty-five men were employed prior to the strike; 304 men came out on strike. Greatest number employed since is about 600; present force is 300.

(1) One business failure is known, and the strikers say there was and is general complaint on account of the service, but do not know of specific cases.

(2) No cases of criminal records known. One guard employed was a released convict. During June and July, 1912, two scabs were arrested for highway robbery. Ten cases of arrests for misdemeanor and assaults. One case of the bankruptcy act and about 60 cases of garnishee.

(3) Fourteen children were taken out of school.

(4) Fifty families were compelled to break up their homes and move away.

(5) Twenty or more of our men were arrested; but two were fined. There was a judge trial in each case. The majority of our cases the judge refused to go beyond a preliminary examination, and dismissed the cases.

(6) During October, 1911, 75 gunmen led by one Madden came out of the gates to engage in a general assault on the neighborhood. Citizens of the vicinity armed themselves and allied themselves with the pickets. The gunmen went back.

The company employed about 100 gunmen, whose continuous activities were so pernicious that a committee headed by Mr. E. L. Reguin, president of the Harriman Line Federation, called on Gov. Johnson in December, 1911. The governor, going over the records, informed the committee that the State railroad police had been appointed for the S. P. in the past two years. Therefore the gunmen were illegally assuming State authority. Much less trouble, because of gunmen activity, occurred after that time.

10058 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Dan Collins, a picket, seemed to be the especial target of the gunmen, and was arrested seven times by the so-called railroad police, without warrant, and in each case set free.

(7) Much trouble was experienced by the strikers on account of local employment agencies, especially Sullivan's, not informing men in accordance to law that a strike was on. Strikers finally hired a banner man to parade in front of the agency.

(8) Fourteen cases of children put to work; 50 cases of wife labor. One blacksmith died from grief and worry, and his particular friend, a helper, went insane. One man, John Harley, committed suicide. Mr. Purcey, night engineer, is probably the worse case; his wife went to work in a laundry and lost her arm. They have five children.

(9) Henry Elbering, 350A Guerrero Street, San Francisco, Cal., will make a good witness.

RED BLUFF, CAL.

Twenty-five men struck at Red Bluff; at least 10 of these men had families, and I feel certain that 2 of them lost homes. I have so far been unable to locate any of them.

WEED, CAL.

Twelve men were employed during normal times; all of them struck; four of them were married, and all of these broke up their homes and left. Three children were taken from school. There are no strikers now in Weed.

HORN BROOK, CAL.

All the men at Hornbrook struck; there were eight of them. I have been unable to locate any of them.

ASHLAND, OREG.

Forty men were employed during normal times; 30 men struck; 50 men is the greatest number ever employed since. The mechanical gang is now three times the size prior to the strike, but the car gang is less.

(1) The Star restaurant went out of business. This place catered to the scabs, and that is said to be the cause of its failure. There is no general complaint because of lack of cars or service.

(2) No cases of criminal records. Three cases of arrest, two for fighting among themselves, and one for indecent exposure and assault on young girls. The two former cases resulted in conviction. The citizens run the last-mentioned case out of town. No known cases of bankruptcy. The strikers are not sure of any garnishee, but know of many cases of scabs beating bills.

(3) No children taken out of school.

(4) Ten families were compelled to break up their homes and move away.

(5) No strikers were arrested.

(6) Fifteen extra guards were employed. These men were sworn as extra police by the city authority. A quarrel occurred between the mayor and the city recorder, the mayor advocating drastic action against the strikers, who were peaceable, and the recorder decidedly against such action. The recorder carried the day. No cases of disorder occurred because the special police were not allowed to leave the company property.

(7) The pickets know of no cases of men who claimed misrepresentation by employment agencies.

(8) No cases of child labor; 4 cases of wife labor. An especial case is that of Mrs. James Hubsch. Mrs. Hubsch went to work in a laundry to help earn a living. She had her left hand crushed in a mangle; was absolutely crippled for one year. She now has some use of her hand, but it will always be crippled. The operation and surgeon's care cost $150.

G. W. Piniger lost his home. He has a crippled wife and one child. Piniger was finally forced to scab and is now at Pajaro, Cal. No deaths and no suicides.

(9) James Hubsch, 108 Second Street, Ashland, Oreg.

GRANTS PASS, OREG.

Twelve men were employed during normal times; 6 men struck; 24 is the greatest number employed since; and 16 are now employed.

(1) No business failures, although some merchants who were friendly to the strikers suffered severely at first. There is general complaint because of delay in shipments.

(2) No criminal records, no arrests, no bankruptcy, no garnishees.

(3) No children were taken out of school.

(4) Three families broken up and have moved away.

(5) No strikers arrested.

(6) No gunmen employed.

(7) No cases reported.

(8) No cases reported.

(9) Frank Smith, with a wife and two children, had to leave Grants Pass because no one would employ him. The city was entirely hostile to the strikers. Smith is now employed by the Standard Oil Co. in Putnam, Oreg.

ROSEBERG, OREG.

Eighty men were employed before the strike; 78 men struck; 230 is the greatest number employed since. Present force number is 90.

(1) No business failures. There was and is general complaints because of delay in shipments, but not on account of shortage of cars. Roseberg does no shipping, except in the prune season, and that is small.

(2) Ten gunmen were employed; one of these named Beck was an ex-convict. Ten scabs have been arrested for drunkenness, fighting, insulting women in the streets, etc. No cases of bankruptcy or garnishees, but many flagrant cases of beating of bills.

(3) Five children in one family were taken out of school and they are still out.

(4) Thirty families compelled to break up homes and move away.

(5) Six of the strikers were arrested and all hired lawyers. Two were fined for fighting and the rest released.

(6) The gunmen made several general assaults on the pickets and there were innumerable individual assaults. One gunman shoved a revolver in the face of Picket Schwartz and said he would kill him if he (Schwartz) opened his mouth. The gunman was arrested, but the district attorney refused to prosecute him. Walter Christl, a picket, talking to a local merchant, remarked that a certain scab was carrying a gun. The scab opened a fire on Christl and was arrested; he took jury trial and was released. Roseberg was bitterly opposed to the strikers. It is now as bitterly opposed to the scabs.

(7) Many of the men who were shipped in and were met at the trains by the pickets claimed that they were not informed of the strike by the employment agency at Portland. These men did not go to work.

(8) No cases of child labor; three cases of wife labor; no deaths. Picket Schwartz became insane from worry over the strike and is now an inmate of the California Insane Hospital. His wife is working in a Roseberg store, supporting her two children. One home was lost by foreclosure and one home has since been mortgaged.

(9) Thomas Patterson, 632 Short Street, Roseberg, is an especial case. Patterson has an invalid wife. Alexanderson, with a family of five, was and is destitute. The strikers had divided their benefits with him.

PORTLAND, OREG.

There are two shops at Portland—the northern terminal of the S. P. and the western terminal of the O. W. R. & N.

There were 500 men employed in the O. W. R. & N. prior to the strike and 275 employed by the S. P. Four hundred and ninety-five men struck at the O. W. R. & N. and 245 struck at the S. P. One thousand three hundred is the greatest number employed by the O. W. R. & N. and 600 is the greatest number by the S. P. There are 550 now employed by the O. W. R. & N. and 160 by the S. P.; the remainder of the Portland report is combined.

(1) There was general complaint in Portland on account of the shortage of cars and the delay of shipments. The greatest complaint was from the water front and warehouses during 1913. In the early part of 1913, warehouses refused to accept freight on account of the congestion. Many buildings were delayed on account of shortage of material, due to delays in receiving shipments of structural steel.

(2) Two men were arrested on requisitions of the governor of Texas on charges of robbery. One case of arrest for sodomy. This man was caught by three switchmen and beaten up so badly that it was necessary to take him to the hospital. No cases of bankruptcy. Forty known cases of garnishee.

(3) Thirty children were taken from school.

(4) One hundred and fifty families were compelled to break up their homes and move away.

(5) One hundred strikers have been arrested. All on charges of disturbing the peace. Some took jury trials, but many accepted trials by the judges. Seventy-five cases taken before the judges were dismissed. Eighty per cent of all cases were compelled to hire lawyers. None of the strikers were ever in jail except when waiting for bail. One case was in the criminal court but was never tried; it is now outlawed.

If the scabs were arrested for carrying concealed weapons, it was noticeable that an equal number of strikers were hauled up for the same offense. The city attorney, Mr. Frank S. Grant, and the company's attorney would use the effect of the latter arrests on the strikers, and compromise the cases of the scabs, thus settling the scabs free.

(6) About 80 gunmen were employed. Some were sworn in as deputy constables and sheriffs. Constable Wienberg went to the O. W. R. & N. shops and took badges from men, who having no authority nevertheless were assuming the same.

During September, 1912, 400 scabs and gunmen led by Supts. Ladd and Graham, of the O. W. R. & N., made a general assault on the Albina picket line, consisting of 17 men. A general riot, lasting 30 minutes, took place. All of the pickets were hit by rocks, bolts, and nuts, and two of the pickets were badly injured. No arrests were made, although there were six policemen on that beat. Sergt. Burk charged some of the scabs with disturbing the peace, but no trial was ever held.

During the summer of 1912 the scabs bombarded the headquarters of the strikers with files, nuts, bolts, etc. During this melee Pickets Robb and Martin were seriously hurt. This instance was like all the rest; two pickets and two scabs were arrested, and the cases afterwards dismissed.

On two separate occasions the pickets' headquarters at Albina were torn down. Headquarters of the S. P. strikers were destroyed four times. One tent, occupied as a home by a striker, was set on fire when the striker was inside and asleep, and once the tent was ripped to pieces by the company gunmen.

During the fall of 1913, 400 scabs armed with bolts, nuts, and clubs made a general assault of the pickets at the S. P. shops. Threats were made by the scabs to kill the captain of the pickets. It was stated that Webber—a notorious gunman—was slated to do the killing.

During the spring of 1912 a picket was standing at the foot of Russell Street about 10 a. m. Picket saw a gunman named Peter Stone go into the bull pen and come out with a bucket of crude oil and go on top of the office. The oil was poured down on the picket and also on a switchman standing near. Picket also saw the gunman afterwards come out of the office, and although he, the picket, made complaint no arrests were made.

Assaults by the gunmen on the pickets were so continuous that citizens in the neighborhood of the shop made complaint to the city authorities. The city authorities placed squads of policemen continuously in the region of the two shops. Decency and order prevailed thereafter.

(7) Employment agents continuously hired men without notifying them, as required by Oregon law, that a strike was on. For a while they were compelled to obey the law, but at the present time they are employing men and telling men that the strike has been declared off.

(8) Twenty-five cases of child labor, 50 cases of wife labor. Twelve deaths have occurred among the strikers and their families, all attributable to the strike. Many men lost homes, but I have no authentic record of them. No suicides.

(9) Frank Tire, 1184 Greeley Street, Portland, Oreg., will make an exceptional witness and strongly recommend that he be called.

NOTE.—It is just reported to the pickets by the scabs that 30 of their members have just been discharged for stealing from cars.

DALLAS, OREG.

Six men came out; 1 stayed two and a half years but returned to work. I can find no trace of the remaining 5.

SPRINGFIELD, OREG.

Two machinists struck. Their whereabouts is unknown.

HOQUIAM, WASH.

One machinist, a married man, struck. He has broken up his home and left. Do not know his whereabouts.

ALBANY, OREG.

Twenty-five men comprised the normal force prior to the strike; 23 men struck. Seventy-five is the greatest number employed since. Present force is about 60.

(1) There was no general complaint because of the shortage of cars or delay of shipments.

(2) Three extra guards were employed. These men were sworn in as deputy sheriffs. No cases of criminal records. One home-guard scab was arrested for carrying concealed weapons and threatening the peace. He was placed under bond. No case of the bankruptcy act; five known cases of garnishee. Present complaint of the merchants is that the scabs are "dead beats."

(3) Three children of W. W. Wilson were taken out of school and are still out.

(4) Eight families were forced to break up their homes and move away.

(5) None of the strikers were ever arrested.

(6) One scab carried a gun and threatened to kill anyone who spoke to him.

(7) No cases.

(8) No child or wife labor; no homes lost by foreclosure; but three strikers were compelled to dispose of their homes at a loss. No deaths or suicides.

(9) A. Truelove was compelled to move a sick wife and family. His present address is care of 209 Alisky Building, Portland, Oreg.

THE DALLES, OREG.

Thirty-five men was a normal force prior to the strike. Thirty-one men struck. Sixty was the greatest number employed since. Thirty-five are at present employed.

(1) The general complaint by merchants and fruit shippers, cause of delay.

(2) No cases of criminal records, arrests, bankruptcy, or garnishee.

(3) No children taken out of school.

(4) Sixteen families were compelled to break up their homes and move away.

(5) No strikers suffered arrest.

(6) Eleven gunmen, some of known evil reputes, were employed and sworn in as deputy constables. These gunmen on many occasions threatened to kill the pickets, but never carried out their threats.

(7) Strikers report cases of 12 men who claimed misrepresentation by employment agencies. All of these men quit and left at the solicitation of the pickets.

(8) No cases of child labor; 2 cases of wife labor; no cases of homes lost, although three men were compelled to desert the strikers in order to save their homes. One child died because of the poverty of his father. There were no suicides.

(9) The strike parted the family of James Hines, and this family is still parted. Hines is supporting his two children. His last known address is Whitefish, Mont.

UMATILLA, OREG.

Forty men were employed prior to the strike; 38 men struck. One hundred is the greatest number employed since; 35 is the present force.

(1) There was and is complaint against the company because of delay of shipments and shortage of cars. Shippers state that they are in hopes of getting direct connection with the Hill lines.

(2) No cases of criminal records. Two scabs were arrested for criminal conspiracy to injure striker McFarland. No cases of bankruptcy; 2 known cases of garnishee. The merchants complain that the average scab is a dead beat.

(3) No children were taken out of school.

- (4) Three families broke up their homes and moved away.
- (5) Scabs spread the story that Striker McFarland, who was running a dairy, poisoned the milk he was selling to customers. McFarland was arrested and forced to hire lawyers and was acquitted.
- (6) Six guards were employed who had no particular authority except that of making trouble. One, a "bad man" from Pasco, Wash., did not live up to his former reputation and was run out of town. The gunmen were vulgar and obscene to the strikers and citizens. Many of the citizens resented the insults, and numerous fights ensued.
- (7) No cases of employment agencies.
- (8) No cases of child or wife labor. No homes lost, although some were compelled to take cheaper quarters. No deaths or suicides.
- (9) No bad cases of destitution. Strikers appear to have done very well.

LA GRANDE, OREG.

One hundred and sixty men were employed prior to the strike; 131 men struck. Two hundred and twenty is the greatest number employed since. Present force is about 70.

- (1) One grocery store was compelled to close because the scabs beat their bills. Merchants and shippers were complaining because of car shortage and delay. La Grande shippers, like those of Umatilla, are awaiting the coming of the Hill lines.
- (2) No criminal record. Twenty-five arrested for drunkenness and disturbing the peace. Three took the bankruptcy act, and an average of 15 cases of garnishee for every month since the strike began.
- (3) No children taken out of school.
- (4) One hundred families broken up and moved away.
- (5) Twenty of our men were arrested and fined, and the fines were remitted in each case. The charges were for calling "scab." All cases hired lawyers and took judge's trial. All expenses were borne by the local federation.
- (6) Thirty extra guards were employed and made deputy sheriffs. All of them were local men of bad reputation. They continually insulted strikers and citizens, tried to provoke fights, and were generally successful.
- (7) No cases.
- (8) No cases of child labor; 45 cases of wife labor. Two homes lost by foreclosure. No deaths or suicides.
- (9) J. J. Guthridge, present address La Grande, with a wife and three children, suffered most from the effects of the strike. There are 16 strikers and their families still in La Grande.

DUNSMUIR, CAL.

Normal force prior to the strike, 85 men; 57 men struck. Two hundred and fifty men is the greatest number employed since, and there are about 120 men now employed.

- (1) There were no business failures and no complaint about service. Dunsmuir is entirely a shop town; it was and is in the control of the railroad company.
- (2) One man, "Chicago" Miller, was convicted for white slavery and committed to the penitentiary. Ten have been arrested for drunkenness, fighting, etc. No cases of bankruptcy. Thirty known cases of garnishee. There is probably no place in the strike zone where the beating of bills was and is as great or as continuous as in Dunsmuir. It is the one great complaint of the community.
- (3) No children taken out of school.
- (4) About 15 families were broken up and moved away.
- (5) Three cases of arrest. All hired lawyers and stood trial. One was fined $30, and others were discharged.
- (6) Sixty guards were employed; all of these claimed to be State railroad police and wore badges as such. On two occasions guards tried to start trouble in the saloons and afterwards on the streets by insulting strikers and daring them to fight.

During the winter of 1912 about 30 gunmen came out of the shop, stating their intention of doing up the strikers and the town. There were but few citizens and no strikers on the street at the time. This affair ended as it began—in noise.

New Year's Eve, 1912, 25 gunmen were in a snowball fight with boys. One of the gunmen slapped a child. A citizen interfered and "cleaned the gunman." Remaining scabs drew guns, but other citizens and police officers drove them off.

(7) The usual case at Dunsmuir. Many of the imported men refused to go to work when informed of the strike.

(8) Two cases of child labor and one case of wife labor. No homes lost. One death, Anton Swanson, an old striker, died in grief over the affair.

(9) Thomas Felling, address Dunsmuir, has a family of five and is now sick. He was and is assisted by the strikers.

FRESNO, CAL.

Seventy-five men comprised the normal force prior to the strike; 65 men struck. One hundred and twenty-five is the greatest number employed since, and the present force is about 75.

(1) There were no business failures and no general complaint on account of the shortage of cars. There was and is complaint on account of delay.

(2) No scabs with criminal records. Ten have been arrested for misdemeanor and one for murder. No cases of bankruptcy or garnishee.

(3) No children were taken out of school.

(4) Twenty families were compelled to break up their homes and move away.

(5) Four of the strikers were arrested. All hired lawyers and stood judge trial. All were released. The local federation paid the expense.

(6) Fifteen gunmen were employed and all of them claimed the authority of State police. These harassed and annoyed citizens as well as pickets. One citizen was arrested by them for trespassing and then was released.

During January, 1912, two scabs got into a general "mix-up" and one was killed. The other was arrested on a charge of murder, but was released on the ground of self-defense.

(7) No cases.

(8) There were 10 cases of child labor, 15 cases of wife labor, no homes lost, no deaths, and no suicides.

(9) David Hinton, 590 Van Ness Avenue, Fresno, Cal.

BAKERSFIELD, CAL.

Two hundred and fifty men were employed prior to August 1, 1911; 186 men struck and 15 stayed in. Three hundred and eighty is the greatest number employed since, and the present force is about 250.

(1) One grocer in Kern failed. The failure is charged to the fact that he gave credit to scabs who failed to pay. Merchants claim that the strike has ruined the town. Merchants and shippers have in the past and are now complaining on account of delay. The S. P. lost many customers to the Santa Fe.

(2) Many of the scabs have criminal records, but none with charges pending against them at the beginning of the strike. There have been three arrests for murder. Arrests for misdemeanors are numberless. No cases of bankruptcy. Twenty known cases of garnishee.

(3) No children taken out of school.

(4) One hundred families were compelled to break up their homes and move away.

(5) Twenty-five of the strikers have been arrested. A majority of them took jury trial; all hired lawyers, the federation paid for two cases; the individuals paid for the remainder. In none of the cases was the decision rendered against the strikers.

(6) Seventy-five gunmen were employed. A majority of these men were of known desperate character. Four of them were deputized as constables, and they immediately proceeded to inaugurate a reign of terror. Tents of the strikers were burned on several occasions. The local police refused to make arrests of plain and open violations of the law.

During October, 1911, 3 gunmen made an assault on 2 pickets; 1 picket was badly wounded. Shooting up the yards and the town by gunmen was a nightly occurrence for four months.

During the evening of November 25, 1911, Railroad Policeman Oyster began beating Picket Reinhardt with his club. Reinhardt ran and hid in the rear of the Leader saloon. A small fight occurred on the street during the beating of Reinhardt. Policeman Oyster and four gunmen followed Reinhardt into the saloon, Gunmen Hardwick and Perry carrying guns in their hands. A small crowd followed them in. Perry and Hardwick began using clubs on the crowd indiscriminately. J. S. Coldereau, a striker, was at the bar before the fight began. Perry began shooting at Coldereau, hitting him five times, the last shot being fired into Coldereau's head as he lay dying on the floor, Perry remarking at the time, "Take that, you S. O. B.; I guess that will quiet you." Perry was arrested and charged with murder. Citizens of Bakersfield openly charged that Reinhardt, the principal witness, was paid by the S. P. Co. to leave the country. The district attorney, Mr. Irwin, was charged by the strikers of being an "S. P. man," and finally juggled the case out of court. Perry's case was called this summer, but was dismissed because Reinhardt, the principal witness, could not be located. Reinhardt had been charged with resisting an officer; bail was furnished by the treasurers of the different unions. When the treasurers of these unions saw how flagrant the case was they demanded the return of the bail money after Reinhardt had left the town, and the authorities, afraid to refuse, gave it to them.

The whole affair is such a shameful travesty on justice that the authorities of California should investigate it, and if they are unable to make Kern County comply with law and order then the United States Government should take a hand.

(7) No positive cases of misrepresentation by employment agencies.

(8) Two cases of child labor and 10 cases of wife labor. No cases of homes lost by foreclosure, although many have since been compelled to sell their homes. There was 1 murder; 3 cases of death because of limited means; one man named Clearidge committed suicide; Louis Dorr wounded his wife and committed suicide.

(9) Herbert Souders, of Taft, Cal., or Walter Dunbar, of Owen and Oregon Streets, East Bakersfield, Cal. Either will make an exceptional witness, but I would recommend Souders.

MOJAVE, CAL.

Twenty-seven men were employed previous to the strike; 25 men struck. Seventy-five is the greatest number employed since, and they now have about 30.

(1) One restaurant which catered to the strike breakers failed because of the boycott by union men. Mojave is entirely a railroad and miners' town and has no shippers of any kind.

(2) No cases of criminal record that are known to the strikers. There have been about 6 arrests for drunkenness, fighting, etc. No cases of bankruptcy, and but 1 known case of garnishee.

(3) No children taken out of school.

(4) One family moved away. All other strikers were single men, and all have left except one.

(5) Three of the strikers were arrested. All stood jury trials and were acquitted.

(6) Twelve guards, all of them of known evil reputation, were employed.

About January 25, 1912, Ed. Lafevre, a striking car inspector, was shot and killed, supposedly by an Indian mixed breed named Smith. On this occasion 5 or 6 gunmen were outside of Owl Saloon, and one shot at Lafevre came out of the door. Several of the guards were arrested, but no real attempt has ever been made to apprehend the murderer; 3 of the gunmen who made this assault were given 30, 60, and 90 days, respectively, as being accessories. Smith left Mojave about 11 o'clock that night and is still at large. The guards made criminal assaults at the same time on Ernest Mayne, a companion of Lafevre.

Mojave, like Bakersfield, is in Kern County, and although the local authorities did their best in this case, they received no help from the county officials.

Several fights took place between guards, and strikers would be arrested, but were always released. Guards were never arrested.

The murder of Lafevre is as flagrant a miscarriage of justice as that of Coldereau and should be investigated.

(7) Ten Greeks were brought in the day before the strike, but refused to go to work when they learned the conditions.

(8) No cases of child labor; 1 case of wife labor, and she, being a school-teacher, lost her position; no homes lost; 1 murder; and no suicides.

(9) Ernest Mayne, Mojave, Cal., first-class witness, and strongly recommend that he be called.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.

There are 2 shops in Los Angeles, namely, S. P. and the Salt Lake. At the Salt Lake 225 were normally employed; 225 men struck. Six hundred is the greatest number employed since, and about 220 are now employed. One thousand seven hundred men was the normal force at the S. P. shop; 1,500 men struck. Two thousand five hundred men is the greatest number employed since the strike; present force is about 1,800.

The remainder of the Los Angeles report will combine the 2 shops.

(1) No business failures. During the early part of the strike there was serious complaint by the orange shippers because of car shortage and delay of shipment.

(2) No criminal records are known to the strikers. Fifteen known arrests for misdemeanors. No cases of bankruptcy, and about 25 cases of garnishee. There are numerous cases of scabs beating bills; as a matter of fact, this is the complaint of the merchants on the "East Side."

(3) No children taken out of school.

(4) Two hundred families were broken up and have moved away.

(5) Four of the strikers have been arrested for disturbing the peace; all of them took jury trials; 3 were acquitted and 1 was fined. The local federation paid the expenses.

(6) One hundred and fifty guards were employed; the majority were sworn in as deputy sheriffs.

During the early part of the strike the gunmen were very insulting to the strikers and tried to provoke fight, but were unsuccessful, because the local police made them stay on company property.

About 6 months after the beginning of the strike, and at a time when the company began discharging the guards, George Bennett, an old machinist, who was allowed to stay in by the strikers, was set upon and received a severe beating. None of the strikers ever held any enmity toward Bennett, and they (the strikers) claim that Bennett was beaten up by gunmen.

Claude Reans, a scab foreman, was arrested in a gambling room with a gun and a badge on him. It afterwards developed that Reans had no police authority. The gun and badge were confiscated by local police.

On one occasion a guard named Squires drew a gun on striker James Comp-ton, while both were on a street car. Citizens interfered, and a police officer arrested Squires. Squires was afterwards released.

(7) The employment officers of many of the fraternal orders were and are hiring men for the struck shops.

During the early summer of this year the Municipal Employment Office hired men for the struck lines without telling them of the strike. This is one of the scandals of the present city administration and was stopped by Councilman Wheeler.

(8) Twenty cases of child labor and 15 cases of wife labor. Many cases of homes lost have been reported to me, but I am unable so far to verify any of them. Many of the strikers have since been forced to sell their homes. Ten deaths among the strikers and their families. Hall, a boiler maker, went insane and is confined to the Patton Insane Hospital. His wife is now supporting the family.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

Twenty-five men struck at this point. I am unable to locate any of them.

STARBUCK, WASH.

The force employed at Starbuck at the time of the strike was between 75 and 100 men. All but 5 struck. I was unable to get to Starbuck and have written to Mr. Roy Eaton, Box 108, Starbuck, Wash., for information. To date I have not heard from Mr. Eaton.

SUMMARY.

Forty-four points were investigated. Seven thousand four hundred and eighty-two men came out on strike. A number probably equal to one-fifth of this total were laid off or quit just prior to this strike. About 16 division points were not investigated. These employed from two to six men. I believe that with one exception all of them struck. Their particular story could not be obtained in the time given to me.

On matters relating to the first question: The territory given to me is mainly desert, or at least not thickly populated. Small portions of its are agricultural, and but four towns, namely, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Oakland, and Portland, contain factories of any size whatsoever. Most of the cities have practically no industries but the railroad shops.

On the second question: I have 14 cases of men with criminal records for whom there were warrants and who were caught. Four hundred and forty-one cases of arrests for various misdemeanors that came directly under the notice of the strikers. In only one city could I get information from police-court officers, and I feel sure that my estimate is conservative to the last degree. There are 5 cases of scabs taking the bankruptcy act and 495 cases of garnishee. This information also is given by strikers, and I am sure is exceedingly conservative. The general answer given to this question was about the excessive number that beat their bills, but as to whether many had been garnisheed or not, strikers appear to have little knowledge or care.

One hundred and eighty children were taken from school. On this question strikers generally deliberately lied, undoubtedly from a sense of pride. The time limit given me would not justify my calling on school superintendents, and in many cases they were out of town, it being the summer vacation. The number given does not include those taken out temporarily because of the removal of their parents to other towns. If this number were counted, it would undoubtedly run past the thousand mark.

The fourth question shows that 1,069 families were forced to break up their homes. All of these can be easily verified. I have no record from Starbuck, a large shop, and the numerous places mentioned previously, which would undoubtedly add at least 50 cases to this number.

On the fifth proposition: Five hundred and fifty-three strikers were arrested, none of them for crime, there were but 20 cases of fines, and all the rest were released. Each case was for fighting, and the highest fine, that of O. L. Davis, at San Jose, Cal., was undoubtedly unjust.

Questions 6 and 7 can not be totalized. They apply to each particular locality and are so given.

Question 8: One hundred and four children were put to work and 383 wives went to work. This number, I believe, falls ridiculously short of the real number, in so far as the labor of wives and children are concerned. I am positive that some of the strikers lied to me, because I talked to wives of men whom I knew had been at work and these men afterwards denied.

Fifty-seven deaths, 4 suicides, 4 insane, 4 murders, and the loss of 11 homes are credited to the strike. The latter case I am sure are also short of the real number.

In the report of each shop I have named a man who would make a good witness. I desire to emphasize the statement made in the case of Lyndyl, Utah (Morris mentioned as witness); Sparks, Nev. (Johnson as witness); Bakersfield, Cal. (Souders as witness); and Mojave, Cal. (Mayne as witness).

In conclusion I realize that my summing up is not accurate, that I have only scratched the surface in this investigation. To give a good account in the same territory one should be allowed 120 days.
